The original bill in this cause was filed for a partition of certain real estate, and an account of her share of the rents and profits, (p. 28). "The defendant having been in possession of the premises for the whole period, must be charged with an occupation rent." (Turner v. Morgan, 8 Vesey, 145.) Again, Ib.: "The master is to take an account of the rent and profits of the premises received by any of the parties to this suit," etc.

Having thus, as we think, established that in equity plaintiff is entitled to the relief demanded, it cannot, we suppose, be disputed that this Court will administer well-settled equity as well as common law principles. Smith v. Rowe, 4 Cal. 6; Minturn v. Hays, 2 Cal. 593.

Pico v. Columbet.

Holladay & Cary for Respondent.

If this is a common law action of account, as we maintain, then "the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action;" which defect might be taken advantage of by demurrer, which was done.

The complaint does not charge the defendant as bailiff, or receiver, nor with having received more than his just share of the profits. See 3 Hill's Rep., pp. 59-70, McMurray v. Rawson, which case reviews all the authorities new and old upon the subject, and results in conclusions of law adverse to the plaintiff. Also, 18 Barbour, p. 265, Woolver v. Knapp, literally in point. See the reasoning of the Court in that case, on page 267.

The authorities cited in this case in 18 Barbour, as well as the reasoning of the Court in its opinion, seem conclusive of the present controversy in favor of defendant.

See, also, 9 Eng. Law and Equity Reports, p. 337. First see the argument of counsel (Watson) on page 338, which is adopted and sustained in the opinion and judgment of the Court in that case, showing that at common law the action of account will not lie upon the facts stated in this complaint; nor under the statute of Anne should the Court hold that it (the statute) had become a part of the common law.

That case covers the present controversy.

"The Common Law of England, etc., shall be the rule of decision in all the Courts of this State." See Stat. of 1850, p. 219. See, also, 12 Mass. Rep. 149, Sargent v. Parsons, which also decides this case. See, also, 9 Mass. Rep. 539, which was decided on the authority of Jones v. Harnden, which is also found on page 539, 9 Mass.

The complaint avers but four things:

- 1st. The co-tenancy of the parties.
- 2d. The "sole and exclusive possession and occupation" of the defendant.
- 3d. The net sum of the rents, issues and profits.
- 4th. A demand for one-half thereof, and an account of the same.

By the complaint it does not appear that defendant was receiver or bailiff of and for the plaintiff, nor that defendant has received more than his just share of the profits; hence we may infer that such was not the case.

Pico v. Columbet.

The complaint does not allege an ouster or dispossession of the plaintiff — allege that he ever demanded or desired to enter, occupy and enjoy the premises with the defendant.

The complaint does not allege a partnership in the business between the parties, whereby the plaintiff either contributed anything, or was liable to contribute anything, for expenses, losses or repairs.

The defendant could not have compelled the plaintiff to pay one dollar for the expenses of the business, nor to contribute a dollar to any losses which might have been incurred. One tenant in common in possession cannot repair at the expense of himself and co-tenant, much less can he charge them for improvements. 10 Barb. Sup. Court of N. York, Taylor v. Baldwin; on page 590 of that case, and authorities there cited.

The plaintiff's counsel has not shown one single case at common law in support of the complaint in this case. But he calls this an equity suit; then the complaint must be a bill in equity.

That fact can only be determined from an inspection of its contents, and by ascertaining its nature and the functions it is designed to perform.

In this view of the case, the complaint or bill is equally infirm and impotent, in an equitable light, as we have shown it to be, for any other legal purpose.

If this is an equity proceeding, then it should either appear by the specific allegations in the complaint to that effect, or, at least, we should be able to gather from the whole case that the plaintiff has no adequate remedy at law. "In the ordinary cases of mesne profits, where a clear remedy exists at law, equity will not interfere, but will leave the party to his remedy at law. Some special circumstances are necessary to draw into activity the remedial interference of a Court of Equity." See 1 Story Eq. Juris., secs. 508 to 519, cited in the note appended to the case of Pultney v. Warren, 6 Vesey, Jr., Rep., p. 73. which case see on various points applicable to this case.

This latter named case is cited also by plaintiff's counsel in his brief. We cannot exactly see how it requires the exercise of the equity powers of a Court to enable the plaintiff to collect forty-two thousand dollars of the defendant, for this is the whole purpose of the sur.

FIELD, J., delivered the opinion of the Court — TERRY, C. J., and BALDWIN, J., concurring.

This action is brought by one tenant in common against his co-tenant, who is in the sole possession of the entire premises, to recover a share of the profits received from the estate. The case was argued upon the demurrer to the complaint, which, by stipulation of the parties, was admitted to have been taken on the ground that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. The complaint avers a tenancy in common between the parties; the sole and exclusive possession of the premises by the defendant; the receipt by him of the rents, issues and profits thereof; a demand by the plaintiff of an account of the same, and the payment of his share; the defendant's refusal; and that the rents, issues and profits amount to $84,000. These averments, and not the form in which the prayer for judgment is couched, must determine the character of the pleading. The complaint is designated a bill in equity, but the designation does not make it such. There are no special circumstances alleged which withdraw the case from the ordinary remedies at law, and require the interposition of equity. The action is a common law action of account, and, viewed in this light, the complaint is fatally defective. It does not aver that the defendant occupied the premises upon any agreement with the plaintiff, as receiver or bailiff of his share of the rents and profits. It is essential to a recovery that this circumstance exist, and equally essential to the complaint that it be alleged. By the common law, one tenant in common has no remedy against the other who exclusively occupies the premises and receives the entire profits, unless he is ousted of possession when ejectment may be brought, or unless the other is acting as bailiff of his interest by agreement, when the action of account will lie. The reason of the doctrine is obvious. Each tenant is entitled to the occupation of the premises; neither can exclude the other; and if the sole occupation by one co-tenant could render him liable to the other, it would be in the power of the latter, by voluntarily remaining out of possession, to keep out his companion also, except upon the condition of the payment of rent. The enjoyment of the absolute legal right of one co-tenant would thus often be dependent upon the caprice or indolence of the other. 1 Co. Lit. 200; 5 Bacon's Abrid. 367; Willes, 209.

The statutes of 4 and 5 Anne, 16, gave a right of action to one joint tenant, or tenant in common, against the other as bailiff, who received more than his proportional share of the profits. At common law the bailiff was answerable, not only for his actual receipts, but for what he might have made from the property without willful neglect, (Co. Lit. 172, a. Willes, 210) but as bailiff under the statute of Anne, he was responsible only for what he received beyond his proportionate share. That statute only applied to cases where one tenant in common received from a third person money, or something else, to which both co-tenants were entitled by reason of their co-tenancy, and retained more than his just share according to the proportion of his interest. This was held in Henderson v. Eason in the Exchequer Chamber, 9 Eng. Law and Eq. 387. In that case it was decided, that if one of two tenants in common solely occupies land, farms it at his own cost, and takes the produce for his own benefit, his co-tenant cannot maintain an action of account against him as bailiff for having received more than his share and proportion.

The statute of Anne has never been adopted in this State, nor have we any similar statute. The case at bar must therefore be determined upon the principles of the common law. By them, as we have observed, the action cannot be maintained against the occupying tenant unless he is by agreement a manager or agent of his co-tenant. The occupation by him, so long as he does not exclude his co-tenant, is but the exercise of a legal right. His cultivation and improvements are made at his own risk; if they result in loss he cannot call upon his co-tenant for contribution, and if they produce a profit his co-tenant is not entitled to share in them. The co-tenant can at any moment enter into equal enjoyment of his possession; his neglect to do so may be regarded as an assent to the sole occupation of the other. On this point, the observations of Baron Parke in Henderson v. Eason are pertinent, although that case arose under the statute of Anne: "There are obviously many cases," says the Justice, "in which a tenant in common may occupy and enjoy the land or other subject of tenancy in common solely, and have all the advantage to be derived from it, and yet it would be most unjust to make him pay anything. For instance, if a dwelling-house or room is solely occupied by one tenant in common without ousting the other, or a chattel is used by one tenant in common, and nothing is received, it would be most inequitable to hold that by a simple act of occupation or user, without any agreement, he should be liable to pay a rent, or anything in the nature of a compensation, to his co-tenant for that occupation, to which, to the full extent to which he enjoyed, he had a perfect right. It appears impossible to hold such a case to be within the statute, and an opinion to that effect was expressed by Lord Cottenham in McMahon v. Burchell. Such cases are clearly out of the operation of the statute. Again, there are many cases where profits are made and are actually taken by one co-tenant, yet it is impossible to say that he has received more than comes to his just share. For instance, if one tenant employs his capital and industry in cultivating the whole of the piece of land, the subject of the tenancy, in a mode in which the money and labor expended greatly exceeds the value of the rent or compensation for the mere occupation of the land, in raising hops, for example, which is a very hazardous adventure, and he takes the whole of the crops, is he to be accountable for any of the profits in such a case, where it is clear, if the speculation had been a losing one altogether, he could not have called for a moiety of the loss, as he would have been enabled to do had it been so cultivated by the mutual agreement of the co-tenants? The risk of the cultivation, and the profits and the loss, are his own, and what is just with respect to the very uncertain and expensive crop of hops, is also just with respect to all the produce of the land, the fructus industriales which are raised by the capital and industry of the occupier, and cannot exist without it. In taking all the produce, he cannot be said to receive more than his just share and proportion to which he is entitled as tenant in common, as he receives in truth the remuneration for his own labor and capital, to which a tenant has no right."

The American cases are to the same effect. In Sargent v. Parsons, (12 Mass. 149) the Court said: "The action of account is maintainable only against a bailiff; and a bailiff can only be one who is ap*pointed* such, or who is made such by the law; which latter instance applies only to a guardian, who is bailiff of his ward, and who is liable, not only for rents and profits actually received, but also for those which he might have received by a proper management of the estate.

Pico v. Columbet.

"One tenant in common may, by contract, make another his bailiff or receiver; and, if he does, he may bring him to account in this form of action; and probably, also, to avoid a process considered in some degree troublesome, might sue him in indebitatus assumpsit as on a promise to account. But this must be for rents and profits actually received beyond his share; for, by the common law no remedy is given for a mere sole use and occupation by one of the tenants; for it is in the power of each tenant at any time to occupy; and the not doing it by one would look like an assent that the other should occupy the whole."

In Woolver v. Knapp, (18 Barb. 265) the defendant had enjoyed the sole possession of a farm for five years, the rent and occupation of which was worth two hundred dollars a year. The plaintiffs were his co-tenants, and brought their action of account. The Court decided that the action could not be sustained, holding that one tenant in common who possesses the entire premises, without any agreement with his co-tenants as to his possession, or any demand on their part to be allowed to enjoy the same with him, is not liable to account in an action for their use and occupation. See, also, Nelson's Heirs v. Clay's Heirs, 7 J. J. Marsh. 139.

We have treated this case as an action of account at law, but to the same result we should come if the proceeding were in equity. There is no equity in the claim asserted by the plaintiff to share in profits resulting from the labor and money of the defendant, when he has expended neither, and has never claimed possession, and never been liable for contribution in cases of loss. There would be no equity in giving to the plaintiff, who would neither work himself, or subject himself to any expenditures or risks, a share in the fruits of another's labor, investments and risks.

The cases to which our attention has been called, in which equity has sustained an account in favor of one tenant in common, out of possession, against his co-tenant in possession, for the rents and profits, are, with some exceptions in the Court of Appeals of South Carolina, those in which the account was a collateral incident to a claim for partition, and the rents and profits claimed were due from the defendant as a tenant of the plaintiff's interest, or were received by him when they belonged to both parties, or were the proceeds of their joint labor and expenditures. Thus, in Pope v. Haskins, (16 Ala. 321) the defendant had leased of the complainant his undivided one-third interest in a lot belonging to the parties as tenants in common, and upon the expiration of the lease had rented out the lot to a third party, and received the entire profits, and the bill was filed to obtain an account of the rents and profits, and for a partition of the property.

Pico v. Columbet.

In Hoffman v. Osborne, (4 Paige, 336) the bill was filed for the partition and sale of a lot of land, and an account of the rents and profits, and the account directed was of the rents and profits received by any of the parties, not of the profits made in the use and occupation of the premises.

In Turner v. Morgan, (8 Vesey, 143) the bill prayed partition of a house at Portsmouth, and an account of the rent, under the following circumstances: The house was decreed to three persons, equally to be divided. The plaintiff purchased two-thirds. The defendant was tenant of the house under a lease of (£22) twenty-two pounds a year, and refusing to raise the rent, the plaintiff brought ejectment for his two-thirds. The ejectment was defeated, the defendant purchasing the remaining third. Upon this, the bill was filed. The Chancellor allowed a partition. No question appears to have been made upon the right of the plaintiff to an account, the defendant having been tenant under the lease; and the Chancellor observed, in relation to the account, that there was a possible distinction between the time during which the defendant was tenant, and the time since he became owner, but that justice would be answered by inquiring what would have been a reasonable rent in each year the account was sought.

The doctrine laid down by the Court of Appeals of South Carolina, as to the liability of one co-tenant to another, is believed to be peculiar to that Court. In Hancock v. Day, Thompson v. Bostic, and Holt v. Robinson, (1 McMullen Eq. Rep. 69, 75 and 475) it was held, that as between tenants in common, the occupying tenant is liable for rent of so much of the premises as was capable of producing rent at the time he took possession, but not liable for that which was rendered capable by his labor. The reasons upon which these decisions rest do not commend themselves to our judgment, and are insufficient to overcome the force of the English, Massachusetts, New York and Kentucky authorities.

The demurrer should have been sustained; but as the same result was obtained by a judgment rendered for the defendant on the merits of the case, it will be sufficient to direct the affirmance of the judgment.

No appeal lies from such an order. The statute authorizing an appeal from an order granting or refusing a new trial, or which affects a substantial right, does not apply to interlocutory orders made in the progress of the trial. If such a construction were given to the statute, the whole scheme of criminal justice would be defeated. To procure the continuance of a cause, it would be only necessary to demur to the

Then, upon filing the remittitur from the Appellate Court, the same course might be pursued in regard to a multitude of questions which arise in the progress of every criminal trial, the decision of which necessarily affects the substantial rights of the party defendant. Such a result, annulling in effect the Criminal Statutes, was never contemplated by the Legislature.

FIELD, J., delivered the opinion of the Court — BALDWIN, J., concurring.

This case comes before us on appeal from the final judgment, and from the order denying a new trial. The statement upon which the appellant rests, is the one used upon the motion, and this is not agreed to by the parties or their counsel, or settled by the Judges who tried the case. It has not, therefore, sufficient authentication to constitute any portion of the record which we can notice. The appeal is based upon errors which the statement discloses, and as these cannot be considered, the judgment must be affirmed.

 McGarrity v. Byington.

 MCGARRITY v. BYINGTON et al.

The grounds of a motion for a nonsuit must appear in the record, otherwise this Court will not consider such motion.

Where a subscribing witness to a bill of sale is out of the State, and the proof is, that witness saw subscribing witness put his name to it, and saw grantor sign it, and recognizes the paper from hearing it read—not being able to read himself—and another witness testifies that the signature of the subscribing witness is in his handwriting, this is sufficient evidence to identify the paper and authorize it to be read in evidence.

A subscribing witness, who is called to prove the execution of the instrument, who testifies that it was signed in his presence, “to the best of his recollection,” is sufficient to allow it to be read in evidence.

Before reversing the judgment of the Court below, on the ground that a certain paper was admitted in evidence, which was irrelevant to the issue joined, this Court will require the irrelevancy clearly to appear. Some facts should be adduced showing that the admission of the paper had an undue influence upon the verdict of the jury.

Where the original records of mining claims of a certain district have been destroyed by fire, and the miners, by a resolution subsequently passed, required the claims to be re-recorded in a new book, such book may be admitted in evidence in the trial of an ejectment case for a mining claim, to show that the rules of vicinage had been complied with.

A Constable's deed under an execution sale of the premises in controversy, where the execution was against a third party, cannot be read in evidence in an ejectment suit unless title is shown in the defendant in execution at the time of the levy and sale, or the counsel offering it connects it in some way with the issue between the parties to the suit. Where a paper is prima facie irrelevant, counsel offering it must show how it is admissible.

The right in a mining claim vests by the taking in accordance with local rules.

In the absence of any custom or local regulation, the right of property, once attached in a mining claim, does not depend upon mere diligence in working such claim. The failure to comply with any one mining regulation, is not a forfeiture of title. It would be enough to hold the forfeiture as the result of a noncompliance with such of them as make a noncompliance a cause of forfeiture.

It is not the making of improvements or expending of money on another's property which entitles the person so expending to hold the property as against the owner, or even the improvements; but it is the fraud of the owner, who silently, or otherwise, encourages the expenditure. But this fraud only exists, at the very most, where the owner knows that the other person is making the expenditures, and also knows that he makes them under the bona fide reasonable belief that he is the owner of the property.

Work done outside of a mining claim, with intent to work the claim, to be considered by intentment as work done on the claim, must have direct relation and be in reasonable proximity to it.

McGarrity v. Byington.

Where the evidence is conflicting, this Court will not reverse an order of the Court below refusing a new trial.

The mere fact that a verdict is entitled in the name of the plaintiff and one of the defendants is immaterial. It need not be entitled at all.

APPEAL from the Fourteenth District, County of Sierra.

This was an action of ejectment for the recovery of mining claims. The complaint alleges that plaintiff was seized, possessed, etc., of the premises in controversy, and that on the first day of June, 1857, defendants entered, etc., and ejected him (plaintiff), and continue to withhold possession of said premises from plaintiff, and prays restitution.

The answer admits the possession of defendants, but justifies under a claim of prior possession. The cause was tried by a jury.

On the trial, Samuel Thomas, a witness for the plaintiff, was shown a certain bill of sale from Day to the witness, Thomas, for an undivided interest in the premises in dispute; Thomas testified as follows: "I recognize Day's signature. Clark, who witnessed the bill of sale, has gone to the States. I saw Clark witness it; saw Day sign it. I can't read writing. * * * I can identify the bill of sale only by its reading the same as the one given to me."

E. S. Lester was then called by the plaintiff, and testified that the signature of Clark to the bill of sale "is his true signature, to the best of my knowledge."

Plaintiff then offered the bill of sale in evidence, and it was admitted, under the objection of defendants.

J. C. Lester, a witness for plaintiff, was shown a deed of conveyance of the premises in dispute from Irwin, Thomas and McGarrity to E. S. Lester, and testified as follows: "I signed my name to this paper as subscribing witness. I don't know who signed the name of Thomas or McGarrity; think Irwin wrote them; don't know whether Irwin signed it in my presence, or not; don't know that Thomas or McGarrity made their marks in my presence; but to the best of my recollection they did."

Plaintiff then offered the deed of conveyance in evidence, which was admitted under the objection of defendants.

McGarrity v. Byington.

---

The paper mentioned in the opinion of the Court as Exhibit E, is a contract between the Meredith Mining Company, of the first part, and McGarrity, (plaintiff) of the second part, for the privilege and right of way by plaintiff through a tunnel of the Meredith Mining Company, near the plaintiff's claims, for the purpose of draining the claims in dispute. This paper bore date June 8th, 1858. For what purpose it was offered in evidence does not appear from the record, but probably for the purpose of showing, on the part of the plaintiff, that he had worked the claims in dispute. Defendants' counsel objected to the introduction of the paper in evidence upon the ground of irrelevancy. The Court overruled the objection, and the instrument was read in evidence.

Plaintiff then proved, for the purpose of laying the foundation for the introduction in evidence the record book of mining claims, that the original record of mining claims in that district was destroyed by fire; that plaintiff's claims were recorded in it; that after the destruction of the original records, the miners by a resolution required claims to be re-recorded; that one Clark was Recorder, and the record book in Court was in his handwriting. The plaintiff then offered the book in evidence. Defendants objected, upon the ground that it was not the original record, and was not proven to be a true copy. The objection was overruled, and the book admitted in evidence. At the close of the plaintiff's testimony, the defendant moved the Court to nonsuit plaintiff; motion was denied by the Court.

Counsel for the defendants offered in evidence a deed executed by one Ray, as Constable, to the defendant Byington, conveying the premises to Byington by virtue of a levy and sale under an execution against James M. Cobb & Co. There are no facts stated in the record showing the relevancy of this deed to the question at issue. No title was shown in Cobb & Co. at the time of levy, nor was there any offer to show title in them at any time. The plaintiff asked the Court to give to the jury, among others, the following written instruction:

"5th. If the jury believe from the evidence, that plaintiffs have a better title to the ground in dispute than defendants have, they must find for plaintiffs." This instruction was given under the objection of the defendants.

McGarrity v. Byington.

The defendants asked the Court to give to the jury, among others, the following written instructions:

"7th. If the jury believe, from the evidence, that the mining ground in dispute could have been worked by running a drain tunnel from a point below the same, and that the plaintiff, or those under whom he claims, failed to use due diligence in commencing or prosecuting such work, or if the plaintiff, or those under whom he claims, has failed to comply with any usage or custom of said mining district, in locating or working said claims, then they must find for the defendants."

"11th. If McGarrity, or his grantors, knowingly though silently, by looking on, suffered the defendants, or those under whom they claim, under a mistaken claim of title, to expend money and perform labor for the purpose of opening or working the claims in dispute, then he or they are estopped from setting up any claim against the defendants, and in such case the jury must find for the defendants."

"13th. That all efforts made and work done outside of the limits of the claims in dispute, with a bona fide intent to work the claims are justly considered as work done upon the claims, by relation and intentment."

The Court refused to give these instructions, and defendants excepted. Plaintiff had verdict and judgment, and defendants appealed to this Court.

R. H. Taylor for Appellants.

Vanclief & Stewart for Respondent.

BALDWIN, J., delivered the opinion of the Court — FIELD, J., concurring.

Ejectment for mining claims.

Many points are made by the appellants. We shall consider them very briefly: 1st. That the Court improperly refused to nonsuit plaintiff. The answer is, the grounds of the motion do not appear: therefore we cannot consider it. (10 Cal. 267.) 2d. Error in the admission of bill of sale from Day to Thomas. Clark, the witness to the bill, was out of the State. Thomas swears he saw Clark witness it, and saw Day, the grantor, sign it; true, he says, on cross-examination, that he cannot read, but recognized the paper from the contents read to him: but Lester swears, that the signature of Clark, the subscribing witness, is in his handwriting. The proof, then, identifies the paper as that which Thomas saw the grantor and subscribing witness sign. This was enough to admit it to be read. Exhibit B is proved by Lester sufficiently. It is true the witness says it was signed in his presence, "to the best of his recollection;" but this is enough. The other objection to admission of papers need not be stated. It suffices to say that the points made against their introduction are not well founded.

McGarrity v. Byington.

We do not see that Exhibit E was irrelevant; nor, if it were, that the error in admitting it was calculated to mislead the jury. Before reversing a judgment for this cause, the point should be clearly made out, even if any objection on this score be good, which does not show that the proof improperly admitted tended to or might probably unduly influence the jury. Many things are admitted in the course of a long trial which have no relation to the merits of the case, and yet it might not be proper to reverse a case because they were suffered to go in. The agreement shows an attempt by plaintiff to get possession of and work the premises in dispute on the day defendant got his title, and though not sufficient of itself to show actual possession, or a right of possession, yet shows a fact, which, in connection with other proof, tended to prove the bona fides of plaintiff's claim, or notice of it by defendant.

The record of the claim, made after the old records had been burned, was admissible, if for no other purpose, as showing that the regulations in that respect had been complied with. It may not have been competent, in this way, to prove the claim, but it was competent to prove that the claim of plaintiff had been recorded according to the rules of the vicinage.

The Court did not err in refusing to admit the deed from Ray to Byington. Ray was not shown to have anything to do with the premises or the controversy. Prima facie the deed was irrelevant. The rule in such cases is, that the counsel must explain how the testimony is admissible, or offer to connect it; otherwise there would be no limit to testimony as to quantity or kind. Not having done this, the Court had a right to reject it.

As to the instructions, the record does not show all the instructions; and it is very questionable whether we could, in such a case, consider the particular ones brought before us in review, as they may depend in a very great degree upon the rest. But we proceed to consider them. The fifth is, that if the jury believe the plaintiff has better title to the ground in dispute than the defendants, they must find for the plaintiff. It is true, in ejectment the plaintiff must recover on the strength of his own title, but here the charge must be taken in connection with the case. There was no outstanding title, and only a question of prior possession. The charge did not amount to much, but what there was of it was very harmless. It amounted to telling the jury to find for the plaintiff if they thought they ought to.

The seventh instruction was properly refused. Especially in the absence of any custom or local regulation, a right of property, once attached in a mining claim, does not depend upon mere diligence in working it. Not to work it may be a circumstance of some weight, tending to show abandonment, and this abandonment of a claim resting for validity only on possession, may be sufficient to defeat the title. But this principle is wholly different from that invoked. This is not inconsistent with the doctrine in Kimball v. Gearhart, which was the case of a ditch; in which case we held the right to depend upon the prosecution of a purpose to appropriate. The right of a mining claim vests by the taking in accordance with local rules. Nor is the other portion of the requested charge better sustained. The failure to comply with any one of the mining rules and regulations of the camp is not a forfeiture of title. It would be enough to hold the forfeiture as the result of a noncompliance with such of them as make noncompliance a cause of forfeiture.

The rule of estoppel invoked by the eleventh instruction, requested to be given, is too broadly stated. It is not the making of improvements, or expending of money on another's property, which entitles the person so expending to hold the property, or even the improvements; but it is the fraud of the owner, who silently, or otherwise, encourages the expenditure. But this fraud only exists, at the very most, where the owner knows that the other person is making the expenditures, and also knows that he makes them under the bona fide reasonable belief that he is the owner of the property. Several of these important elements of this doctrine are left out of the charge.

McGarrity v. Byington.

The thirteenth instruction asked "that all efforts made and work done outside of the limits of the claim in dispute, with a bona fide intent to work the claims, are justly considered as work done upon the claims by relation and intendment." This charge is not very clearly expressed; but the proposition cannot be maintained as stated. To have the effect attributed, the work done outside must have some direct relation to the claim, or be in reasonable proximity to it. Besides, the phrase "all efforts made outside of the claim" would include many things, such as negotiations, traveling, preparations for work, contracts and the like, which could in no sense be said to be work done on the claims. If the proposition can be maintained, that work done in the immediate neighborhood of the claims, with the intent to work them, is equivalent to working on the claims, (which we do not admit) yet it is impossible to hold that all work, of every sort, done at any distance from the claims, and efforts of every sort, so made, are equivalent to labor done on the claims, even if we could assign a definite meaning to the words "by relation and intendment," which qualify the principle.

We are asked to review the evidence, for the purpose of overruling the order refusing a new trial. We have looked at it, and find that it is conflicting. We do not interfere in such cases; and in no class of cases coming before us do we feel so much reluctance as we do in this class, to interfere with the verdict of the jury and the supervising discretion of the presiding Judge.

There is no substantial error in the verdict and judgment. The mere fact that the verdict is entitled in the name of the plaintiff and one of the defendants is immaterial. It need not have been entitled at all.

The judgment is affirmed.

Elizabeth Deck v. Gerke.

ELIZABETH DECK et al. v. GERKE, ADMINISTRATOR, *et al.

The jurisdiction of the Probate Court over testamentary and probate matters, is not exclusive. Most of its general powers belong peculiarly and originally to the Court of Chancery, which still retains its jurisdiction.

Under former decisions of this Court, the District Courts, as Courts of Chancery, have assumed jurisdiction over probate matters, and as, probably, rights have vested under their decrees, and the principle asserted is more convenient in practice, it is not permissible now to question the jurisdiction.

The District Court may take jurisdiction of the settlement of an estate, when there are peculiar circumstances of embarrassment to its administration, and when the assuming jurisdiction would prevent waste, delay and expense, and thus conclude, by one action and decree, a protracted and vexatious litigation.

APPEAL from the Twelfth District, County of San Francisco.

The facts, as stated in the opinion of the Court, are as follows:

The appellants filed this bill against the respondents in the District Court of the Twelfth District. They claim to be the heirs and distributees of one Auguste Deck, who died in this State, leaving a large real and personal estate. The defendant, Gerke, was the administrator of the estate, and took possession of the personal property and of the realty. It is charged that he has not settled his accounts, and that he is largely liable on account of his administration. One of the purposes of the bill is to obtain a settlement of this account, and a decree of distribution. The bill charges that Gerke was removed from the administration of the estate by the Probate Court, and that one Samuel Flower was appointed in his place; that Gerke appealed from the order to the Supreme Court, where the order was reversed in part, but not in respect to this subject of removal, and that Gerke claims to be in office; that Robert C. Rogers succeeded Flower as general administrator, and, without further authority, has seized upon a portion of the assets of the estate. The bill further charges that a certain woman, who claims to have been the wife of Deck, sets up a claim to the estate, and that her claim is unfounded; and that she also claims that her infant child is the child of Deck, and entitled, as heir, to the estate, but that the claim is unfounded. The bill prays a settlement of the estate, distribution, and the appointment of a receiver. A general demurrer was interposed by Gerke, which assails the jurisdiction of the District Court; which demurrer was sustained. This appeal raises the question whether, upon these facts, the District Court has jurisdiction.

Heydenfeldt for Appellants.

It is insisted that the District Court, as a Court of Equity, has jurisdiction in this case.

1st. On the ground of fraud and implication in the administration of the estate.

2d. On the ground of the right to decree distribution.

3d. To make the various administrators account.

4th. For the security of the estate by appointing a receiver.

5th. In order to determine a disputed succession to the estate. Mathews v. Newby, 1 Vernon, 133; Howard v. Howard, Ib. 134; Buel v. Atler, 2 Vernon, 37; Bissel v. Axtel, Ib. 47; Clarke v. Perry, 5 Cal. 58; Sanford v. Head, Ib. 297; Chevy et al. v. Belcher, 5 Stew. 133; 1 Story's Equity, sec. 530.

Daniel Rogers for Respondent Robert C. Rogers.

1st. The District Court had no jurisdiction.

The jurisdiction of a Court of Equity in matters pertaining to the administration of estates, is essentially a concurrent jurisdiction, and is based upon the grounds of a constructive trust, and that the remedy at law is not plain, ample and complete.

By an examination of all the cases where the extraordinary powers of a Court of Equity have been invoked in matters pertaining to the administration of estates, it will be found that they proceed upon the ground that the proceedings are vitiated by fraud, or that the Spiritual or Probate Courts, by reason of their limited powers, could not afford the relief demanded.

In cases of distribution, involving as they did, the discovery and ascertainment of debts, the taking of accounts, the marshaling of assets, legal and equitable, and the compulsory payment of debts, it was found that the powers of the Spiritual Courts were defective and lame, and hence the necessity of the interposition of a Court of Equity.

These Courts were better adapted to settle the various questions arising between creditors, legatees and the representatives of estates, on account of the general and unlimited powers which they possessed, and also by reason of the jurisdiction of the Spiritual Courts being so prescribed.

Because, 1st. The complainants have a complete remedy in another tribunal.

Courts of Equity will not assume jurisdiction, where the parties have in another tribunal a plain, ample, adequate and complete remedy.

By our judicial system, all matters pertaining to the administration of estates, are invested in the Probate Court.

It is not pretended that in all such matters, that this Court has original and exclusive jurisdiction, but a concurrent jurisdiction with the Courts of Equity.

The Probate Court is a creature of the Constitution, and is essentially a Court of Chancery. In its practice, forms, and general modes of relief, it is similar to that of the Courts of Equity.

The Probate Court has been designated as a Court of inferior and limited jurisdiction. This is true, by reason of its powers being derivative, for it exercises only those which are conferred upon it by express and implied legislation. It is also a Court of limited jurisdiction, on account of the subjects of its jurisdiction, because they are particularly defined by legislative enactment.

But within its peculiar orbit, the jurisdiction of the Probate Court is extensive, and its remedies plain, ample and complete, and to a certain extent, the jurisdiction is original.

By statutory enactment, the Probate Court is invested with extensive and peculiar powers, and the remedy which the complainants seek can be attained in this tribunal.

BALDWIN, J., delivered the opinion of the Court — FIELD, J., concurring.

Apart from the previous decisions of this Court, it might be questioned whether the Probate Court, under our Constitution, did not possess an exclusive jurisdiction over testamentary and probate matters. (Blanton v. King, 2 How. Miss. 856; Carmichel v. Browder, 3 How.

Elizabeth Deck v. Gerke.

Miss. R. 252; Farves v. Graves, 4 S. & M. 707.) But this Court has recognized a different rule. In Clark v. Perry, (5 Cal. 60) it was held: "The Probate Court is a Court of special and limited jurisdiction. Most of its general powers belong peculiarly and originally to the Court of Chancery, which still retains all its jurisdiction. Where, therefore, a bill is filed in Chancery against an administrator, to compel him to account, by one who has not been an actual party to a proceeding or settlement in the Probate Court, he may totally disregard such proceeding or settlement; and although the settlement in the Probate Court is a final settlement, the complainant, who was no party to it, may treat it as a nullity, and proceed to invoke the equitable powers of the District Court, and compel the administrator to a full account." And in Sanford v. Head, (5 Cal. 298) the same doctrine was reaffirmed in emphatic terms. The ground upon which equity took jurisdiction in England in such cases was, that the Spiritual Courts were not able, from their Constitution, to afford adequate and complete relief. (1 Story's Eq. Jur., sec. 530 et seq.) Though much of the reason of this rule is removed in most of the States of the Union where Probate Courts exist, yet the power of the Chancery Court to interpose for the settlement of accounts, and the enforcement of trusts of this sort, is maintained. Under the decisions of this Court, Chancery has assumed jurisdiction over such subjects, and as, probably, rights have vested under their decrees, and the principle asserted is more convenient in practice, we think it is not permissible now to question the jurisdiction. This case is peculiarly fitted for the exercise of this equitable power; for the estate seems to be in confusion, and the matters connected with its settlement complicated, requiring from the Probate Court, and probably afterwards from other Courts, various expensive and tedious proceedings; whereas, all these questions may be determined in a single action, and this protracted and expensive litigation brought to a termination within a reasonable period. The Court can direct or decide the appropriate issues, refer the various accounts, and make the proper decree of settlement or distribution. The fact that there is a suit now pending between the alleged widow and the heirs, is no bar; for this proceeding, embracing the whole subject touching the estate, involves also, as a part of it,

Stoddart v. Van Dyke.

this litigation; besides, it does not appear by the bill, that the parties to this bill are the same as in that case. Nor is the objection well taken that these matters, being before the Probate Court, and that Court having concurrent jurisdiction, Chancery will not interpose. The entire controversy, and all these parties, are not charged to be before the Probate Court; and if they were, in different aspects and in several portions of the subject, yet this seems to us to be the best mode of solving and settling the whole controversy; and, perhaps, on this ground alone, and to prevent multiplicity of suits, Chancery, having control of the general subject, the jurisdiction of that forum could be maintained.

It is not necessary to hold, nor do we hold, that Chancery has jurisdiction to open an account or other matter settled by the Probate Court, except under peculiar equitable circumstances; nor do we decide that the District Court may withdraw from the Probate Court, under ordinary circumstances, the settlement of an account, or the power of distributing an estate; but, limiting ourselves to the case before us, we hold that the District Courts may take jurisdiction of the settlement of an estate, or of a trust of this sort, when there are peculiar circumstances of embarrassment to its administration, and when the assuming of jurisdiction would prevent great delay, expense, inconvenience and waste, and thus conclude, by one action and decree, a protracted and vexatious litigation. We see no necessity for the appointment of a receiver in such case as this, as, upon the facts stated in the bill, no difficulty should exist in determining which is the rightful administrator of several claiming the office, and no complaint is made as to the sufficiency of the bonds of any one.

Judgment reversed and cause remanded for further proceedings.

TERRY, C. J., delivered the opinion of the Court — BALDWIN, J., concurring.

This was an action against defendants, as partners on a promissory note, signed Van Dyke, McDonald and Calderwood. Van Dyke and McDonald made default, and the defendant Calderwood answered, denying the partnership, and the execution of the note sued on by himself, or any person authorized for him.

A nonsuit was ordered as to Calderwood, and judgment given against the other defendants, and plaintiff appealed.

We can see no error in the judgment of nonsuit. The evidence entirely failed to show a partnership, or any authority in McDonald, by whom the note was given, to bind Calderwood by such a contract. Judgment affirmed.

THORNTON v. BORLAND.

Where a demurrer to a complaint is overruled, and an application subsequently made for leave to file an answer, the allowance of the application rests in the discretion of the Court, subject to review in case of its arbitrary or unreasonable exercise. The exercise of this power by the Court, must in a great degree depend upon the special circumstances of each case, and be so governed as to prevent delays and to promote justice.

In such case, where no application was made to the Court for leave to answer, and no meritorious defense was asserted, this Court will not reverse the judgment and open the case for another trial.

The point decided in the case of Gallagher v. Delaney, (10 Cal. R. 410) only covers that particular case.

APPEAL from the Fifth District, County of San Joaquin.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion of the Court.

Wallace & Rayle for Appellant.L. Sanders, Jr., for Respondent.

FIELD, J., delivered the opinion of the Court — BALDWIN, J., concurring.

This action is for labor and services rendered by the plaintiff at the request of defendant. The complaint is in the usual form of complaints in such cases, averring distinctly and clearly, and without unnecessary repetition, every fact essential to a perfect statement of the cause of action; the labor and services performed; their rendition at the request of the defendant; his undertaking to pay their reasonable worth; what they were thus worth, and his neglect to pay upon demand; and concludes with the usual prayer for judgment. It would seem to have been copied from the most approved precedents. Yet to this complaint — as perfect as the science of pleading could make it — the defendant demurred on the ground that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action; that it showed no sufficient consideration for the undertaking to pay; and made no demand for judgment. The Court, as a matter of course, regarded the demurrer as frivolous, and overruled it. Proof was then made of the claim of the plaintiff, and judgment rendered in his favor; and the objection made by the appellant is, that leave was not given to put in an answer. The reply to the objection is found in the statute, which provides that in overruling a demurrer to the complaint, "the Court may, upon such terms as shall be just, and upon payment of costs, allow the defendant to file an answer." (Practice Act, sec. 67, as amended in 1854.) The allowance rests in the discretion of the Court below, subject to review, of course, in case of its arbitrary or unreasonable exercise. The exercise of the power must in a great degree depend upon the special circumstances of each case, and be so governed as to prevent delays and to promote justice. The party whose demurrer is overruled, ought to be required to obtain leave to answer, to satisfy the Court that he has a substantial defense on the merits to the action. In the case at bar, nothing of the kind was done; no application for leave to answer was made, and no possession of any meritorious defense was asserted. Under these circumstances, the action of the Court below was proper, and must be affirmed.

The decision in Gallagher v. Delaney, (10 Cal. 410) does not help the appellant. That only covers the particular case; it lays down no general rule. It there appears that the complaint could be so amended as to prevent distinctly the claim of the plaintiff to the relief he sought, and we held that the Court should have granted leave to amend, upon sustaining the demurrer. Here the demurrer was overruled, and it did not appear that the defendant had any defense on the merits.

Judgment affirmed.

BORLAND v. THORNTON.

An injunction will not be sustained to stay proceedings under a judgment obtained by neglect of a party or counsel, where, if the neglect were excusable, full relief might have been had on motion in the original action.

Where an action of assumpsit was instituted in the District Court of San Joaquin county, and after the service of the summons, the defendant transmitted it and a copy of the complaint to his counsel in the City of Sacramento, with instructions to defend the action, communicating at the same time such information as he thought proper to enable his counsel to file the proper answer, and counsel thought it advisable to see defendant before filing an answer, and to prevent judgment being taken by default filed a frivolous demurrer, and wrote to other counsel at San Joaquin county, in case the demurrer was overruled to obtain time to answer, which he neglected to do, and judgment was taken against the defendant, and no application was subsequently made to the Court to open the case and grant defendant leave to answer, etc.; and the defendant subsequently filed his bill setting up these facts, and also the fact that he did not owe the debt for which the judgment was obtained, and asked for an injunction restraining the collection of such judgment, etc.: Held, That such a bill is barren of any equitable interposition of a Court of Chancery, and that no injunction should be granted to stay the collection of the judgment.

If the neglect of the defendant in the action of assumpsit, and his counsel, were excusable, he should have applied to the Court, upon proper showing, to open the case, and allow him to answer.

Equity will not entertain jurisdiction of a suit of this nature, merely on the ground that the demand may be unconscientious, and that injustice may have been done, provided it was competent for the party to have placed the matter

Borland v. Thornton.

---

before the Court in the original action, either upon issue joined, or upon motion to set aside the verdict or judgment.

When the statute speaks of notice of a motion, it means written notice, or notice in open Court, of which a minute is made by the Clerk.

Where an order granting an injunction is made ex parte, the injunction may be dissolved without notice.

A County Judge, in granting an injunction upon a bill filed in the District Court, acts as an injunction master, and is exercising a power auxiliary to the jurisdiction of the District Court. The effect of such an order is the same as if made by the District Court, and the injunction is subject to be controlled, modified or dissolved, by the District Judge, the same as if issued by his order, in the first instance.

Section 334 of the Practice Act provides that an order made out of Court, without notice to the adverse party, may be vacated or modified without notice. The provision made in section 118, that if an injunction be granted without notice, the defendant, at any time before trial, may apply, upon reasonable notice, to dissolve or modify the same, is not a substitution for the power conferred by section 334, but in addition to it.

APPEAL from the Fifth District, County of San Joaquin.

Wallace & Rayle for Appellant.

First. The Court erred in dissolving the injunction, irrespective of the merits of appellant's bill.

Section 118 of the Practice Act provides, that when an injunction has been granted without notice, the defendant may apply, upon reasonable notice, to the Judge who granted it, or the Court in which the action is brought.

In this case, the County Judge granted the injunction. The District Judge, not the Court, dissolved it, and without any legal notice. Section 118, Practice Act, provides that the defendant may, at any time before the trial, upon reasonable notice, etc., apply for the modification or dissolution of the injunction.

When notice of a motion is necessary, it shall be in writing, and given, if the Court be held in the same district, with both parties, five days before the time appointed for the hearing, otherwise ten days, with power of the Court or Judge to grant a shorter time, for good and sufficient reasons shown. See section 517, Practice Act.

An order granting a shorter time than provided by statute, is a special order, obtained upon special reasons given by the moving party.

Borland v. Thornton.

The statute, from its terms, cannot be construed to mean, that a party may give shorter notice than that fixed by statute, in the absence of a sufficient and satisfactory reason therefor.

Neither is it, upon motion of one party, the other objecting upon the grounds of insufficient notice, to dissolve an injunction, competent for the Court then to make a special order shortening the time, by which to evade the law and obviate the objections flowing from a want of legal notice.

If, then, the statute requires, in similar cases to the one at bar, that notice of at least five days must be given, notifying the opposing party of the hearing thereof, and that such notice, to be a notice in contemplation of the law, must be in writing, and that it is in this case disclosed by the record, that notice was not served five days prior to hearing the same; and that there is no notice contained in the record, nor any evidence whatever of written notice — how could the Court, without an infraction of the express provisions of the statute above referred to, dissolve the injunction? If the dissolution of the injunction by the Judge, in this case, is not in derogation of the express terms of the statute, it seems difficult for the appellant to imagine a case in which its terms could be infringed.

To contend that mere verbal notice has anything of force, legal or otherwise, is an error too apparent for serious argument.

Second. The Court erred in dissolving the injunction. The reasons adduced upon the first assignment of error, are equally applicable to this.

This is a case, it is true, in which the greatest degree of diligence was not used; still, ordinary diligence at least, was used by Borland, appellant, who was defendant in the suit of Thornton v. Borland.

The provisions of our Code seem to be expressly designed to impart relief, to parties similarly circumstanced to appellant, from judgments, orders, or other proceedings taken against them through mistake, inadvertence, surprise or excusable neglect. See sec. 68, p. 175, Wood's Digest.

The spirit and intent of the law bind not to so rigid accountability as to deprive parties of interposing, for slight negligence, their just demands. When a defendant sets forth the nature of his defense under oath, disclosing wherein it is a good and valid defense, no ordinary causes should disarm him of such defense. The statute imparts to appellant no rights, but prescribes the requisites by which to avail himself of them.

Borland v. Thornton.

Can a slight deviation, then, in the matter of enforcing his rights, take away rights independent of, and existing independent from, the statute? The statute is only directory, and not peremptory.

The Court has ample discretion, under the provisions of the Code, to let in an answer after the time has elapsed for answering, in a case like this. See the case of Allen v. Ackey et al., 4 Howard's Practice Reports, page 5; Lynd v. Varsity, 3 Howard's Practice Reports, page 387; 1 Barbour's R., p. 68; 9 Barbour, p. 387.

In this case, the very judgment and order now sought to be reversed show affirmatively, that neither the appellant nor his counsel were present at the time; and it is not shown that the defendant ever asked the Court for leave to answer. I concede, a party has a right to bide his demurrer, but I think he may waive it by his conduct and acts, in this case. The bill sworn to by appellant shows that the object of the demurrer was to get time; that makes it frivolous.

I think it a maxim in law and in equity, that a party shall not be allowed to take advantage of his own wrong; and that a Court of Equity, under all circumstances, will treat his injunction bill as a waiver of his right to amend: he having at no time made application for it, and indeed it should be regarded as a release of errors, if there is one in the cause.

There is such a thing as a release by operation of law. See Bouvier's Law Dictionary, 439, under the above title, part 4, sec. 2.

FIELD, J., delivered the opinion of the Court — BALDWIN, J., concurring.

This is a suit on the equity side of the Court, to set aside a judgment recovered against the plaintiff, and to allow him to interpose a defense to the action in which the judgment was rendered. The complaint alleges, that the defendant instituted an action against the plaintiff, in San Joaquin county, in July, 1858; that summons was duly served in that county, on the fifth of August following; that the plaintiff transmitted the summons and a copy of the complaint to his counsel at Sacramento, with instructions to defend the action, communicating at the time such information as he thought sufficient to enable them to file the proper answer; that they considered it advisable to see him before answering, and, to prevent judgment by default, interposed a demurrer, and wrote to attorneys at Stockton to obtain time to answer, if the demurrer was overruled; that they saw the plaintiff as soon thereafter as his business engagements would permit, which was not, however, until the time for answering had expired; that the demurrer was overruled, and judgment taken against him, no one appearing on his behalf; and that he never employed the defendant to perform work and labor, and is not indebted to him. The complaint refers to an accompanying affidavit of one of the attorneys of the plaintiff, and to the record of the action in which the judgment was rendered. The affidavit corroborates the averments of the complaint, and states further, that the information received from their client was, that he was not indebted as alleged in the complaint in that action, or otherwise, and that they relied upon the attorneys at Stockton to attend to the demurrer, and obtain time to answer if it were overruled. The record referred to has been recently before us, in considering the appeal from the judgment. It shows that the complaint in the action was in the usual form of complaints for labor and services, drawn after the established precedents, and containing every essential averment to constitute a statement of a perfect cause of action; that a frivolous demurrer was interposed and overruled, and judgment rendered for the amount claimed, and that no application to file an answer was made, and no possession of a meritorious defense asserted by the defendant therein.

Borland v. Thornton.

Upon the complaint in the present suit, and the affidavit and record referred to, an injunction was granted by the County Judge, on the ex parte application of the plaintiff. This injunction the District Judge dissolved upon a verbal notice to the plaintiff, given the same day, against his objection of a want of due notice. From the order dissolving the injunction, the appeal is taken. A demurrer to the complaint was interposed, on the ground that the facts it states are insufficient in law or equity, to constitute a cause of action; or in other words, to the equity of the complaint. What disposition has been made of the demurrer, does not appear from the record. It is but reasonable to suppose that it has been sustained and the complaint dismissed; for a case more barren of all claim to the equitable interposition of the Court, can scarcely be conceived. We refer to this, not for the purpose of passing upon the sufficiency of the demurrer, for that is not before us, but to show that the injunction was improvidently granted, and in its dissolution no error was committed.

Borland v. Thornton.

In the first place, the complaint does not set forth any valid reason for the failure of the plaintiff to plead to the merits of the original action, in the first instance. That he was prevented by business engagements from an interview with his counsel, is without avail. That the counsel thought it advisable to see their client before answering, is equally so. He gave them information which he thought sufficient to enable them to prepare an answer, and it does not appear that he was in any respect mistaken. What that information was, the complaint does not disclose. The affidavit states it to have been that he was not indebted to the plaintiff. This was sufficient to authorize the filing of a general denial. The complaint avers that the plaintiff never employed the defendant, and the defense resting upon this position, was available under such general denial. It does not appear that he had any defense which required a special answer. The affidavit, it is true, states that it was impossible for the counsel, from the general character of the information received from their client, to interpose a proper and full defense, but it does not show how, or in what respect; and so far, therefore, as the case is presented, the impossibility asserted must be regarded as resting only in averment.

In the second place, the complaint does not set forth any reason for failing to apply to the District Court to open the judgment, and to allow the plaintiff to file an answer. If the neglect of the party and his counsel were excusable, full relief was attainable, by motion in the original action. The sixty-eighth section of the Practice Act expressly provides for relief from judgments, orders and other proceedings taken against a party through his mistake, inadvertence, surprise or excusable neglect. Equity will not entertain jurisdiction of a suit of this nature, merely on the ground that the demand may be unconscientious, and that injustice may have been done, provided it was competent for the party to have placed the matter before the Court in the original action, either upon issue joined, or upon motion to set aside the verdict or judgment.

Borland v. Thornton.

In Bateman v. Willoe, (1 Sch. & Lef. 201) the party against whom a verdict had been obtained, conceiving that he had good grounds to impeach the same, directed a motion to be made to set it aside, and filed an affidavit for that purpose, but by some mistake, notice of the motion was not given within the time required by the rules of the Court, and on that ground, without inquiring into its merits, the motion was denied. Thereupon, he filed a bill to restrain proceedings upon the verdict, showing that some of the charges upon which it was founded, were performed by the opposite party without any employment by him; that some were unreasonable, and that some had been waived in consideration of a balance paid upon an award of arbitrators, and that he was entitled to credit for several sums which had not been allowed. But Lord Redesdale, in dismissing the bill, observed that it was not sufficient to show that injustice had been done the party, but it must appear that it was done under such circumstances as to authorize the interference of equity, and said: "The inattention of parties in a Court of law, can scarcely be made a subject for the interference of a Court of Equity; there may be cases cognizable at law, and also in equity, and of which cognizance cannot be effectually taken at law, and therefore equity does sometimes interfere; as in cases of complicated accounts, where the party had not made defense, because it was impossible for him to do it effectually at law; so, where a verdict has been obtained by fraud, or where a party has possessed himself improperly of something by means of which he has an unconscientious advantage at law, which equity will either put out of the way, or restrain him from using; but, without circumstances of that kind, I do not know that equity ever does interfere to grant a trial of a matter which has already been discussed in a Court of law, a matter capable of being discussed there, and over which the Court of law had full jurisdiction."

In Smith et al. v. Lowry, (1 John. Ch. 320) the complainant was sued in action at law upon a contract to deliver a quantity of salt at a place called Portland, on the first of September, 1812, and was engaged, at the time of the trial of the action, in June, 1814, in transporting public stores from Oswego Falls to Sackett's Harbor, and could not be allowed to quit the public service to prepare for the same, and in consequence, due preparation was not made. On the trial, a verdict was recovered against him for a much larger sum than the adverse party was entitled to, but the Supreme Court refused to grant a new trial to enable him to diminish the damages. Subsequently, it was discovered that the witness produced was procured by subornation and perjury, and thereupon the complainant filed his bill for an injunction to stay proceedings on the judgment; but Chancellor Kent refused the injunction, stating, in his opinion, that the plaintiff had employed an attorney and counsel to attend to the cause, and it did not appear that any application was made on his part to the Circuit Court, to postpone the trial, and that the fraud alleged in procuring the testimony of the witness could have been sufficiently repelled and defeated by the testimony of the witnesses who resided at the time in Portland, and whose affidavits were subsequently obtained and used on the motion for the new trial.

In Barker v. Elkins et al., (1 John. Ch. 465) the complainant filed a bill for an injunction to stay proceedings on a verdict recovered by the defendants in a suit at law against him, in which he set forth that he had paid a portion of the bills upon which the verdict was obtained, and that the defendants had received the proceeds of cotton assigned to them, sufficient to pay the balance, and averred that he had been deprived of the means of obtaining legal testimony to defend the suit; but Kent, the Chancellor, said: "The plaintiff should have made his defense at law, by way of payment or set-off; and he might, perhaps, have called for a discovery in aid of his defense at law. No reason is assigned why he did not call for a discovery, or prepare and defend himself in due season. He has not stated what were the obstacles to a defense at law. A defendant cannot come here for a new trial, when no special ground of fraud or surprise is suggested, and when he neglects or omits due diligence, and without due excuse, to defend himself in his proper place. This is a fundamental doctrine in this Court. The principle has been so often declared, that it is useless to enlarge; and without resting on minor objections, the injunction cannot be retained on the merits of the case."

Borland v. Thornton.

In Dodge et al. v. Strong, (2 Johns. Ch. 231) the same Chancellor reasserted what he had on previous occasions frequently declared, that relief could not be granted in a Court of Equity, for the purpose of a new trial at law, when the party had lost his opportunity at law by his own negligence.

The cases cited exhibit much more cogent reasons for the interposition of equity than the case at bar. In all the actions, the proceedings in which were sought to be stayed, issues of fact had been joined, and meritorious defenses to the demands claimed, in whole or in part existed. Here no issue of fact was joined; a frivolous demurrer was filed, and when that was overruled, no permission to answer was requested. No one appeared for the plaintiff before the Court. The counsel engaged relied upon attorneys at a distance, who never accepted a retainer in the case, and who, from anything which appears, were not in a position to accept one. To have maintained the injunction upon the case presented, would have been against both principle and precedent.

The objection of want of due notice of the motion to dissolve, is not tenable. Verbal notice, it is true, is not such notice as the statute requires. When the statute speaks of notice, it means written notice, or notice in open Court, of which a minute is made by the Clerk. We shall consider, therefore, the order dissolving the injunction as made without notice. The order granting the injunction was made ex parte. The County Judge, in granting it, was acting as an injunction master, exercising a power auxiliary to the jurisdiction of the District Court. The effect of the order was the same as if it had been made by the District Judge. The injunction was subject to be controlled, modified or dissolved, by the District Judge, in all respects, as if issued by his order in the first instance; and section 334 of the Practice Act provides, that an order made out of Court, without notice to the adverse party, may be vacated or modified without notice. The provision made in section 118, that if an injunction be granted without notice, the defendant, at any time before trial, may apply, upon reasonable notice, to dissolve or modify the same, is not a substitution for the power conferred by section 334, but in addition to it. The two sections are taken substantially from the Code of New York, and a similar construction was given to them by the Supreme Court of that State, in Bruce v. The Delaware and Hudson Canal Company, (8 How. Prac. R. 440). In that case it was held competent for the Judge to vacate or modify an injunction order without notice, but that it was not the better practice, and should never be done, except when, from the urgency of the case, it was necessary to guard against serious loss, which sometimes might be occasioned by the delay incident to serving notice, and except, we may add, where the injunction has been improvidently granted upon a complaint disclosing no ground whatever for equitable relief, as in the present case.

Where the questions raised by the record, on appeal to this Court, have been repeatedly settled by this Court, or are decided by reference to plain elementary principles of law, the judgment of the Court below will be affirmed, with damages.

APPEAL from the Tenth District, County of Yuba.

Henry K. Mitchell for Appellant.

Rowe & Mott for Respondent.

BALDWIN, J., delivered the opinion of the Court — TERRY, C. J., concurring.

The various questions made by the record have either been repeatedly settled by this Court, or are decided by reference to plain elementary principles. There is no single point taken, which, in our judgment, justifies this appeal, and it would be a waste of time to notice the points in detail.

The judgment is affirmed, with five per cent. damages.

Farrell v. Enright.

FARRELL AND WIFE v. ENRIGHT.

At common law, an alien cannot acquire title to real estate by descent or other mere operation of law.

The seventeenth section of the first article of the Constitution of this State only removes the disability of alienage to such foreigners as are bona fide residents of the State; it leaves the right of non-resident foreigners, in respect to real property, as it exists at common law.

On the sixteenth of April, 1850, E., a resident of this State, died seised of certain real estate in the City of San Francisco. At the time of his death he left surviving him a brother, resident in the State, and a sister residing in Canada. In 1853 the sister moved to and became a resident of this State: Held, That the sister, being an alien at the time of her brother's death, did not inherit any portion of his real property. The estate vested immediately upon the death of the intestate in the resident brother, and the subsequent removal of the sister to, and residence in the State, did not change the descent of the property.

APPEAL from the Twelfth District, County of San Francisco.

This was an action brought by the plaintiffs to establish the right of the plaintiff, Bridget Farrell, as heir to a portion of the estate of Thomas Enright, deceased, and to recover the rents and profits thereof. The facts appear in the opinion of the Court.

Francis J. Lippitt for Appellant.

I. Art. I, sec. 17 of the Constitution does not prohibit non-resident foreigners from inheriting property in this State.

1. There is a legal prima facie presumption in regard to any provision in the Constitution, that it is a limitation on the power of the Legislature, rather than a restriction upon individual rights; i. e., that it is a constitutional, rather than a legislative provision. The People ex rel. Finley v. Jewett, 6 Cal. R. 291.

2. When the Constitution was framed, all aliens could inherit property here, and the policy of the new State in respect to foreigners forbade any narrowing of their privileges. The People ex rel. the Attorney General v. The Executors of Folsom, 5 Cal. R. 373.

3. An affirmative statute takes away no prior privileges. The King v. Pugh, Doug. 188.

4. The Act of April 19th, 1856, declares that all aliens shall inherit. If section 17 prohibits non-resident aliens from inheriting, this Act is unconstitutional.

Farrell v. Enright.

II. Sec. 17 of Art. I of the Constitution enabled foreigners who were or should become bona fide residents, to transmit by descent to their natural heirs whether residents or not; at least, so that they might take on becoming residents themselves.

1. The provision was intended to hold out an inducement to foreigners to settle in the State.

2. If their property could never go by descent to their nearest heirs, unless these heirs were residents of the State at the time of their death, the inducement held out would be substantially either illusory or inoperative, according to the sense in which the provision should be understood. Goodell v. Jackson, 20 J. R. 707, 708; Jackson v. Adams, 7 Wend. 369, 370.

III. An interpretation of a law which would effectually carry out its intent, will be adopted in preference to one which would virtually defeat it, where this can be done without infringing any rule of legal construction. Smith's Comm., secs. 491, 496, 497.

IV. By force of the provision in Art. I, sec. 17 of the Constitution, under the rules of the common law, the appellant, Bridget Farrell, on becoming a bona fide resident of the State, was ipso facto naturalized quoad the rights of property, and thereby enabled to inherit to her brother retrospectively.

1. The section must receive a common law interpretation. Smith's Comm. Stat. Law, sec. 534.

2. Naturalization may be either by constitutional or legislative enactment. Whole classes may be so naturalized. One may be naturalized ipso facto, by complying with a condition specified in a statute. The statute 7 Anne, naturalized all foreign protestants, (though repealed some years afterwards).

3. Whether a particular enactment confers naturalization must be determined by its language, construed in accordance with its known policy and intent.

4. The words in sec. 17, which define the rights of resident foreigners as to property, are substantially the same as the operative words which effect naturalization at common law. They therefore confer naturalization quoad the rights of property. Priest v. Cummings, 20 Wend. 353, 354.

Farrell v. Enright.

5. Naturalization is a status known to the common law, and having certain incidents belonging to it. Not one of these can be disannexed from it by a Court.

6. One of these incidents is the curing of past disabilities, thus enabling the alien to inherit as if born in a country; that is, retrospectively.

An alien cannot take by descent; he may take by devise or purchase, but he holds only at the pleasure of the crown, which may at any time divest him of an office found. 1 Cranch, 603; 7 Wend. 368; 3 Wheat. 588, 599.

Denization is by letters patent from the crown; it enables the alien not only to take by devise or purchase, but to hold what he may thus acquire, which before he could do only till office found. He may also now transmit by descent to his heirs. But denization takes effect only from the date of the patent; therefore, property acquired before that date may be taken by the office found, for denization cures no past disabilities; it has no relation back. 1 Bl. Comm. 374.

A naturalized subject inherits as if native born. 1 Bac. Abr. 198, Alien (b.); 2 Bl. 249; 1 Bl. 374, note 21.

Though the descent were cast before the naturalization, one may inherit, for the naturalization relates back to birth; it is retrospective, curing all defects. 2 Bl. 249.

A naturalized alien inherits as if born in this country. Naturalization relates back to confirm the title of a purchaser acquired during alienage. Jackson v. Beach, 1 J. Cas. 401.

7. The retrospective effect of acts of naturalization is not produced by any special words, but is deduced by the common law from the operative words, which are the same in substance with those in sec. 17, Art. I, of the Constitution. Priest v. Cummings, 20 Wend. 353, 354.

Farrell v. Enright.

---

8. It follows that the appellant, Bridget Farrell, on becoming a bona fide resident of the State, was ipso facto naturalized quoad the rights of property, and enabled to inherit to her brother.

V. The decision in Siemssen et al. v. Bofer, 6 Cal. R. 350, will not control this case.

1. The plaintiffs in that case had never become residents of the State; it therefore decided only that the Constitution prohibited property from descending to one who was still a non-resident alien.

2. The Court cannot adhere even to this decision without pronouncing the Act of April, 1856, unconstitutional.

3. So far as the language of the Court in that case may be construed as declaring that the Constitution intended to debar alien heirs from taking, even after becoming residents, it was not necessary to the decision of the case, and is therefore extrajudicial and not binding.

Crockett & Crittenden for Respondents.

The right of inheritance given by sec. 17, Art. I, Constitution, to aliens, is restricted to such as "are or may hereafter become bona fide residents of this State."

The plaintiff, Bridget, was not a resident of this State when her brother died, but on the contrary, was an alien residing in a foreign country. It is evident, therefore, that on the sixteenth of April, 1850, if she was otherwise incapable of inheriting, this clause of the Constitution did not relieve her from the disability, for the simple reason that she was not within its terms, not then being a resident of this State. If she never had removed to California, but had continued up to this present time to reside in Canada, will any one maintain that she could have inherited this estate, either at common law or by virtue of the above cited clause of the Constitution?

The common law was adopted in this State on the 13th of April, 1850, three days before Thomas Enright died; and we will not insult the intelligence of the Court by citing authorities to prove that under that system an alien cannot inherit.

We have already shown, that if she had continued to be a non-resident alien, the constitutional provision would not and could not by any possible construction, have embraced her case. But she removed into this State in October, 1853, about three and one-half years after the death of the intestate; and we propose to inquire what effect, if any, this produced upon her rights.

Farrell v. Wright.

We think it manifest that it produced none whatever. When the death occurred, the estate is instantly vested in the defendant, who was then a resident of this State, and was next of kin to the deceased; or, if the defendant was not capable of inheriting the property escheated, the title rested in some one, or escheated to the State, and did not remain in abeyance and without an owner. Having once vested and become perfect, it could not be divested and the course of the descent changed by the subsequent removal of the plaintiffs into this State.

The right to inherit depends upon the existing state of the allegiance at the time of descent cast. 3 Hill, 79.

"If the issue of a person dying intestate are aliens, they are not his heirs, and the estate goes to the next of kin who are citizens." Hardy v. De Lion, 5 Texas R. 211; 3 Hill, 79.

In analogy to this principle, it has been decided, that the naturalization of a femme covert does not retroact so as to entitle her to dower in lands acquired by her husband and conveyed by him before she was naturalized. Priest v. Cumming, 16 Wend. 616; 20 Ib. 338.

Naturalization does not retrospectively confirm a title claimed by descent. Vaux v. Nesbit, McCord R. 370.

In Kentucky, by a statute passed in 1800, it was provided that "any alien other than alien enemies, who shall have actually resided in this commonwealth two years, shall, during the continuance of his residence therein, after the said period, be enabled to hold, receive and pass any right, title or interest to any lands or other estate, in the same manner, and under the same regulations as the citizens of this State may lawfully do." Under this statute it was held that an alien heir cannot take, unless he had resided in the State two years prior to the death of the intestate. Trustees, &c. v. Gray, 1 Little's R. 149.

This case is strongly in point, and we think in fact is decisive of the case at bar. A subsequent residence could not retroact, so as to bring the party within the statute. It required a residence prior to the death, so that at the time of descent cast, the party was capable of inheriting.

Farrell v. Enright.

---

FIELD, J., delivered the opinion of the Court — TERRY, C. J., concurring.

The determination of the appeal in this case turns upon the construction of the seventeenth section of the first article of the Constitution, which provides that, "foreigners who are, or may hereafter become bona fide residents of this State, shall enjoy the same rights in respect to the possession, enjoyment and inheritance of property as native born citizens." The material facts, as admitted by the demurrer, are briefly these: On the sixteenth of April, 1850, Thomas Enright died at San José, intestate, being at the time seized of certain real estate situated in the City of San Francisco. The deceased was a resident of California at the time of his death, and had been for some years previously. He left surviving him a brother, the defendant, and a sister, Bridget, one of the plaintiffs. The brother was a resident of the State, but the sister and her husband, the plaintiffs in this action, were both aliens, residing in Canada. The deceased left surviving him neither wife, or descendant, or parent, and no brother but the defendant, and no sister but the plaintiff, Bridget. Letters of administration were taken out upon the estate of the deceased, and by proceedings had in the Probate Court, the real estate was sold and conveyed in June, 1851, to one Duncan, who, in July following, conveyed the same to the defendant. Of this real estate the property in controversy is a part, and ever since the death of the intestate the defendant has been in its possession and in the enjoyment of its rents and profits. The plaintiffs removed to and became residents of California in October, 1853, and brought the present action to establish the right of the sister to one undivided half of the property and of its rents, as co-heir with her resident brother. The Court gave judgment on the demurrer for the defendant, and the plaintiffs appealed. It is unnecessary to notice the proceedings in the Probate Court, alleged to be illegal, as from the construction we give to the provision of the Constitution, the plaintiff Bridget did not take any interest in the property as heir of the intestate.

Farrell v. Burright.

---

At the time of her brother's death, the common law had been adopted, and by its settled doctrine she could not, being an alien, acquire title to real property by descent or other mere operation of law. 2 Kent, 54; Jackson v. Lunn, 3 John. Cas. 109. There was then no statute changing this doctrine. The clause of the Constitution cited only removes the disability of alienage to such foreigners as are bona fide residents; it leaves the right of non-resident foreigners, in respect to real property, as it exists at the common law. It does not apply to the plaintiff, Bridget, as she was not, at the time of the descent cast, within its terms. Her subsequent removal to, and residence in the State, cannot avail her. The estate vested immediately upon the death of the intestate in the resident brother, the defendant. It did not remain in abeyance for the possible future residence in the State of alien relatives of the deceased. It would be impossible to estimate the degree of confusion into which numerous titles would be thrown, if alien relatives of an intestate, years after descent cast, could successfully assert claims to the real property of the deceased by simply becoming residents of the country. The language of the clause in the Constitution does not require a construction leading to this result, and it would be imputing little wisdom to its framers to ascribe to them any such intention in its adoption. We think it is too clear for argument that the subsequent residence of the plaintiff, Bridget, did not retroact so as to confer upon her any right, under the seventeenth section of article one of the Constitution, to inherit any portion of the real estate of which her deceased brother died possessed. See Orser v. Hoag, 3 Hill, 79; Priest v. Cummings, 16 Wend. 617, and 20 Wend. 338; Trustees of Louisville v. Grey, 1 Litt. 147.

Judgment affirmed.

Butler v. Collins.

BUTLER et al. v. COLLINS.

The ownership of goods is not changed when the claim to such ownership is based on a fraudulent contract.

Where the defendant, intending to deceive the plaintiff, got from him a bill of sale for goods under the representation that it was only to serve as a temporary security for the compliance by the plaintiff to furnish certain securities on previous indebtedness, and at this time intended to refuse to receive such security, or give plaintiff the advantage of such new contract, the possession of such goods thus obtained was fraudulent, and the bill of sale is void.

It is as much a trespass to take possession of goods under such circumstances, as it is to take possession of goods without color of contract. It is the using the form of a contract as a covering for the wrongful taking of another's property, and it divests such possession of every attribute of a sale.

In cases of fraud, subsequent acts are frequently resorted to for the purpose of showing antecedent fraud. Fraud being proven, in reference to the transaction under question, the criminal intent is necessarily a matter of inference for the jury. The dealing with property to-day by the vendor, as his property, is evidence to show the fraud committed in a sale a month ago. The subsequent acts are illustrative of the intent and character of the first.

In such case, the plaintiff cannot recover the value of the goods and also the profits which might have been made on their sale; hence, the testimony of a witness who, after examining the sale books of the plaintiff, based his calculation of the loss sustained upon an estimate of the profits (according to the previous rates) which might have been made but for the trespass, is improper, and should not have been allowed.

Long, Robinson, Beatty & Heacock for Respondents.

1st. The question of fraud was submitted to the jury on a charge which is clearly right; it is lucid and concise, and clearly directs the jury to the points to be by them considered. In such a case, the Court ought not to disturb the verdict, if there is any reasonable amount of evidence to sustain the finding of the jury. See the following authorities: Payne v. Jacobs, 1st Cal. Rep. 39; Perry v. Cochran, 1st Cal. Rep. 180; 3d Graham on New Trials, pp. 1218 and 1260.

If the bill of sale were obtained by a preconcerted fraud, it was no more than a piece of blank paper. It was void for two reasons: 1st. A bill of sale without an actual delivery, or before the delivery is completed, if obtained by fraud, may be repudiated. The party having the bill would not have had the actual possession, because of the want of complete delivery. The law would not find a constructive possession on a fraud. Nay, even if the delivery had been perfect, the fraud would avoid the whole transaction, and trespass would lie the same as though the goods had been taken by force. See the following authorities: Ash et al. v. Putnam, 1st Hill, 302; Cary et al. v. Hotailing et al., 1st Hill, 311; Olmstead et al. v. Hotailing et al., 1st Hill, 317.

Butler v. Collins.

---

If a man were to hire a horse, declaring his intention to go to Marysville, but afterwards should start directly for Stockton, and there sell the horse, surely the hirer of the horse might show the declarations of the party at the time he hired the horse — that he was going to Marysville — that he did not go there, or even start for there, but immediately went to Stockton, and there sold the horse, etc., etc.

The hiring of the horse was an innocent act, if done with the intention to ride to Marysville, but the subsequent conduct could be introduced in evidence to show his original intent. If that subsequent conduct should convince a jury that the hiring was a mere pretext, and that the intent to steal the horse existed, they would be compelled, under such a state of facts, to find the pretended bailee guilty of larceny, and no Court would set the verdict aside. See Wharton's Amer. Crim. Law (4th ed.) page 1845.

How much less testimony is required in a civil case. We refer to the following cases, in which the Courts of Chancery have decided transactions to be fraudulent on circumstantial evidence, where all the direct evidence showed the transaction to be honest: Enders and Hynes v. John and Joshua Swayne, 8th Dana, 103; Doss et al. v. Tyack et al., 14th Howard, 297.

We maintain that these cases are not stronger than the one at bar. But we have the verdict of a jury. That verdict was approved by the Judge in the Court below, who heard all the testimony, and had an opportunity of seeing the witnesses confronted with the parties in open Court. Where the question of fraud is fairly submitted to a jury, the facts are, by the Judge below, clearly submitted, which must constitute fraud. Where the jury under such circumstances finds the fraud, the Court below approves — and the examination of the witnesses has been oral and not by deposition — it appears to us that the case ought to be extremely barren of testimony tending to prove fraud, before this Court would overrule it.

Butler v. Collins.

---

2d. The next most serious question in the case is, as to whether Bradford's testimony, as to the probable profits of such a business as the plaintiffs were engaged in.

This is a case which comes within the rule as to the allowance of the opinion of experts. Bradford was a hat merchant, and an expert. That his testimony as such was properly admissible, we refer to the rule as laid down in 1st Greenleaf on Evidence, sec. 440. See, also, in regard to the evidence and rule of damages, the case of Suydam et al. v. Jenkins, 3d Sandford's Rep., pages 614 and 622.

The suit was brought by the plaintiff to recover damages of the defendant as for a trespass and conversion of goods.

In July, 1856, the defendant, Collins, sold a stock of goods for $8,000 and upwards. Butler & Co. were to pay fifty dollars per week until the price should be paid, and one per cent. per month interest. Some time afterwards, Collins made an arrangement with the Butlers, whereby they agreed to give him their notes, with sureties on a part of them, payable in instalments, from five to eleven months after date, with interest at two per cent. per month. The particulars and the explanation of this arrangement changing the terms of the original agreement, which seems to have been more favorable to the plaintiffs than the substituted agreement, are not disclosed. Before the execution of the new notes, E. J. Butler executed and delivered to Collins a bill of sale of the goods; and the respondents contend that this was done, and the paper was to serve merely as security that the Butlers would complete this arrangement by the execution of the notes with the sureties. After the execution of the bill of sale by E. J. Butler, one J. H. Monell was put in possession as receiver or as agent for Collins; the respondents remaining in the store, and selling the goods, and keeping the key — Monell keeping the key of the money drawer. This state of things continued from the twelfth of December to the eighteenth, when Collins expelled the Butlers from the store, against their will, assumed the entire ownership and dominion of the goods, and afterwards sold and delivered them to one Lamott.

Butler v. Collins.

---

The case was tried by a jury, who found for the plaintiffs.

On the trial, the main matter of fact in debate seems to have been whether this arrangement in respect to the execution of the bill of sale and the qualified possession of Collins, was or was not procured by fraud; the plaintiffs contending that if this were the case, then that the defendant was in the condition of an original trespasser.

The legal proposition above asserted is correct. The ownership of goods is not changed when the claim to such ownership is based upon a fraudulent contract. If Collins, intending to deceive Butler, got from him a bill of sale under the representation that it was only to serve as a temporary security for the compliance by the Butlers with their engagement to give him certain sureties on the previous indebtedness, and at this time intended to refuse to receive or give him the benefit of this new contract; in other words, if the possession of the goods and the bill for them were procured by falsehood and deceit, such bill of sale was void and such possession was unlawful. It would be really a procuring of the goods and bill of sale upon false pretenses. In such cases it is well settled that the party can take no benefit from his fraud. It is as much a trespass to take possession under such circumstances as without color of contract. The question is not, when the possession is fairly obtained, whether a fraudulent failure to comply with the contract — which is the consideration of such possession — avoids the sale or makes the original taking tortious; but the point is, that an original fraudulent design, characterizing and entering into the contract at its inception — which fraudulent design in this case is alleged to be to use the form of a contract as a covering for a wrongful taking of another's property — is sufficient to divest such possession of every attribute of a sale, and to put the pretended vendee in the same condition as if he had taken the goods without the pretense of sale. On reason and authority we think this proposition is law. Cary v. Hotaling (1 Hill, 311) is in point. The learned judgment of Mr. Justice Cowen in this case, relieves us of the necessity of doing more than quoting a portion of his opinion to show that the principle, as we have stated, is sustained by the highest authority: "The general doctrine is perfectly settled that fraud avoids a contract of sale." (Bristol v. Wilsmore, 1 Barn. & Cress. 514; Kelly v. Wilson, 1 Ryan & Moody, 178; Root v. French, 13 Wendell, 570.) These were all cases of buying goods with a preconceived design of not paying for them. In the first, Abbott, Ch. J., said: "It prevented the property passing." In the second, he said the same thing. And in Root v. French, Savage, Ch. J., states the same rule, but suggests a distinction as to the remedy, which was not in the case, and which, on more reflection, I am sure he would have repudiated. McCarty v. Vickery (12 John. R. 348) on certiorari from a Justice's Court, decides that trespass will not lie in such a case, and even adds that the property is changed. But no case is cited, nor any principle or analogy mentioned on which to rest either proposition. And there are numerous cases to the contrary. That the property does not pass, I add to the cases already cited the following: Allison v. Mathieu, 3 John. R. 235, 8; Van Klief v. Fleet, 15 Ib. 147, 151; Buffington v. Gerrish, 15 Mass. R. 156; Abbotts v. Barry, 5 Moore, 98, 102; Lupin v. Marie, 2 Paige, 169; Andrew v. Dieterich, 14 Wendell, 31; Mowrey v. Walsh, 8 Cowen, 238; Tamplin v. Addy, Ib. 239, note; Putnam, J., in Badger v. Phinney, 15 Mass. R. 364; Irving v. Motley, 7 Bing. 543; 5 Moore & P. 380, S. C. All these cases hold, in terms, what was asserted by Dallas, Ch. J., in Abbotts v. Barry, viz.: "The sale being effected by fraud, it is clear that a sale of this description works no change of property. The wares must be considered as remaining in the plaintiffs as the original owners." This being so, the civil remedies of the party defrauded are clear, viz., trover or replevin in the detinet or trespass, or replevin in the cepit, at his election. Trover will lie without demand and refusal, because the original taking is tortious. (Thurston v. Blanchard, 22 Pick. 18, 20.) I admit that Buffington v. Gerrish speaks nothing in favor of the remedy, as for a trespass; because, although the action was replevin, this has long since been holden in Massachusetts to lie for a mere unlawful detention. (Badger v. Phinney, 15 Mass. R. 359; Baker v. Fales, 16 Ib. 149, 150, and cases cited at the last page; Marston v. Baldwin, 17 Ib. 606.) But for the purposes of the civil remedy, however it may be with the criminal, on the distinction between bailment and sale, the cases, with the exception of McCarty v. Vickery are all one way, if we take the point as established, that neither works any change in the property of the goods. The general and absolute ownership still remains in the vendor or bailor; and not only the original interference with the property, on the part of the vendee or bailee, but any subsequent acts of ownership on his part, may be considered as an unlawful or tortious taking. (Putnam, J., in Badger v. Phinney, 15 Mass. R. 359, 364, and in Baker v. Fales, 16 Ib. 147, 150.) The general owner holds the constructive possession of personal property; and this is sufficient to maintain trespass, though the actual possession be in another. (Putnam, J., ut supra; Putnam v. Wiley, 8 John. R. 432; Thorp v. Borling, 11 Ib. 285; Aiken v. Buck, 1 Wend. 466; Root v. Chandler, 10 Ib. 110.) It is said that the owner consented to the taking; and, were that so, it would undoubtedly be a sufficient answer. But consent, in law, is more than a mere formal act of the mind. It is an act unclouded by fraud, duress, or sometimes even mistake. Putnam, J., ut supra, 15 Mass. R. 364; Poth. Obl. pt. 1, ch. 1, sec. 1, pl. 19.

Butler v. Collins.

---

This being the rule, it only remains to inquire whether the facts of this case have any application to it. We have already indicated the general history of the case. But it is necessary to show the facts more in detail.

The Court below refused to charge the jury "that the evidence does not show any such fraud as will entitle the plaintiff to recover in this action."

It seems that both parties requested the Court to charge the jury what would be fraud and the Court accordingly did instruct the jury in this respect, as follows: "That if they believed the defendant Collins had practiced fraud and deceit in getting into the store; that he had deceived plaintiffs in inducing them to execute the bill of sale, telling them it was a mere matter of form; that he had promised to take the promissory note as alleged by the plaintiffs, yet, at the time he so promised, he did not intend to keep the same, but was fraudulently intending to deceive the plaintiffs, so as to enable him to obtain the possession of the goods, and then forcibly keep possession of the same — that these acts were fraudulent." This instruction, upon the hypothesis of fact assumed, was strictly correct with the doctrine above laid down, and so amply supported by authority. If such acts as these are not in law fraudulent, then the law has a system very widely different from any code of ethics ever before promulgated among civilized men.

Butler v. Collins.

The only objection which could be urged against this instruction, and the denial of the one refused, is, that there was no evidence tending to prove the fraud; and the objection involves the questions on the motion for a new trial. In passing upon such questions, as we have had occasion so often to say, we do not sit as a jury. We do not profess to try questions of fact on appeal, after verdicts or findings. We only interfere to prevent obvious and palpable injustice arising from a glaring abuse of the discretion of the Court below in refusing to set aside a verdict when it is without any, or has a clearly insufficient foundation in the evidence. Was there, then, any evidence conducing to show that this fraud had been committed? or, if any, was that evidence so slight as to create no serious doubt of the innocence of the parties inculpated?

The proofs in cases of fraud are usually circumstantial. Frauds are a species of the crimen falsi, which, like larceny, are not done openly. They are usually shown as inferences from facts established, rather than as facts expressly proven. We will look to the character of the transaction, not for the purpose of proving this imputed fraud, but for the purpose of ascertaining whether there was any proof worth weighing of its existence.

Looking to the nature of this transaction, it is scarcely to be supposed that the Butlers would be willing to exchange the contract they had made for one greatly less advantageous to them in its terms, without some corresponding benefits or protection. The facts of the transaction forbid the idea that this was a sale of the goods in payment of the old debt; the qualified possession—the arrangements as to the times and sums in payment—the agreement as to the sureties—all show with certainty what was understood. These terms were settled on the eleventh or twelfth of December. Butler had no attorney—Collins had. One of the attorneys of Collins was to go on the note for the deferred payments. No time was reserved or limited for the giving of the note. The partial possession and bill of sale was meant to be a security with the arrangement was consummated. On the evening of the seventeenth the notes were signed. No exception to the sureties before agreed on seems to have been made or communicated to the Butlers. On that day a telegraphic dispatch is sent to Lamott at San Francisco, to come to Sacramento, and he comes, in answer to it, and buys the goods. When the notes are presented to Collins, he refuses, or declines, to look at the notes, and said, on the demand of Butler to take the notes and give up the bill of sale and store, "he would not take them." Butler then said, as the witness swears: "You agreed to take these notes and give me back the bill of sale." Collins replied, that he did not care — he had succeeded in getting the store back into his possession, and he did not intend to give it up again; and that he wanted Mr. Butler to leave the house, and not stay there any longer. Mr. Butler then went out of the store, and Mr. Lamott commenced taking down the hats, for the purpose of taking an account of stock. Mr. Collins then went over to the counter, where A. J. Butler was engaged in brushing a hat, and told him he had no business there, and ordered him to leave the house forthwith. Mr. Collins and Mr. Lamott then took possession of the whole store, and have held it ever since. This all took place about the middle of the day on the eighteenth of December.

Butler v. Collins.

---

The only objection to all this testimony, as conducing to prove the original fraud, is, that it is matter ex post facto, and though it may be proof of fraud or bad faith, yet it is not proof that the fraud was in the contract itself. In cases of fraud, the rule which admits testimony to impeach it is liberal, both in civil and criminal cases, and subsequent acts are frequently resorted to for the purpose of showing antecedent fraud. So far does the rule extend, that distinct frauds, contemporaneous in their perpetration, are admissible to prove the fraud of the transaction under investigation. But in this case, the fraud being proven in reference to this very transaction, the date of the criminal intent must necessarily be a matter of inference for the jury. Thus, the dealing with property to-day as his property, by the vendor, is evidence to show the fraud committed in a sale a month ago. The subsequent acts are illustrative of the intent and character of the first. We cannot well understand why, when a man openly violates his engagements, so as to give a false and fraudulent effect to something which he has done before, a jury may not as well date the fraudulent intent from one period as another of the transaction, or what rule of charity requires us to date his fraud at a period which would be most advantageous to the perpetrator of the fraud. If a man goes to a livery stable, and pretends to hire a horse to go to one point, and starts off to a different place, in a different direction, and there sells him, we do not see that Courts would be bound to presume that his original motive was honest, but that he changed it afterwards.

Butler v. Collins.

But, apart from this, the declaration of Collins already quoted, on the eighteenth, gives color to the transaction. It shows, if believed, a purpose reckless of moral obligation, and is a clear intimation that the only or main purpose of the arrangement with the Butlers was to get possession of the store; and certainly the other circumstances are not inconsistent with this hypothesis. But all that it is necessary to show is, that there was evidence tending to this result; and upon that question we have no sort of doubt.

The other point of appellant is better sustained. The judgment is as well for the value of the goods as for damages sustained by the taking. To prove these last, the plaintiffs introduced a witness, who, after examining the books of the plaintiffs, based his calculation of the loss they sustained upon an estimate of the profits (according to their previous rate) which might have been made but for the trespass. We think this evidence inadmissible. The plaintiff could not recover the value of the goods and also the profits which might have been made on their sale. Although the plaintiff may not have been confined to the exact value of the goods, yet the standard of recovery sought by the testimony and ruling admitted is not the correct one. There was a separate finding on the question of value, and also of the other damages. This error could not have influenced the first and general finding. The plaintiff has announced his willingness to remit these damages improperly allowed. The judgment of the Court below, therefore, will be affirmed, at the cost of the respondents, upon their filing a remittitur of all damages assessed by the jury, except the value of the goods as found.

Where a case is appealed from the District Court to the Supreme Court, and the Supreme Court reverses the judgment of the District Court, and directs the entry of a final judgment, such judgment can be entered by the Clerk of the District Court in vacation.

The act of the Clerk in entering the judgment, is a mere ministerial act.

The Court below cannot refuse to give effect to the judgment of this Court; and a judgment entered by the Clerk, in such case, is just as binding as if entered in the Supreme Court itself.

APPEAL from the Seventh District, County of Marin.

The facts appear in the opinion of the Court.

J. A. McDougall for Appellant.

O. L. Shafter for Respondents.

BALDWIN, J., delivered the opinion of the Court — TERRY, C. J., concurring.

An appeal was taken to this Court from the District Court of Marin. The Court rendered a judgment of reversal, and directed the Court to enter for the respondent a final judgment. The precise judgment was declared in specific terms, leaving no discretion in the Court below. It was in substance and effect a final judgment and disposition of the whole subject matter by this Court: "The Court only directing the lower Court to perform a specific ministerial duty of registering the decree ordered and directed by this Court." The Clerk of the Marin Court entered the judgment in vacation. A motion was made in the Court below to vacate this judgment and supersede the execution; also, for a motion for a new trial, on sundry grounds. This motion to vacate being overruled, the defendant appeals.

The grounds of appeal are: The judgment entered by the Clerk is a nullity, the Clerk having no power to make this entry in vacation. Unquestionably, if powers judicial in their nature are involved, the Court, and not the Clerk, must exercise them. But if the acts enjoined by the Court be merely ministerial in their nature, it is not perceived why the Clerk of the lower Court might not as well exercise them as the Clerk of this Court.

The Practice Act (section 144) provides that a judgment may be entered in vacation; and section 358 seems to contemplate that a judgment by the Supreme Court may be in like manner entered by the Clerk of the District Court. This question has been expressly decided by this Court in Marysville v. Buchanan, (3 Cal. 214). In that case the Court said: "When the plaintiffs filed the remittitur from this Court, they applied to the Clerk and obtained an execution for their costs. The District Court, in quashing the execution, held that the Clerk of the District Court had no power to issue an execution for costs, until by order of that Court; and further, that it was the duty of the Clerk of the Supreme Court to issue all executions and costs accruing in this Court. Both of these positions are erroneous. By statute, (Practice Act, section 358) the remittitur from this Court is transmitted to the Clerk of the Court below; by him it is attached to the judgment roll, and a minute of the judgment of this Court is entered on the docket against the original entry.

"The judgment of the Court then stands as the judgment of the District Court. If the judgment of this Court orders a new trial, the Clerk of the District Court will proceed to place the cause on the calendar; if it awards costs, he will, on application of the party in whose favor it is given, issue execution for the same. In either case he acts, not by the authority of the District Court, but of this Court. Neither the District Court nor the District Judge have any authority to prevent the immediate execution of the judgment of this Court. So far as the appeal is concerned, and the costs consequent thereon, the judgment of this Court is final. It is unnecessary to wait until term time. The rule in force in some States, that judgment cannot be entered and execution issued in vacation, has not existed in this State." See Practice Act, sections 144, 209.

This being so, the judgment ordered by this Court was just as effectual, and as conclusive of all the matters involved in the controversy, as if, instead of directing the Court below, or its Clerk, to enter the judgment directed, it had been entered by the Clerk of this Court.

We do not think that, upon the showing made by the defendants,

Wellington v. Sedgwick.

---

the judgment below ought to have been set aside, if rendered by that Court. But even if it should, and this Court passed upon the whole subject, and gave its judgment, it cannot be held that the Court below could refuse to give effect to the judgment of the Supreme Court. The matter was res adjudicata, not only as to the matters of averment and proof actually in the record, but as to those matters which might have been introduced. It is precisely as if, instead of ordering the Court below to enter the judgment, this Court had itself entered it on its records.

The judgment of the Court below is affirmed.

WELLINGTON v. SEDGWICK.

To constitute an assignment within the insolvent law, there must be a trust in favor of the assignor or third person.

If A sells his property to B, in consideration of so much money to be paid by B to C, though the money is to be paid by or out of a sale of the goods, the contract is not void. There is no difference in such a case between paying to A, and paying to A's order or creditor.

Where the vendee of goods is to pay part of the purchase money to the creditors of his vendor, this creates no trust in the goods sold in favor of such creditors; therefore, in an action to recover such goods, the following instruction to the jury is improper: "If the jury believe from the testimony, that the agreement between Stevens & Markley, the vendors of the plaintiff, was that the plaintiff was to pay certain of the debts of his vendors out of said goods, then that such sale as against the other creditors of the vendors, is fraudulent."

Where a Sheriff, having an execution against S. & M., levied it upon certain goods, the property of S. & M., and placed them in the hands of W. as keeper, and subsequently the execution was quashed, and between that time and the issue and levy of a new execution, W., who still remained in possession of the goods, purchased the goods of S. & M. : Held, That such purchase is valid, and vested the property in W.

Upon the levy of the execution, the property vested in the Sheriff for certain purposes; his title was only a qualified title, which was defeated by the quashing of the execution; the title then returned to S. & M.; they could discharge the Sheriff from the duty of returning the property to them, which they did by the sale to W. The possession was changed by the levy of the first execution, by the Sheriff, and his taking and keeping the goods; so that the subsequent sale by the defendants in execution to W., was not void by force of the statute requiring possession to accompany and follow sale.

Wellington v. Sedgwick.

Where, at the time of the levy of the second execution, the goods first levied upon were mixed with others which W. had also bought of S. & M., which last goods were alleged to be liable to the execution: Held, That if they were so mixed or confounded with other goods, as that they could not be identified or distinguished, and W. failed to point out to the Sheriff, or designate the goods which were not subject to execution, the Sheriff could not be liable for levying on the whole. But the Sheriff would be bound, after the levy, on notice to him of the goods not liable, to restore them; but this notice must be specific, apprising him of, and designating, the particular goods improperly seized, and must be given previously to suit brought.

Such a question is one of fraudulent intent, to be left to the jury upon the facts, and is not one of those cases which the Court is authorized to pronounce to be fraudulent as matters of law.

APPEAL from the Fifth District, County of Tuolumne.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion of the Court.

H. P. Barber for Appellant.

There are two fatal errors in the charge of the Court.

I. This was an action of replevin brought against defendant by the vendee of certain goods and chattels, the sale being alleged fraudulent. It was proven that after the transfer the vendee had taken possession of the premises, and had purchased goods in his own name and on his own account, in San Francisco, to the amount of $5,000, which were levied on by the defendant, under an execution against the vendors of plaintiff, and in regard to which plaintiff contended that the execution could afford no possible justification, inasmuch as those goods were undoubtedly the property of plaintiff, and the execution was against one Markley. The Court charged:

"That if plaintiff did not notify and point out to the Sheriff, at the time of levy, such goods, then they were the same as any other portion of the goods sold by Markley to Wellington, the plaintiff, and plaintiff could not recover for them."

Now, in the first place, the Sheriff was directed by the execution to levy on the goods of Markley, and if he levied on the goods of Wellington, he did it at his peril, and must take the risk.

Secondly. It was immaterial whether a demand were made at the time of levy, or at any other time before suit brought.

Thirdly. The Court entirely usurped the province of the jury, in stating that such goods "were the same as any other portion of the goods sold by Markley to Wellington, and plaintiff could not recover for them."

"A peremptory direction to the jury to find in a given way, is a clear usurpation on the part of the Court, depriving them of all power and discretion. It is, in effect, deciding the issue, and finding the verdict for them." 3 Graham & W. on New Tr., p. 738 et seq.; 11 Wendell, 83; 19 Wendell, 402.

The reason applicable to such a case is very lucidly laid down in N. Y. Fire Ins. Co. v. Walden, 12 Johns. R. 512. See, also, Daniel v. Gorham, 6 Cal. R. 43.

II. The Court also charged, "That if the jury believed from the evidence that the agreement between Stevens & Markley, the vendors of the plaintiff, was, that the plaintiff was to pay certain of the debts of his vendors out of said goods, then that such sale, as against the other creditors of the vendors, is fraudulent."

Here is a charge, if possible, more erroneous than the other:

First. This charge does not include plaintiff at all, but instructs the jury that if his vendors agreed, etc. His vendors might well have so agreed, without any agreement or even knowledge on his part. We apprehend their agreement could not affect his rights.

Secondly. The charge was erroneous in point of law; it was a direct charge to the jury, that if a debtor prefer one creditor to another, the transaction is fraudulent—a doctrine opposed to all authority, and specially denied in a late case decided by this Court—Dana v. Stanford, 10 Cal. R. 269—where the Court says that it is no part of the policy of the law to inhibit the application of property "to the payment of one debt rather than another."

It was charged as absolutely fraudulent of itself; or, in other words, was a positive direction of the jury to find for defendant because the sale was fraudulent.

Even had such a sale been evidence of fraud in law, the charge would have been altogether too broad. Williams v. Cheesebrough, 4 Conn. R. 356.

Wellington v. Sedgwick.

---

Our statute contains but one conclusive evidence of fraud per se — the possession of the vendor after sale. All other circumstances must be left to the jury as evidences of fraud, but not as rendering a sale fraudulent per se.

Where the charge of the Court has a tendency to make an erroneous impression upon a jury, and mislead them in their views of the case, a new trial will be granted. Benham v. Cary, 11 Wendell, 83.

Heydenfeldt for respondent.

The first point of error assigned is clearly answered by the case of Daumier v. Gorham, 6 Cal. R. 43, and cases there cited in appellant's brief. It is there held, that the Sheriff is not a trespasser ab initio where the goods of the plaintiff are mingled with those of the defendant in execution; but that to constitute him a trespasser, the goods claimed must be specified, and a demand made for them, followed by a refusal to deliver.

This principle is the same as that applied to private persons where there is a mixture of goods by one, so that the ownership of separate parcels cannot be distinguished. It is founded upon solid reason and sound common sense.

In looking at the facts of this case in reference to this point, it will be seen, that — 1st. The goods bought in San Francisco by Wellington were not specified or pointed out to the Sheriff at the time of the levy, or at any time afterwards.

2. That they were not demanded at any time.

3. It was not shown or proved what they consisted of on the trial of this case.

4. Not even their value or approximate value was attempted to be shown.

Now, the charge asked of the Court by the plaintiff is equivalent to an admission of the fraudulent purpose of the transfer from Markley & Stevens to plaintiff. That being the case, the plaintiff could not recover the goods so transferred; and, therefore, if he could recover at all for other goods which had been mingled with them, he must have shown what they were, and their value.

2. The last remark may be very abundantly applied to the instruction given, which is relied upon as the second and only other point of error. The very instruction asked by the plaintiff, which is considered in the first point, admits the fraud of the plaintiff.

Wellington v. Sedgwick.

The record substantiates this fraud beyond any question. Not only does the evidence disclose the fraud, but it shows a state of facts which rendered the sale absolutely void per se, and left no question open for discussion. It seems that after the Sheriff levied on the goods the first time, Wellington, the plaintiff, became, in the language of the statement, his receptor for the goods; in other words, he was the Sheriff's officer to take charge and custody of the goods: thus standing in relation to them in the Sheriff's place, and being the trustee or agent of both creditor and debtor. This was on the twentieth November. Six days afterwards, to wit, the twenty-seventh of November, the plaintiff, still holding the capacity of custodian of the goods, and being in possession of them, obtains a bill of sale of them from the defendants in execution. At the next term of the Court the execution is set aside for want of a seal, and a new execution issued and placed in the hands of the Sheriff.

During all this time the goods are in Wellington's possession as Sheriff's officer; that position of trust has never been surrendered, and could not be except by a delivery back to the Sheriff. The possession of Wellington was therefore the possession of the Sheriff, and there could not be a trespass in the Sheriff in taking back what he had not parted with.

Nor could Wellington avail himself of his position as trustee to derive any benefit or advantage to himself, to the detriment of his cestuis que trust, and more especially to the detriment of the Sheriff, who had never parted with the possession of the goods, and was therefore liable to the plaintiff in execution to the extent of their value.

BALDWIN, J., delivered the opinion of the Court — TERRY, C. J., concurring.

Trespass for taking certain goods.

The defendant justified as Sheriff, claiming that he had executed against Stevens and Markley, and that these goods were, at the time of the levy, their property, or subject to the levy. The case was tried by a jury, and the errors assigned were instruction given and refused by the Court. There was proof of execution at the suit of one Rand against Stevens and Markley, levied on these goods, and that the execution was afterward set aside by the Court for irregularity. The goods on this levy were put in the hands of a receptor (or keeper). After the writ was set aside, another issued which was levied on these goods. But before the issuance of this last execution — on the twenty-seventh November — these defendants executed a bill of sale of the goods levied on, to plaintiffs. The last execution issued on the twenty-eighth of June, 1858, and was levied on the goods sold to plaintiff, and also upon certain other goods bought subsequent to the sale by the plaintiff.

Wellington v. Sedgwick.

A demand by the plaintiff was made on the Sheriff, January 2, 1858, and refused. Wellington was the receptor, and had the possession, or claimed to have the possession of the goods, at the time of his purchase, and of the levy of the last execution; and these goods were with other goods in the former place of business of Stevens and Markley — these last having been brought, as it was claimed by Wellington, of other persons since the levy of the first execution. No notice or description of these last goods, nor any designation of them, was given by Wellington at the time of the levy or before the bringing of the suit.

The first execution was set aside on the ground that there was no seal. No appeal was taken from that decision, but it appears to have been acquiesced in, and a new execution issued and levied.

The Court instructed the jury, "if the jury believe, from the testimony, that the agreement between Stevens and Markley, the vendors of the plaintiff, was, that the plaintiff was to pay certain of the debts of his vendors out of said goods, then that such sale as against the other creditors of the vendors is fraudulent." This is not the law, as was held in Stanford v. Dana, 10 Cal. 269. To constitute an assignment within the insolvent law, there must be a trust in favor of the assignor or third persons.

If A sells his property to B, in consideration of so much money to be paid by B to C, though the money is to be paid by or out of a sale of the goods, the contract is not void. There is no difference in such a case between paying to A and paying to A's order or creditor.

We do not understand the evidence to go further than that the consideration of the sale by Markley and Stevens to Wellington was that Wellington was to pay part of the purchase price to the creditors of this firm; but this created no trust in the goods assigned in favor of those creditors. Therefore this agreement, even if proved—as the instruction supposes—did not invalidate the contract. We cannot say what influence this instruction had on the verdict.

Wellington v. Sedgwick.

It is argued, that if Wellington was in possession of the goods levied on by the first execution, as receiptor for the Sheriff, he could set up no title by purchase of the defendants in execution against the Sheriff; that his possession was on a mere bailment from the Sheriff, whose title he could not dispute. Upon the quashing of the execution, he was bound to return the property to the Sheriff, that the Sheriff might deal with it according to law. That the property in the keeping of the receiptor was, in contemplation of law, in the actual hands of the Sheriff, who, on receiving the last execution, might at once have levied on it, and that there was no such change of possession as protected it within the statute from the creditors of the defendant.

We think differently. However suspicious the purchase of the receiptor under the circumstances, and however strong its tendency to prove fraud and collusion, yet the sale was not necessarily void. After and by the levy of the first execution, the property became changed; it vested in the Sheriff for certain purposes; but this was only a qualified title of the Sheriff. The defendants might sell the property subject to the process. When the execution was quashed the levy fell with it. The title would then have returned to the defendants in execution, but for their sale to Wellington. The Sheriff would have been bound to return the goods to the defendants. But this duty of the Sheriff was due to the defendants, and they could discharge the Sheriff from it. If they had been the receiptors, unquestionably they would not have been bound to return the goods to the Sheriff in order that the Sheriff might hand them back to them. Neither would their vendee. The possession was changed by the levy of the first execution by the Sheriff, and his taking and keeping the goods; so that the subsequent sale by the defendants in execution to Wellington was not void by force of the statute requiring possession to accompany and follow a sale.

It seems that these goods so sold were mixed with other goods subsequently bought by Wellington; and the Sheriff, by virtue of the last execution, levied on these subsequently acquired goods as well as those first seized.

If the goods first bought were fraudulently sold to Wellington, they were, of course, subject to the execution; and if they were so mixed or confounded with other goods, as that they could not be identified or distinguished, and Wellington failed to point out to the Sheriff, or designate the goods which were not subject to execution, the Sheriff could not be liable for levying on the whole. But the Sheriff would be bound, after the levy, on notice to him of the goods not liable, to restore them; but this notice must be specific, apprising him of and designating the particular goods improperly seized, and must be given previously to suit brought. We do not understand that the case of Daumiel v. Gorham, 6 Cal. 43, goes any farther than this.

The whole question is one of fraudulent intent, to be left to the jury upon the facts, and is not one of those cases which the Court is authorized to pronounce to be fraudulent as matters of law.

The rulings of the Court below are not in accordance with these views; and the judgment is reversed and cause remanded, that it may be retried on the principles indicated in this opinion.

HART v. GAVEN.

The Legislature had the right to provide, in the Act known as the Consolidation Act for the Government of the City and County of San Francisco, that the owners of lots in said city should keep the streets in front of their lots in repair. Where the owner of a lot neglects for three days, after notice from the Superintendent of Public Streets of said city, to repair the street in front of his lot, the Superintendent has the right to make a contract for that purpose; and an action will lie in the name of the party performing the work against the owner of the lot adjacent for the amount.

APPEAL from the County Court of the City and County of San Francisco.

Hart v. Gaven.

This was an action by the plaintiff, who was employed by the Superintendent of Public Streets of the City and County of San Francisco, to repair the street in front of the lot of defendant — he (the defendant) having neglected to do so, after notice from the Superintendent to that effect.

The action was originally commenced in a Justice's Court, and was appealed to the County Court, where the cause was tried without a jury, and a judgment rendered for plaintiff; from which the defendant appealed to this Court. The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion of the Court.

E. Cook for Appellant.

J. J. Papy & N. Holland for Respondent.

BALDWIN, J., delivered the opinion of the Court — TERRY, C. J., concurring.

The fifty-sixth section of the Consolidation Act, applicable to the City of San Francisco, passed April 19th, 1858, provides that each owner of lots fronting on streets which have been planked and graded, shall keep the same in front of his lot in repair, at his own expense; and the Superintendent of Public Streets and Highways shall require of such owner, by verbal or written notice, to make the repairs. By section fifty-seven, if such repairs are not commenced within three days, (after notice given as aforesaid) and diligently and without any interruption prosecuted to completion, the Superintendent shall employ any suitable person applying, to do the work at the expense of the tenant and owner, or occupant, at a reasonable price, to be determined by the said Superintendent.

In this case, the defendant was the owner of the property, and had notice to repair, which he declined doing, and the Superintendent made the contract to repair with the plaintiff, who did the work; and the question is as to defendant's liability for the price. Section fifty-nine provides that an action may be instituted by the contractor under these circumstances.

Though no privity of contract exists between the plaintiff and defendant, yet if the Legislature had a right to require this duty, or to lay this burden upon the owner, we suppose that the power to provide for the collection of the sum in this way cannot be disputed. There is no difference between the power to authorize a suit in the name of the Tax Collector, or the State, or county, and in the name of the contractor; the mode of enforcing this obligation being mere matter of remedy following the right.

Hart v. Gaven.

Some provision being necessary for repairing the streets, the mode by which this is done, if it be uniform and equal in its operation, must be left to legislative discretion. This duty of repairing the streets is in the nature of a public burden or tax, and we do not see that the rule adopted applying to all the streets of a municipality, is not as near an approximation to uniformity as could well be attained. Absolute justice in the operation of human laws is impossible; there is no rule, however just in its general working, which has not its exceptional instances of hardship; and especially in the results of the taxing power is this incurable infirmity of laws to secure exact and equal justice to all those upon whom they operate, apparent. No tax law could ever stand if subjected to a rigid test on the score of uniformity. All we can expect is a general equality of operation; and we think that this is secured by this Act.

Regarding this obligation as creating a tax to the extent of the needed repairs, which the Legislature had a right to impose, and the giving of the action to the contractor as merely the remedy to enforce it, we think that the judgment of the Court below on the facts was right.

If an unreasonable contract were made, or unreasonable repairs required, or advantage were taken by fraud or otherwise, the case might be different.

We decide here the precise case before us, and nothing more — the case of the liability of an owner for repairs in front of his lot on a graded and planked or paved street, in a proceeding to recover on a fair and just contract.

The cases in 9 Dana, 521, and in 19 Ohio, 418, cited by the respondent, fully sustain the principles of this case.

The judgment is affirmed.

Ziel, Bertheau & Co. v. Dukes.

ZIEL, BERTHEAU & CO. v. DUKES et al.

In an action upon a promissory note payable "on demand, after date," it is not necessary to show actual demand before bringing suit. The institution of suit is a demand.

A judgment will not be set aside, on the application of a creditor of the judgment debtor, upon the ground that the judgment was taken for more than was actually due upon the note, when it appears that a mistake of a few cents only was made in calculating the interest due upon the note.

APPEAL from the Fourth District, County of San Francisco.

This was a bill to set aside a judgment upon the ground of fraud, and for an injunction restraining the collection of the judgment.

The facts are thus stated by the Court:

"It appears that Dukes executed a note for $3,000, in favor of Jacobs, on the twentieth of October, 1857, payable on 'demand, after date.'

"Suit was commenced on this note on the nineteenth of November, and judgment taken on the first of December.

"Plaintiffs, who are judgment creditors of Dukes, seek to set aside this judgment as fraudulent. No actual fraud is shown; the objections urged by the appellant being that the judgment is fraudulent in law; because — First. The suit by Jacobs was commenced before the note was due; and, Second. Judgment was taken for more than was actually due on the note."

The Court below decreed that the judgment of Jacobs be set aside as to all over the sum of $3,000, and as to that amount the judgment stand; and the attachment issued and levied in the suit of Jacobs v. Dukes, have priority, as a lien upon the property seized, over that of the plaintiffs, as to the amount of $3,000 and costs of suit. Plaintiffs appealed to this Court.

C. V. Grey for Appellants.

I. The note on which suit was brought was not due at the time suit was brought.

II. Judgment was taken for a larger amount than was owing at the time of taking said judgment.

Ziel, Bertheau & Co. v. Dukes.

---

If either of these grounds be true, this Court has held it vitiates the judgment. See Taaffe, McCahill & Co. v. Josephson et al., 7 Cal. Rep. 352.

The judgment is taken by default.

The proposition is well settled that a default confesses nothing but what is well pleaded.

Now, what is averred in Jacobs' complaint? This, and nothing more: That Dukes, on the twenty-eighth of October, made his promissory note, whereby he promised to pay on demand, after date, the sum of $3,000, with interest.

The note mentioned is not, as will be seen, what is familiarly known as a demand note. It is payable on demand, after date.

The conclusion is, therefore, clear and irresistible, that before it could become due there must be a demand upon the maker after the day it was made and bore date. It was a note payable at a future day.

It is clear, that the parties had in contemplation at the time of making it, that it should become due in the future, and to every word of the contract between them effect must be given. Dixon v. Nuttall, 1 Crompton, Meeson & Roscoe, 307; 6 Carr. & Payne, 320.

But this Court has decided that the payee of a note has the whole of the day on which it falls due in which to pay it, and, therefore, that a suit commenced on that day is premature. Welcombe v. Dodge et al., 3 Cal. 260; McFarland et al. v. Pico et al., 8 Cal. R. 626.

But there is still another reason why this note cannot be considered as due. Were it a note by its terms payable simply on demand, it would be entitled to days of grace, for the Statute of this State passed April 2d, 1851, (Wood's Digest, p. 73) provided that days of grace shall be allowed on all except sight bills or drafts.

III. Was judgment taken by Jacobs against Dukes for a larger amount than was owing at the time of taking it?

The note produced promises to pay on demand, after date, without grace, $3,000.

That would entitle the holder to $3,000 when demanded after date; and interest, if payment was not then made, to run from the time payment was demanded: for the principle is well settled, and our law is, interest does not run on a note payable on demand, until after demand made and default of payment. The complaint was filed the nineteenth of November; it asks for, and the judgment gives, interest from the date of the note, to wit, twenty-eighth of October.

Ziel, Bertheau & Co. v. Dukes.

---

Harmon & Labatt for Respondents.

I. Notes "on demand" are due at once on the day of their date. These words are conceded to import simply that there is a subsisting debt then due. The idea that a formal demand of payment before suit is essential to complete plaintiff's right of action, and that then the maker has the whole day of demand to pay, is not sustained by any good modern authority. On the contrary, a suit is a demand, and the only demand necessary. "The demand is not parcel of the contract." Story Prom. N., sec. 29; Wenman v. Mohawk Ins. Co., 13 Wend. 268, and cases cited; 1 Monroe, 207; 13 Mass., p. 136.

II. The note being due the day after its date, October 28th, was due October 29th, and drew interest from that time.

Appellant assumes it to be settled law that interest does not run on notes "on demand," until after demand. For this doctrine he relies upon general law.

Now, although the rule is so laid down in many authorities, particularly where nothing is said about interest on the face of the note, still it is also held differently by other authorities; and the effort has been to make the rule accord with the sense of the thing, to wit, that all notes or claims should bear interest from the time they are due.

But in this State the statute has settled the law. In Wood's Cal. Dig. 551, the Court will find that ten per cent. per annum interest is allowed "for all moneys after they become due on any bond, bill, promissory note, or other instrument of writing * * * for money lent, for money due on the settlement of accounts, from the day on which the balance is ascertained, and for money received to the use of another."

Even under the English rule, a note promising to pay "£1,500 on demand, with lawful interest," drew interest from date. Weston v. Tomilson, cited in Chitty on Bills, (10 Am. ed.) 681, note (c); Roffey v. Grunwell, 2 Perry & Dav. 356.

Ziel, Bertheau & Co. v. Dukes.

---

III. The judgment in Jacobs v. Dukes is not for more than was due.

This proposition follows necessarily from the preceding one. If the money was due on the twenty-ninth of October, 1857, a calculation of interest on $3,000 from that day to December 1st, the day of entering the judgment, will give $27.50, the exact amount computed by the Clerk.

TERRY, C. J., delivered the opinion of the Court — FIELD, J., and BALDWIN, J., concurring.

Neither of the points in this case are well taken.

The note was presently due, and it was not necessary to show any actual demand to enable Jacobs to recover.

"If a note be made payable at sight, or at ten days after sight, or in ten days after notice, or on request or on demand in all these and the like cases, the note will be held valid as a promissory note, and payable at all events, although, in point of fact, the payee may die without ever having presented the note for sight, or without giving any notice to, or made any request or demand upon the maker for payment. But the law, in all cases of this sort, deems the note to admit a present debt, to be due to the payee, and payable absolutely at all events, whenever, or by whomsoever, the note is presented for payment, according to its purport. Nay, where a note is payable on demand, no other demand need be made, except by bringing a suit thereon. So, where a note does not specify any day or time of payment, it is by law deemed payable on demand, and, therefore, is construed as if it contained the words 'payable on demand' on its face." Story on Prom. Notes, sec. 29.

The second point is predicated on the fact, that by an error in computing interest, judgment was rendered for $27.50 interest, when the interest due is, by appellant's calculation, only a fraction over $26.

It does not appear whether this error was made by the Clerk, who entered the judgment, or by the plaintiff; at any rate, it is clear that it is the result of a mistake, and we presume no precedent can be found for annulling the judgment for such a cause.

Judgment affirmed.

Paige v. O'Neal.

---

PAIGE v. O'NEAL.

Instructions to the jury, which are not embodied in the statement on appeal or bill of exceptions, and are neither certified to by the Judge trying the cause, or signed by him, cannot be the subject of consideration by this Court.

A general challenge of a juror for cause, without specification of the particular grounds, is insufficient. The statute enumerates several different grounds for which such challenges may be taken, and a designation of the one upon which any particular challenge rests, is essential to its consideration by the Court. It is not sufficient to say, "I challenge the juror for cause," and then stop.

Where a jury are instructed to bring in a sealed verdict, and they retire, and after agreeing upon the verdict, seal it up and give it to the officer in charge of them — the Clerk being absent — and request him to give it to the Clerk, which is done; and after the meeting of the Court the following morning, the verdict is opened, in the presence of the jury, and read by the Clerk, without exception: Held, That this is not an error sufficient to warrant a new trial. The possession by such officer left the verdict as much in the possession of the Court itself as if it had been directly delivered to the Clerk.

Nor will it make any difference when the names of the jurors were not called and they were not asked, whether they had agreed upon their verdict? Where the parties were present and took no exception at the time; and where it is not pretended that the verdict entered differs from the one sealed up, or that the result is in any respect affected by the omission.

Errors which are immaterial, and do not affect the substantial rights of the parties, are unavailing on appeal, even when the subject of exception, much less so when they are permitted without objection.

No delivery by the vendor of personal property is necessary as against parties who are neither creditors or subsequent purchasers of such vendors.

The Statute of Frauds only requires an actual and continued change of possession as a protection against creditors and subsequent purchasers of the vendor.

Where the property seized by a Sheriff is in the possession of a stranger to the execution, it is not sufficient as a justification of the seizure, to prove the execution only; the judgment upon which it was issued should also be proved.

It is a general rule that when the possession of property is originally acquired by a tort, no demand previous to the institution of the suit for its recovery is necessary. It is only when the original possession is lawful, and the action relies upon the unlawful detention, that a demand is required.

Where the vendee of a lot of wheat released his vendor from all damages by reason of any implied warranty of the title to the wheat, which was then in litigation between the vendee and a third party, such release made the vendor a competent witness.

Nor would the non-payment of the consideration expressed in the release affect the instrument as a valid release. The obligation to pay the consideration was created by the acceptance of the release, and is not dependent upon the contingency of a recovery in the action.

Paige v. O'Neal.

---

The declarations of such vendor, made after the sale of the wheat, are not admissible for the purpose of proving that the sale was not bona fide.

Where the vendor of personal property acquired his title to the property in fraud of the creditors of his vendor, his vendee, for a valuable consideration and without notice of the original fraud, is not affected by the taint of his title. The title, although originally fraudulent, is cured by the subsequent conveyance to an innocent party.

Conveyances of real and personal property, made to hinder, delay or defraud creditors, are subject to the same defect, liable to be avoided at the suit of the creditors, but valid as between the parties, and vest a title which can be transferred perfect to a bona fide purchaser for a valuable consideration.

APPEAL from the Fifth District, County of San Joaquin.

This was an action to recover a lot of wheat alleged to have been wrongfully taken by the defendant.

The complaint prays judgment for the possession of the wheat, and also judgment for special damages occasioned by the wrongful taking and subsequent detention.

The answer of the defendant justifies the taking by virtue of a judgment and execution in favor of Samuel Fisher and against E. C. Kelty and G. C. Reynolds. Kelty & Reynolds were the original owners of the wheat, and sold the same to Alonzo McCloud, who, previous to the levy, sold the same to the plaintiff Paige. The answer alleges that the wheat at the time of seizure by the defendant was the property of Kelty & Reynolds; that Kelty & Reynolds' sale to McCloud was fraudulent, and made with the intent to defraud, hinder and delay the creditors of Kelty & Reynolds; that execution was issued upon the judgment and placed in the hands of the defendant as Sheriff of San Joaquin county, and that he seized, as such Sheriff, the wheat, then in the possession of McCloud, as the property of Kelty & Reynolds. No delivery of the wheat at the time of sale, from McCloud to plaintiff, was made. Plaintiff paid, from time to time, nearly all of the purchase money, and occasionally took away small lots of the wheat, leaving the major part in the possession of McCloud. No knowledge was traced to the plaintiff of the fraud in the sale from Kelty & Reynolds to McCloud. The wheat had been in the undisturbed possession of McCloud months previous to plaintiff's purchase.

The cause was tried by a jury. The plaintiff had verdict and judgment, and the defendant appealed.

The other facts of the case sufficiently appear in the opinion of the Court.

Gregory Yale for Appellant.

I. Irregularity of the proceedings of the Court and jury.

1st. The Court erred in overruling the defendant's challenge, for cause shown, to the jurors W. F. McKee, R. W. Stevenson and L. T. Smith.

A challenge of a juror may be reviewed on appeal. People v. Vermilyea, 7 Cowen, p. 108. This Court has reviewed challenges of jurors on appeal, thus recognizing the right so to do. People v. Reyes, 5 Cal. 347; People v. Williams, 6 Cal. 206.

A juror can be challenged for cause, for—“Having formed or expressed an unqualified opinion, or belief, as to the merits of the action.” Practice Act, sec. 162, sub. 6.

A party to a civil action is entitled to but four peremptory challenges. Practice Act, sec. 161.

2nd. The Court erred in receiving the alleged verdict of the jury, without having their names called, and asked in open court, “whether they have agreed upon their verdict,” and requiring them to declare the same.

“The Court may direct the jury to bring in a sealed verdict, at the opening of the Court, in case of an agreement during a recess, or adjournment for the day.” Extract from sec. 170 of Practice Act.

The jury did not bring in the alleged verdict; it was given to the Coroner, who gave it to the Clerk during the adjournment.

“Sec. 171. When the jury have agreed upon their verdict, they shall be conducted into the Court by the officer having them in charge. Their names shall then be called, and they shall be asked by the Court, or by the Clerk, whether they have agreed upon their verdict; and if the foreman answer in the affirmative, they shall, on being required, declare the same.” Practice Act, sec. 171.

The statutory provisions must be strictly followed. In New York, under a similar statute, it was so held. Graham's Practice, 2nd ed., pp. 316 and 317.

A party is entitled to poll the jury where a sealed verdict is brought in, unless he has expressly assented to waive the right. Jackson v. Hawks, 2 Wend., p. 619.

The defendant did not waive any of his statutory or other rights; on the contrary, we moved to set aside the verdict on this ground at the earliest possible moment.

It is difficult to conceive how a verdict can be objected to, until it is properly in Court. If our theory is correct, the verdict never was properly given in; and we have only to show that fact to set it aside.

The case of Morgan v. Hugg, 5 Cal. 409, has no application here, for the point was raised in the Court below in this action.

II. Misconduct of jury in handing verdict to Coroner.

We have already shown the duties of the jurors by reference to sections 170 and 171 of the Practice Act. Instead of giving their verdict to the Coroner, they should have delivered it to the Court, in open Court.

There is no legal verdict but a public verdict, given openly in Court. Root v. Sherwood, 6 Johns., p. 68.

An agreement that the jury may bring in a sealed verdict, does not take away from the parties the rights to a public verdict duly delivered. Id.

Until a verdict is received and recorded, the jurors may alter it. Id.; Blakely v. Sheldon, 7 Id., p. 32.

III. Excessive damages appearing to have been given under the influence of passion or prejudice.

The jury, in their alleged verdict, say: "We, the jury in the above entitled action, find for the plaintiff, for 2,320 sacks of wheat, ninety-one pounds each:

"211,120 pounds, 5 cents per pound.....$10,556

— — $13,056."

There was not any evidence introduced to show the number of pounds each sack contained, or how many pounds the wheat number of sacks would average; yet the jury presume each sack contained ninety-one pounds.

---

Paige v. O'Neal.

---

Not any evidence was introduced by the plaintiff as to his damages over and above the value of the grain; yet the jury gave the plaintiff two thousand five hundred dollars over and above what they find the value of the grain to have been.

IV. Error in law arising at the trial, and excepted to by the defendant.

"The defendant moved that plaintiff be nonsuited upon the following grounds, viz:

"1st. That the plaintiff had not shown a sale of the wheat in controversy to him.

"2nd. That the plaintiff had not shown a delivery of the wheat to him.

"3d. That the plaintiff had not averred in his complaint that a demand was made upon the defendant for wheat; and,

"4th. That the plaintiff had not proven that any demand was made upon the defendant for the wheat previous to this action," which mention was overruled.

1st. The Court erred in overruling motion for nonsuit. The evidence did not show a sale and delivery; the wheat remained in the possession of McCloud.

Was there such a sale and delivery of the wheat by McCloud to the plaintiff, as is contemplated in the Statute of Frauds? (Compiled Laws, sec. 20.) That section requires the sale to "be accompanied by an immediate delivery, and be followed by an actual and continued change of possession." Compiled Laws, p. 205, sec. 15; Stewart v. Scannell, 8 Cal., p. 80. See also, Whiting v. Stark, 8 Cal., p. 514; Vance v. Boynton, Ib., p. 554.

2nd. There was no allegation in complaint of demand made of defendant, nor any proof of one.

The demand should have been alleged and proven on the trial.

In order to charge a Sheriff, who has levied upon the property of an execution creditor, which is mixed with other property, the plaintiff must show notice and a demand of the property, and a delay or refusal to deliver. Daumiel v. Gorham, 6 Cal., p. 43.

Paige v. O'Neal.

---

Again; the statute contemplates that parties claiming property levied upon should give notice to the officer. Practice Act, sec. 218.

But the defendant was entitled to notice and demand. The plaintiff's complaint is in trover, and he seeks to recover without averring "demand and refusal." It will not be denied that a demand is a necessary allegation in a complaint in trover, and that such allegation must be proven on trial. Therefore, the Court below erred in denying defendant's motion for a nonsuit.

3d. The Court below erred in overruling the defendant's objection to the witness McCloud being sworn in chief.

The paper of pretended release of implied warranty from the plaintiff to McCloud, having been executed without consideration, as stated by McCloud, was not sufficient to make him a good witness.

4th. The Court below erred in overruling defendant's offer to show McCloud's declarations, made the last of January, 1858, as to the bona fides of the alleged sale by him to the plaintiff.

The defendant had a right to ask this question, to lay the foundation to attack the credibility of witness. Howe v. Scannell, 8 Cal., p. 325.

V. Insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict, and that the verdict is against law.

Crockett & Crittenden, Whitcomb, Pringle & Felton for Respondent.

The instructions filed by defendant clearly cannot be taken into consideration by this Court.

The defendant insists that the facts, that the jury were not called and asked if they had agreed upon their verdict, and that they gave the verdict to the Coroner to give to the Clerk instead of giving it directly to the Clerk, are fatal to the verdict.

To this point we answer:

1st. That such error, if error it be, should have been excepted to at the trial. 5 Cal., pp. 409 and 410, Morgan v. Hugg.

2nd. The irregularity complained of did not in any respect affect the substantial right of the defendant. Section 193 of the Practice Act is explicit to the effect that a new trial can only be granted for causes materially affecting the substantial rights of such parties. See

5 Cal. 409, Morgan v. Hugg, and cases there cited by counsel for respondent.

As to the Coroner's receiving the verdict from the jury before they separated, in addition to the above reasons, we would further say, that this is clearly the proper practice. The Coroner was the officer of the Court, and the only officer in the Court when the jury returned with their verdict. He was the officer to whom the jury were especially entrusted.

The second point made by appellant which we shall discuss, is the one which appears first on his brief. It is this: "The Court below erred in overruling the defendant's challenges, for causes shown, to jurors Richard Fowler, W. F. McKee, R. W. Stevenson and L. T. Smith."

The statute providing for new trials expressly requires that the cause for granting a new trial shall be one materially affecting the substantial rights of the party moving.

The defendant has refrained from showing for what cause, good or bad, these two jurors were challenged. As every presumption is in favor of the order refusing a new trial, now appealed from, and as this statement is entirely the statement of defendant, it is evident that the whole burden is on the defendant to show that he has been injured by any irregularity or error in the lower Court.

The decision of this Court in 1 Cal. 384, The People v. McCauley, covers all this branch of the case. Indeed, that case is very much stronger than this, because there the jurors objected to actually did sit upon the trial jury, and the case was a criminal case involving life.

The case cited by defendant from 5 Cal. 350, of The People of California v. Reyes & Valencia, merely goes to the point as to what questions are proper to put to the jury to ascertain whether they are or are not biased or prejudiced.

In the case in 6 Cal. 206, The People v. Williams, cited by defendant, the juror was asked if he had formed or expressed an unqualified opinion as to the guilt or innocence of the accused, and answered that he had expressed an opinion which was not qualified. He was justly held incompetent.

Paige v. O'Neal.

---

The next point made by the defendant is, that the Court below erred in overruling the motion for nonsuit.

When the plaintiff rested his case, it will be seen that no question at all had arisen as to the rights of the creditors of Kelty & Reynolds. No judgment had been proved against them. It is true, that the defendant testified that he took the goods under an execution against them; but this Court has held that in such a case the judgment also must be produced to establish the indebtedness, and that had not been done.

The question raised by the defendant, as to whether an immediate and continued change in possession, under the Statute of California, had been shown from McCloud to plaintiff, had not arisen when the motion for a nonsuit was made.

1st. Because the wheat was not in the actual or constructive possession of either Kelty or Reynolds at the time when defendant seized it.

2nd. Because an actual and continued change of possession is only necessary as against creditors and subsequent purchasers of the vendor; and this wheat was not taken by any creditor or purchaser from McCloud, the vendor to plaintiff.

3d. Because when plaintiff rested, defendant had not yet proved any judgment or debt against either Kelty or Reynolds.

The authorities therefore cited by defendant from California Reports have no application to this motion for nonsuit. They are all cases on the point as to what is an actual and continued possession as against creditors and subsequent purchasers. See cases Stewart v. Scannell, 8 Cal. 80; Vance v. Boyerton, 8 Cal. 554; Whitney v. Stark, 8 Cal. 514.

When, then, this motion for a nonsuit was made, the only question presented to the Court, was simply whether, as between the plaintiff and McCloud, a sale and delivery had been proved.

The next reason urged by the defendant, in support of the motion for a nonsuit is, that there was no demand alleged or proved by plaintiff on defendant for the wheat. In support of this singular proposition, he cites the case of Daumiel v. Gorham, 6 Cal. 43. Admitting that case to be law, it has not the least bearing on the present case. This case is just the converse of the case cited. There it is held, that the Sheriff is entitled to a demand where he has been misled, by the fact that goods were left in the possession of the judgment debtor. See 1 Cal. 160, Ledley v. Hays, Sheriff.

The next point made by defendant is, that the Court below erred in overruling the defendant's objection to the witness McCloud being sworn in chief. No authority is cited, or reason given by defendant, to show that this ruling was erroneous.

1st. The plaintiff having released McCloud from any implied warranty, the plaintiff could not afterwards either recover the money already paid by him to McCloud, or resist the judgment of the money still due to McCloud on the ground of failure of title to the wheat.

2nd. As McCloud was not a party to this suit he would not be bound by it. It appears by the testimony of McCloud, that he did not give anything for the release, nor had he paid the consideration mentioned therein. It is evident that this did not make him interested in the result of this suit. His obligation to pay the consideration money mentioned in the release, even if it existed at all, was an absolute independent obligation created by his acceptance of the release, and dependent on no contingency.

The next point made by defendant is this: The Court below erred in overruling defendant's offer to show McCloud's declarations made the last of January, A. D. 1858, on the bona fides of the alleged sale made by him to the plaintiff.

It hardly requires argument to show, that the declarations of a party as to the title of a piece of property, whether real or personal, are inadmissible after he ceases to have an interest in that title. There are no authorities cited on this point by defendant, and we imagine it would be difficult to find any. After the sale to plaintiff, McCloud was as completely a stranger to the title of this wheat as if he had never had any connection at all with it.

This Court has already decided that, "where it is apparent that in case a new trial should be granted, the verdict of the jury must be in favor of the plaintiff, a judgment in his favor will not be disturbed." Tohler v. Folsom, 1 Cal. 207; Speck v. Hoyt, 3 Cal. 413.

That a sale made to a bona fide purchaser for a valuable consideration is valid where the vendor acquired his title through fraud, has been decided by this Court, and very frequently by the Courts of the other States. Merryfield v. Batchelder, decided at the October Term, A. D. 1854, cited in Crocker's Digest, title Fraud, (4). See, also, 2 Pick. 183, Somes v. Loud, and cases there cited. See also, the opinion of Marshall, C. J., in the case of Fletcher v. Peck, 6 Cranch, 133.

FIELD, J., delivered the opinion of the Court — TERRY, C. J., concurring.

The instructions filed by the defendant cannot be the subject of consideration. They are not embodied in any statement or bill of exceptions, and are neither certified to by the Judge, or signed by him, and thus want the authentication essential to constitute any portion of the record. The case must, therefore, be determined upon the sufficiency of the errors alleged, in disallowing the challenges for cause to three of the jurors called; in the delivery by the jury of their sealed verdict to the Coroner, and their subsequent separation; in the entry of the verdict without calling the names of the jurors, and asking them whether they had agreed upon the same; in the refusal of the nonsuit; in the admission of McCloud as a witness; in the exclusion of evidence of his subsequent declarations as to the bona fides of his sale to the plaintiff, and in overruling the motion for a new trial on the ground that the evidence was insufficient to justify a verdict for the plaintiff, and that the damages assessed were excessive.

The challenges made to the jurors Fowler, McKee and Smith, were properly overruled. They were interposed in general terms for cause, without a specification of the particular grounds. The statute enumerates several different grounds for which such challenges may be taken, and a designation of the one upon which any particular challenge rests is essential to its consideration by the Court (Practice Act, sec. 162). It is not sufficient to say, "I challenge the juror for cause," and then stop — as in the present case. The ground upon which it can be sustained, if at all, must be also stated. See Graham on New Trials, Waterman's ed., 2 vol., note to page 473; Maun v. Glover, 2 Green's N. J. Rep. 195. But, aside from this consideration, none of these jurors thus challenged sat upon the trial. They were afterwards all challenged peremptorily. Two other jurors, it is true, were challenged for cause, and the challenges disallowed; but it does not appear for what cause, or at what time, nor that the parties desired to challenge peremptorily after such disallowance. The two jurors may have been called and examined before the three jurors, and the defendant may have declined to challenge them peremptorily.

The case was given to the jury in the evening, and upon retiring for deliberation, they were instructed to bring in a sealed verdict the following morning. After agreeing upon their verdict they sealed it up, and the Clerk of the Court being absent, delivered it to the Coroner, under whose charge they were at the time, and requested him to give it to the Clerk. On the same evening the Coroner gave it, sealed up as when received, to the Clerk, who opened it the following morning in Court. All the jurors were at the time in their seats, and the verdict was opened in their presence and read to them. Their names were not, however, called, and they were not asked whether they had agreed upon the verdict, and this omission and the delivery of the sealed verdict to the Coroner, constitutes the objection urged by the appellant. The answer to the objection, that the names of the jurors were not called, is ready and conclusive. No exception was taken at the time, and it is too late for the defendant to take advantage of the omission after acquiescence by his silence in the mode of proceeding. It is not pretended that the verdict entered, differs from the one sealed up, or that the result was in any respect affected by the omission. Errors which are immaterial and do not affect the substantial rights of the parties are unavailing on appeal, even when the subject of exception, much less so when they are permitted without objection. Practice Act, sec. 188.

The objection as to the delivery of the verdict to the Coroner, instead of the Clerk, is untenable. The Coroner was the officer under whose charge the jury were deliberating, the Sheriff being incapacitated by his position as a party to the suit. The possession by him left the verdict as much in the possession of the Court itself as if it had been directly delivered to the Clerk. We can perceive no valid objection to its delivery, upon the separation of the jury, to the sworn officer under whose charge they were deliberating. The authorities cited by appellant only establish the general proposition that the jury possess the right to alter their verdict, and the parties a right to poll them, at any time previous to its record. If this were true, in all instances, it would not help the case of the appellant, for it is not claimed that any desire to change the verdict was ever exhibited by the jury, or any right to poll the jury was ever insisted upon by either party. But we are not prepared to concede that the proposition is true in all instances. We are inclined to doubt whether a jury, after agreeing upon a sealed verdict and separating, can change it, except in mere matters of form. The opportunities of tampering with juries after separation are so numerous, and in important cases the temptation so great, and the ability of detection so slight, as to make it a matter of grave doubt whether sound policy does not require an adherence to the verdict as sealed, even as against a subsequent dissent of one or more of the jurors. But upon this point we refrain from expressing any decided opinion, as unnecessary to the determination of the point presented.

---

The next question arises upon the refusal of the motion for nonsuit. The action was brought to recover twenty-three hundred and twenty sacks of wheat, of the value of nine thousand three hundred and ninety-six dollars, alleged to be the property of the plaintiff, and to have been taken by the defendant and converted to his use. The defendant in his answer denied the taking and conversion of the property, and set up as a special defense the recovery of a judgment by one Fisher against Kelty & Reynolds for the sum of $11,356, the issuance of execution thereon, the levy of the same upon the wheat, and that such wheat was the property of the defendants in the execution, and was at the time in the possession of one McCloud, under a bill of sale to him by Kelty & Reynolds, executed with intent to defraud their creditors. When the motion for nonsuit was made, the plaintiff had proved a purchase of McCloud of three thousand sacks of wheat, more or less, in a certain warehouse; his taking a warehouse receipt for the same, and agreeing to pay the storage from the date of his purchase; that the wheat was sold to him all in one body, not mixed with anything else; that he paid for the wheat, at different times, over nine thousand dollars; that he had removed about seven hundred sacks, and that the balance was taken by the defendant, as Sheriff, under an execution against Kelty & Reynolds. The motion was based upon the ground that the plaintiff had not proved a sale to him of the wheat, or its delivery, or averred a demand for it in the complaint, or proved a demand for it previous to the commencement of the action.

Paige v. O'Neal.

---

The evidence offered made out a prima facie case for the plaintiff. The defendant had not, as yet, laid the foundation for the special defense set up by the introduction of the judgment against Kelty & Reynolds. The property was in the possession of McCloud, a stranger to the execution. Its seizure by the defendant, and subsequent sale had been shown. As a justification for that seizure, the execution was insufficient. The judgment upon which it was issued was also essential, and until its production, the defendant was not in a position to attack any claim of the plaintiff. The sale from McCloud to the plaintiff was sufficient without any delivery. The statute only requires an actual and continued change of possession as a protection against creditors and subsequent purchasers of the vendor. At the time the motion was made, the connection of any other person than McCloud with the wheat, as vendor, had not been disclosed, and the defendant was not acting for any creditor of his, or any purchaser from him.

It was not essential to aver a demand of the defendant of the wheat in controversy in the complaint, or to prove a demand on the trial. If the property in fact belonged to the plaintiff, and it is upon this theory the suit is brought, and to this effect the evidence tended when the plaintiff rested, the seizure by the defendant was tortious; and it is a general rule, that when the possession of property is originally acquired by a tort, no demand previous to the institution of suit for its recovery is necessary. It is only when the original possession is lawful, and the action relies upon the unlawful detention, that a demand is required. (Acker v. Campbell, 23 Wend. 371; Sedley v. Hays, 1 Cal 160.) The case of Daumiel v. Gorham, 6 Cal. 43, only decides, that where the goods of a third person are mixed with the property, or are in the apparent possession of the judgment debtor, a Sheriff who levies upon them, supposing them to belong to the defendant in execution, is not liable as a trespasser ab initio, and it is necessary to show a notice and a demand of the goods, and a refusal to deliver. In the case at bar, the officer was not misled by any apparent possession of the defendants in execution, or by any mixture of their property with that claimed by the plaintiff.

---

The objection to the competency of McCloud was untenable. The release executed, discharged him of all interest in the event of the action. He could not be subsequently held liable upon any implied warranty, or be debarred by any defect in the title of the property from a recovery of the balance due on the sale. The non-payment of the consideration did not affect the operative effect of the instrument as a valid release. The obligation to pay the consideration was created by the acceptance of the release, and was not dependent upon the contingency of a recovery in the action.

The offer to show the subsequent declarations of McCloud as to the bona fides of his sale to the plaintiff was properly overruled. Such declarations were clearly inadmissible. McCloud was then as much a stranger to the title as though he had never had any connection with the wheat, and his statements were entitled to no greater weight than mere hearsay. Declarations of the vendor, prior to sale, stand upon very different grounds. Bridge v. Eggleston, 14 Mass. 250.

The motion for a new trial, on the ground that the evidence was insufficient to justify a verdict for the plaintiff, was properly overruled. The other points made in the motion have already been considered. The testimony on the part of the defendant, embodied in the transcript, abundantly establishes the right of the plaintiff to a recovery; indeed, it warrants no other result. According to that testimony, Kelty & Reynolds were the original owners of the wheat, and in June, 1857, executed a bill of sale, and delivered possession of it to McCloud, who stored it in a warehouse, rented by him. Though this sale was void, as against the creditors of Kelty & Reynolds, in being made to the knowledge of McCloud, to prevent Fisher from reaching the property on execution, or by attachment, it was good as between Kelty & Reynolds and McCloud; and a sale by the latter to the plaintiff, for a valuable consideration, without notice of the original fraud, passed a perfect title. The plaintiff could not be affected in his purchase, though the title of his vendor was acquired by fraud. The sale to McCloud was not an absolute nullity. The title to the property passed to him, and would have remained with him as against any assertion of right by his vendors. It was subject to be defeated upon the action of their creditors; but, until such action, his power of disposition was absolute. The title originally affected with a taint became cured by the subsequent conveyance. It could be defeated only whilst it remained in him, unless the plaintiff had previous notice of the fraud rendering void the title. (Statute of Frauds, sec. 24.) To this effect is the decision of this Court in Merryfield v. Bachelder et al., rendered at the January Term, 1854, (not reported). In that case, the plaintiff brought suit to recover certain mining interests purchased by him of one Witts. The defendants set up a purchase under a judgment recovered against one Ortman, and that the conveyance by Ortman to Witts was made to defraud his creditors; but the Court said: "Whatever fraud may have entered into the original sale from Ortman to Witts, it is not shown that Merryfield was privy to it; he must, therefore, be treated as an innocent purchaser," and affirmed the judgment for the plaintiff.

Conveyances of real and personal property, made to hinder, delay or defraud creditors, are subject to the same defect, liable to be avoided at the suit of the creditors, but valid as between the parties, and vest a title which can be transferred perfect to a bona fide purchaser for a valuable consideration. In Fletcher v. Peck (6 Cranch, 133) the doctrine is thus clearly expressed by Mr. Chief Justice Marshall: "Titles which, according to every legal test, are perfect, are acquired with that confidence which is inspired by the opinion that the purchaser is safe. If there be any concealed defect, arising from the conduct of those who held the property long before he acquired it, of which he had no notice, that concealed defect cannot be set up against him. He has paid his money for a title good at law; he is innocent, whatever may be the guilt of others; and equity will not subject him to the penalties attached to that guilt. All titles would be insecure, and the intercourse between man and man would be very seriously obstructed, if this principle be overturned."

In Bean v. Smith et al., (2 Mason, 274) Mr. Justice Story says: "A conveyance to defraud purchasers, or to defraud creditors, is not

Paige v. O'Neal.

'utterly void,' as has been sometimes supposed; it conveys the estate effectually as between the parties and their representatives; and the estate may be maintained against all persons but those whom it was intended to defraud. The grantor himself cannot convey the same title to any mere volunteer, nor can he avoid his own grant in his own favor; nor can a mere stranger contest the validity of the conveyance. The estate, therefore, passes toties quoties by every subsequent conveyance, and it is good against all the world, except creditors and purchasers, in the possession of every successive grantee, even with notice of the fraud;" and after commenting upon a distinction drawn by Chancellor Kent, in the protection afforded to bona fide purchasers, without notice, when the conveyance from the original grantor was made in fraud of purchasers, and when it was made in fraud of creditors, observes: "The policy of the law generally is, to support bona fide purchasers, for a valuable consideration, in the titles acquired; and this policy is at least as ancient as Woodcock's case, in 33 Hen. 6, 14, where a conveyance from a fraudulent grantee to such a purchaser, was permitted to defeat highly meritorious and legal claims. The great object of the law is to afford certainty and repose to titles honestly acquired. It is of no public utility to destroy titles so acquired, on account of the taint of a prior secret fraud, which was unsuspected and unknown, and which, probably, no diligence could detect. If the creditor of the original grantor be cheated by holding such titles valid, the innocent purchaser would be no less cheated by holding them void. And, therefore, the common law, which leans to equity, is unwilling to visit upon innocent persons the consequences of fraud. It enables them to hold estates acquired bona fide, for a valuable consideration, purged of the anterior fraud that infected the title." See Trott et al. v. Warren, 11 Maine, 227; Jackson v. Henry, 10 John. 186; Mowrey v. Walsh, 8 Cowen, 238; Root v. French, 13 Wend. 570; Somes v. Brewer, 2 Peck, 184; Rowley v. Bigelow, 12 Pick. 308; Dexter v. Harris, 2 Mason, 531.

There is no evidence contained in the record which shows or tends to show any knowledge on the part of the plaintiff of the fraudulent character of the sale from Kelty & Reynolds to McCloud. All the parties to that transaction assured him that the sale was a valid and honest one. McCloud was in the possession of the property with the evidence of title from the original owners, and had been in such possession for months previous to the purchase, and the subsequent conduct of the plaintiff was that of a man unsuspicious of any taint resting upon the title of his vendor. He appears to have relied implicitly upon the representations of the parties. He paid, at different times, the greater portion of the contract price, and yet left the bulk of the property in the possession of McCloud. He did not even take any steps for its removal, except in parcels, as he found occasion to dispose of it.

---

The damages awarded to the plaintiff, beyond the value of the wheat, after remitting the two thousand dollars directed by the Court, do not appear excessive — certainly not to that extent to justify the reversal of the judgment.

The value of the wheat, as found by the jury, is beyond that established by the evidence. Starbuck, who places his estimate upon its value at five cents a pound, does not appear to have examined or seen it. Nye, who had examined it, placed its value at four and one-half cents per pound. The jury took the highest estimated value, and the difference between the two estimates is ten hundred and sixty-six dollars. In this amount the judgment must be reduced.

The judgment, therefore, will be affirmed at the cost of the respondent, upon his filing a remittitur of one thousand and sixty-six dollars of its amount.

Ordered accordingly.

McCAULEY v. WELLER, et al.

TERRY, C. J.—The exhibition by a Judge of partisan feeling, or the unnecessary expression of an opinion upon the justice or merits of a controversy, though exceedingly indecorous, improper and reprehensible, as calculated to throw suspicion upon the judgments of the Court, and bring the administration of justice into contempt, are not, under our statute, sufficient to authorize a change of venue on the ground that the Judge is disqualified from sitting. The law establishes a different rule for determining the qualification of Judges from that applied to jurors.

The province of a Judge is to decide such questions of law as may arise in the progress of the trial. His decisions upon these points are not final; and if erroneous, the party has his remedy by bill of exceptions and appeal. Id.

Whilst, on the other hand, the province of the jury is, to determine from the evidence the issues of fact presented by the parties; and their decision is final in all cases where there is a conflict of testimony. Id.

The action of forcible entry and detainer is a summary proceeding to recover possession of premises forcibly or unlawfully detained. The inquiry in such cases is confined to the actual peaceable possession of the plaintiff, and the unlawful or forcible ouster or detention by defendant — the object of the law being to prevent the disturbance of the public peace, by the forcible assertion of a private right. Question of title or right of possession cannot arise; a forcible entry upon the actual possession of plaintiff being proven, he would be entitled to restitution, though the fee simple, title and present right of possession is shown to be in the defendant. Id.

Where the Governor of the State, who is authorized, and it is made his duty by law, to take immediate possession of the State prison and grounds, then in the possession of a lessee of the State, goes, in company with other officers of State, upon the grounds of the prison, and demands of the person in charge the keys of the prison, which being refused, the door of the room in which the keys were, was forced by order of the Governor, and the keys taken, and thus the possession of the prison and grounds taken by the Governor in the name and on behalf of the State: Held, That such acts amounted to a forcible entry on the part of the Governor, and he is personally liable therefor. Further held, that the acts of the Governor warranted the conclusion that any attempt on the part of the lessee to resume possession of the prison, would be resisted by force. Id.

Although the State possesses the constitutional power to take private property for public purposes, by providing just compensation therefor, yet, the means of compensating the owner must be provided before the property is taken. Id.

The Act of February the twenty-sixth, 1858, under which the Governor justified the taking, made no provision for compensation, and is therefore clearly in violation of the eighth section of Article I of the Constitution of this State. Id.

FIELD, J.—The validity of the lease under which the lessee held the premises, cannot be tried in this action, nor can the lessee be deprived of the advantages resulting from the possession of the premises under the lease, by a forcible ouster under legislative enactment.

McCauley v. Weller.

Assuming the lease to have been valid — there was in the plaintiff a property of which he could not be divested for public use without just compensation. His right, so far as the land and buildings were concerned, was in no respect affected by the fact that they were designed as a place for the confinement of convicts. The purposes for which premises are leased cannot alter the nature of the leasehold interest as property. To take such property without compensation is beyond the reach of legislative power. Such compensation must be made, or a fund provided from which it can be made in advance. So strictly is this rule adhered to, that the enforcement of any statute to take such property, where the indemnity has not been provided, will be stayed by injunction. Id.

An Act of the Legislature appropriating private property, without providing compensation, is unconstitutional and void. It may not be absolutely essential that the compensation should be provided in the same Act which authorizes the seizure, but it is essential that it should be provided before the seizure can be enforced or justified. Id.

The Governor cannot rest his justification in taking the premises upon any possible forfeiture of the lease under which the plaintiff held. Such forfeiture cannot be asserted except by force of a judicial determination. The Legislature cannot take upon itself, nor the officers of government upon themselves, to adjudge what right has accrued to the State, and then proceed to enforce it, any more than a private citizen. Id.

APPEAL from the County Court of the County of Marin.

This was an action of forcible entry and unlawful detainer. The action was originally commenced in a Justice's Court, where the cause was tried by a jury, and a verdict of "not guilty" returned: upon which judgment was entered for the defendants. The plaintiff appealed therefrom to the County Court of Marin, where the cause was tried anew.

The plaintiff alleges in his complaint, that on the first of March, A. D. 1858, he was in the actual, peaceable and lawful possession of the messuage, lands, and tenements, situate in said township, and known as the "State prison" premises, at Point de San Quentin, and had been in possession thereof for a long time prior thereto.

That on the first of March, aforesaid, John B. Weller, Joseph Walkup, and Ferris Forman, with strong hand and multitude of people, and not in a peaceable manner, and without right of entry given by law, entered by force, and dispossessed him of said premises, etc., and detained the same. And that the value of the premises, from the time of entry, was not less than five thousand dollars per month.

McCanley v. Weller.

The defendant Weller, (who was then the Governor of the State) in answer to the complaint, denied the actual possession of the plaintiff, and the forcible entry. He further stated that the premises sued for belonged to the State of California, and had been kept and used by said State, through her agents, as a public prison, or penitentiary, for the confinement of persons adjudged guilty of felony.

That, according to his information, one J. M. Estill took charge of said prison in March, 1856, claiming under a contract between himself and R. M. Anderson, (then Lieutenant Governor of said State) G. W. Whitman, Controller, and Henry Bates, State Treasurer, and that plaintiff claimed to be in possession, by his agents, by virtue of an assignment of said contract to him by Estill.

That, on the first day of March, A. D. 1858, acting by authority of an Act entitled "An Act to provide for the temporary government of the State prison, and to appropriate money therefor," approved February twenty-sixth, 1858, he, without resorting to force, took possession of said premises, and held possession until the first of May, when he, Walkup and Forman, took possession, as Commissioners, under the provisions of an Act approved April twenty-fourth, 1858, and had retained the same up to that time.

The Act of February the twenty-sixth, under which the Governor acted, reads as follows:

"SECTION 1. The Governor of this State is hereby authorized and empowered, and it shall be his duty, by and through such agent or agents as he may, in his discretion, appoint, to take immediate possession of the State prison and grounds, together with all the property of the State therein situated, and to assume the custody, control, and management of the State prison convicts therein confined, or to be therein confined, and thereafter to continue the possession of the property aforesaid, and control of said convicts, until further provided by law," etc.

Walkup and Forman answered separately, denying all the allegations of the complaint, except their possession, and justifying that possession under the Act of twenty-fourth April, referred to in Weller's answer.

The defendants moved the County Court for a change of venue, on the ground of prejudice of the presiding Judge, and based their application upon the affidavits of Lieut. Governor Walkup, Col. F. Forman and W. J. Mackay.

McCauley v. Weller.

---

Walkup and Forman both testified that they did not believe the defendants could have a fair and impartial trial in that Court, (or County,) on account of the bias of the presiding Judge, R. B. Frink; that said Frink was present during the trial before Justice Clark, took a deep interest in the plaintiff's success, and was in frequent consultation with plaintiff's agent and attorneys, in regard to the cause, giving advice in reference thereto. Walkup further stated that said Frink was a material witness for the defense.

Mackay, who was not a party to the suit, also testified to the same facts stated by Walkup and Forman, and stated that said Judge was expressing himself so strongly in favor of plaintiff that bystanders, on more than one occasion, told him he was doing wrong to take so deep an interest in the case, as it would probably come before him.

The motion was overruled and defendants excepted. Plaintiff had judgment in the Court below for the restitution of the premises, and a personal judgment against John B. Weller, for the sum of twelve thousand two hundred and forty-nine dollars and ninety-three cents; and also the further sum of $282 costs. Walkup and Furman were discharged. Defendant Weller appealed to this Court.

Thompson & Williams for Appellant.

First—The order refusing a change of venue.

The first prerequisite which strikes us as all-important in the administration of justice, is, that the Judges must be free from bias and partiality, both positive and constructive.

A Judge cannot, under the law, be both arbiter and advocate in the same cause; neither should he be both arbiter and counsellor. Mankind are so agreed in this sentiment, that any departure therefrom not only shocks their sense of justice, but of propriety also.

The twenty-first section of the Practice Act declares that the Court may, on motion, change the place of trial, "when there is reason to believe that an impartial trial cannot be had therein," (the County) and "when, from any cause, the Judge is disqualified from acting in the action."

McCanley v. Weller.

---

I am inclined to think, that under either of these subdivisions of the sections quoted, this motion might have been granted. "When, from any cause, he is disqualified," says the statute.

Now, does this mean a mere statutory disqualification? or does it go further, and embrace all disabilities which would preclude or pervert the administration of justice? A common sense construction would seem to imply the latter.

It has been the constant practice in this State to grant changes of venue upon the same grounds on which this application was based. If I am wrong in my view as to the power of the Courts to grant the change for this cause, then all such changes have been illegal, because the statute (sections eighteen and nineteen of Practice Act) expressly fixes the place of trial, subject only to be changed as provided in that Act, and no Judge can hereafter make such an order without the express consent of all the parties to the action, as he cannot seek authority outside of the statute.

I cannot imagine a more unpleasant position in which to place a high-toned, honorable, and sensitive Judge, than to have such a motion as this under discussion, made, and then, by the refusal of consent thereto by the opposite party, to render him powerless to grant it. Nor can I imagine a more dangerous position for the litigant, than to drag him into a Court and compel him to submit his cause to a Judge who has already determined to pronounce against him.

Up to this point of time, I have been merely contending for the power in the Court to grant the change which we sought. If the power is proven or admitted, then it is necessary that we show by the facts that this was a proper case for the exercise of the discretion of the Court, favorable to us, and that the failure to do so was gross abuse of such discretion.

If we are able to make such showing, then it is clear that we are entitled to a reversal of the judgment upon the first assignment of error. Sloan v. Smith, 3 Cal. 410; Comminsky v. White, January Term, 1855; The People v. Lee, 5 Cal. 353.

1st. That, admitting the contract as valid, the State had a perfect right, at any time, to rescind, violate, or annul it, without the assent of the lessee or his assigns.

2d. That the title of the premises being in the State, she had a right to take possession of the same by her officers, with or without force.

3d. That the entry complained of was not forcible.

4th. That, considering the premises sued for the private property of the plaintiff for the time being, the State had a right to take the same for public purposes, by providing just compensation therefor, and that such compensation was provided.

I. It is an admitted proposition by all, that the Legislature is omnipotent, and "that its power and jurisdiction is so transcendental and absolute, that it cannot be controlled or confined, either for person or cause, within any bounds," except so far as it may be restrained by constitutional prohibitions.

That there is no constitutional prohibition applicable to this case, which would have prevented action by the Legislature, was settled by this Court in Myers v. English, 9 Cal. 341.

After an able review, both upon that and a former occasion, of the authorities cited in support of an adverse position, Justice BURNETT — C. J. TERRY concurring — concludes with this remark: "Under the view we take, we still adhere to the position stated in the former opinion. That provision of the Constitution refers to contracts between individuals. It could not refer to contracts between individuals and the State, because the State cannot be sued."

This was upon a rehearing, and consequently this opinion expresses the conviction of the Court, after great deliberation. I shall not, therefore, present authorities to sustain the decision, for it needs none, nor will I review those cited by the other side, and claimed to be repugnant to it.

For legislative precedent, I refer the Court to the past legislation in this State in reference to State prison affairs. In 1851, (Statute '51, 427) M. G. Vallejo and James M. Estell were made lessees of the prison for ten years. At the next session, Estell was constituted sole lessee (Stat. '52, 134); and again, in 1855, this Act was repealed, and the prison placed under the government and control of a Board of Directors. (Stat. '55, 292, 296.) In 1852, the Board of Commissioners made a contract with F. Vassault, (alias J. M. Estill) under the Act of May 1, '52, (Stat. '52, 132) for the erection of a State prison; and in the following year the Legislature passed an Act, (Stat. '53, 157) declaring said contract null and void; and during the same session (p. 312) instructed the Controller not to issue warrants on account of such contract, until otherwise directed. The Board of Directors of 1855, and the contracts made by them, were subsequently disposed of in the summary manner which the practice I have detailed warranted; and when Estill took this last contract, he well understood the construction which the Legislature placed upon its power to rescind the same at pleasure.

McCauley v. Weller.

---

II. The answer of the defendant Weller sets up title to the premises sued for in the State, and charges the entry to have been by virtue of a law directing it. The evidence clearly sustains the allegation of title. The plaintiff, in making out his case, proved this by the introduction of the contract, showing that he claimed under the State.

The title being in the State, I claim for her the right, by her officers or agents, to enter and take possession, at any time, without applying to the Courts, as in case of individuals; whilst the learned counsel for plaintiff holds that she should have resorted to an action of ejectment. In England, the right of the Crown to land is usually asserted in one of two ways; by inquest of office, where the evidence of title is not in the Crown, and by taking possession without action, when it is. In no event is there a resort to the action of ejectment. "The King, though the chief and head of the kingdom, may redress any injuries which he may receive from his subjects by such usual common law actions as are consistent with the royal prerogative and dignity."

"But the more effectual means of asserting the rights of the Crown, and redressing its injuries, are those which are obtained by the prerogative modes of process. Such is that by inquisition or enquest of office; which is an inquiry made by the King's officer, his sheriff, coroner, or escheator, virtute officii; or by writ sent to them for that purpose, or by commissioners specially appointed, concerning any matter that entitled the King to the possession of land or tenements, goods or chattels. This is done by a jury of no determinate number, being either twelve, or less, or more." "Stamford lays it down, that in all cases where a subject shall not have possession in deed or in law, without entry, the King will not be entitled without office found or matter of record." As, "if the King claims upon a forfeiture;" "the lands of an idiot, lunatic, etc., etc.;" "the year, day, and waste, of a felon attainted;" "or the temporalities of a Bishop, for contempt."

McCauley v. Weller.

---

"These inquests of office were devised by law as an authentic means to give the King his right by solemn matter of record; without which he in general can neither take nor part from anything." Bacon's Abridgment, vol. 8, pp. 98, 99, title Prerogative.

"But no office is necessary, if the King's title appear as matter of record." "So, if a possession in law be cast upon the King, no office is necessary, but the King may seize without it." "So, when he ought to have chattels or profits of lands for a contempt, he may seize without office. And by Statute 33 H. 8, in case of attainder for high treason, the King shall have the forfeiture instantly without inquisition of office." Same book, 100.

I cannot more forcibly state the rule which prevails in the United States, than to quote from a pamphlet prepared by that great statesman and sound jurist, Thomas Jefferson, in 1810, entitled "The Proceedings of the Government of the United States in maintaining the Public Right to the Beach of the Mississippi, adjacent to New Orleans, against the intrusion of Edward Livingston: Prepared for the use of counsel, by Thomas Jefferson."

He says: "But I believe that no nation has ever yet restrained itself in the exercise of this natural right of reseizing its own possessions, or bound up its hands in the manacles and cavils of litigation. It takes possession of its own at short hand, and gives to the private claimant a specified mode of preferring his claim. There are cases of particular circumstance, where the Sovereign, as by the English law, must institute a previous inquest; but, in general, as the present, he enters at once on what belongs to his nation. This is the law of England.

"Whenever the King's (i. e. the nation's) title appears of record, or a possession in law be cast upon him by descent, escheat, etc., he may enter without an office found; for if his title appear any way of record,

McCanley v. Weller.

it is as good as if it were found by office; and if any one enter on him, even before his entry made, he is an intruder; he cannot gain any freehold in the land, nor does he put the King to an assize, or ejectment, or take away his right of entry; for he cannot be disseized but by record. Stamford Prærogativa Regis, 56, 57; Com. Dig. Prærog., D. 71 — the substance of the authorities cited. * * *

We have before us, too, the example of many of the States, and of the General Government itself, which have never hesitated to remove, by force, the squatters and intruders on the public lands. Indeed, if the nation were put to action against every squatter, for the recovery of their lands, we should have only lawsuits, not lands, for sale. * * *

The correct doctrine is, that so long as the nation holds lands in its own possession, so long they are under the jurisdiction of no Court, but by special provision. The United States cannot be sued. The nation, by its immediate representatives, administers justice itself to all who have claims on its public property; hence the numerous petitions which occupy so much of every session of Congress, in cases which have not been confided to the Courts. But, when once they have granted the lands to individuals, then the jurisdiction of the Courts over them commences. They fall into the common mass of matter justiciable before the Courts. If the public has granted lands to B, which were the legal property of A, A may bring his action against B, and the Courts are competent to do him justice. The moment B attempts to take possession of A's lands, the writ of forcible entry, the action of trespass, or ejectment, and the chancery process, furnish him a choice of remedies. The holders of property, therefore, are safe against individuals, by the law; and they are safe against the nation by its own justice; and all the alarm which some have endeavored to excite, on this subject, has been mere ad captandum populum."

The practice of the General Government has, since a very early day, been in accordance with the views expressed by Mr. Jefferson, in the quotations above made.

On the third of March, 1807, Congress passed "an Act to prevent settlements being made on lands ceded to the United States, until authorized by law." (U. S. Statutes at Large, vol. 2, p. 445.) By the terms of this Act, the President was authorized to cause the United States Marshal, of the proper district, to remove all intruders upon ceded lands, including those who had settled or entered thereon before the cession, as well as those subsequently.

McCauley v. Weller.

---

Afterwards, in 1821, the Secretary of War having referred the question of the power of the President, under this Act, to Mr. Wirt, then Attorney General, the latter unhesitatingly announced, as his opinion, that such intruders might be removed by military force, if necessary. Opinions of the Attorney General, vol. 1, p. 471.

And again, in that year, the same officer, in answer to a communication addressed him by the Secretary of the Treasury, said: "I have no doubt that the Marshal, under the orders of the President, may remove the intruders on the lands set apart for the cultivation of the vine and olive, in Mississippi. The instructions to the Marshal must proceed from the President." Ibid., p. 475. As late as 1837, Mr. B. F. Butler, an able lawyer, and then Attorney General, gave to the President the opinion that the latter might expel, by force, if necessary, intruders upon the lands secured to the Chicasaws, east of the Mississippi. Ibid., vol. 3, p. 255.

That the State may take possession of property, without inquest of office, or a proceeding in Courts of law, when authorized by statute, is admitted in the following cases: Fire Department of New York v. Kiss, 10 Wend. 266; Fairfax's Devisee v. Hunter's Lessee, 7 Cranch, 622; Craig v. Radford, 3 Wheat. 599.

One of the reasons forming the basis of the doctrine I have been advocating, is, that the State (the Sovereign) cannot be disseized, and, therefore, cannot resort to the remedy of ejectment. Blackstone, vol. 3, p. 257, chap. 17, in discussing the methods of redressing such injuries as the Crown may receive from the subject, says: "As, therefore, the King, by his legal ubiquity, cannot be disseized, or dispossessed, of real property, which is once vested in him, he can maintain no action which supposes a dispossession of the plaintiff; such as an assize, or an ejectment."

The same doctrine has been held in this country as applicable to a State.

In The State v. Arledge and Gaither, 1 Bailey S. C. Rep. 552, Justice Johnson says: "It is very clear that in England the King cannot maintain an ejectment to recover lands, and the reason given by Blackstone is, that on account of his legal ubiquity he cannot be disseized or dispossessed. All the elementary writers hold the same doctrine; and it is even more strikingly applicable here, where the sovereign power and right are in the hands of the people themselves, who want that personal identity on which a disseizin could operate; and for the further reason that a part of it abides in the defendants themselves."

The defendant, acting as Governor of the State, took possession of the premises in question, under and by virtue of an Act of the Legislature, approved twenty-sixth February, 1858, entitled "an Act to provide for the temporary government of the State prison, and to appropriate money therefor." It not only authorized the entry, but required it to be immediate. The Legislature did not design that he should resort to the slow processes of the Courts; but, in the exercise of their sovereign power, instructed him to take possession of property, the title to which was unquestionably in the State, and to do so (borrowing Mr. Jefferson's expression) at short hand. If there is force in precedent and authority, the Legislature did not exceed its constitutional privilege and power in passing this Act, and the Executive would have been derelict in duty had he not enforced it. Salus populi, suprema lex est, is a maxim not to be ignored for trivial causes.

The Executive having acted by authority of law, and having in no way exceeded the limits of that authority, is protected from all consequences resulting therefrom. This is sustained by an abundance of authority, of which I will only cite — 7 Howard U. S. 130; 4 Term R. 794; 6 Taunton, 41; 2 B. & C. 227; 2 Johns. 286; 7 Ohio, 211, part II.

III. If the plaintiff failed upon the trial to prove actual force in the entry of the defendant, we are entitled to judgment, although every other point in the case may be with him. Wood's Digest, 467.

"To sustain the action of forcible entry, actual force, threats, or violence in the entry, or the just apprehension of violence to the person, must be shown to have existed. To constitute a forcible entry, the following rule is laid down in Tomlinson's Law Dictionary, which has been referred to in most of the Courts of the different States of the Union: 'A forcible entry is only such an entry as is made with a strong hand and unusual weapons, an unusual number of servants or attendants, or with menace of life or limb; for an entry which only amounts in law to trespass, is not within the statute.'" Frazier and Hastler v. Hanlon, 5 Cal. 157. The same view is taken in Williams v. Warren, 17 Wend. 261-264; and in Addison, 17.

McCauley v. Weller.

The whole affair was conducted in an orderly, good-humored manner, and there was neither violence nor threats of violence. None were necessary. But on the contrary, plaintiff and his agent seem to have afforded every facility to the Governor in the discharge of the duty imposed upon him by the Act; contenting themselves, as expressed in plaintiff's letter, with entering a protest.

They had ample means of resistance, if they had seen proper to resort to them; but such was not plaintiff's intention. It suited his purposes to permit the entry, at the same time saving his legal rights.

In Pennsylvania v. Waddle, Addison, 41, the Court uses this language: "If there was no force, he cannot be guilty. Words are the slightest symptoms of force. If you think it was the meaning and tendency of the words to impress on Johnson a terror of personal harm, if he should proceed to take possession — this is force. If you think their meaning was only to signify that Waddle would not give up his claim, which he thought a just one, till at legal trial it was declared unjust — this is no force."

IV. Admitting these premises to be the private property of plaintiff, still the State had the constitutional power to take it for public purposes, by providing just compensation therefor. And it is immaterial whether the compensation was provided in the Act directing the seizure of the property, or by subsequent Act.

The only difference being that the plaintiff might have enjoined the taking, until the compensation was made, or sufficiently provided. (1 Baldwin, C. C. R. 226, 227; 1 Kernan, 308, and authorities there cited.) In this last case, the Court says: "Where private property is taken for public use, it is sufficient that a certain and adequate remedy should be provided, by which the individual can obtain compensation, without any unreasonable delay."

The Legislature did, by a subsequent Act, (twenty-sixth April, 1858) make provision for just and ample compensation to plaintiff, for the property (if it may be so called) taken by the Governor, on the first of March preceding. By that Act, (Statutes 1858, 339) a commission was organized, with power to examine the claims of plaintiff, and his assignor, and to award them such sum as they were justly entitled to.

McCauley v. Weller.

The large sum of seventy-five thousand dollars was appropriated for the purposes of the Act, and the Commissioners were authorized to pay the same, or any part thereof, to said parties, upon final settlement.

The rule of law in such cases is, that the damages may be assessed in an equitable and fair mode, to be provided by law, without the intervention of a jury. (2 Kent's Com., note b to page 339, top.) And whenever the mode of ascertaining and assessing the compensation is fixed by statute, then that mode alone must be pursued. 1 Bald. C. C. 205, 221, 222; 4 Term R. 796; 7 Ohio, 568; 2 Kent, 339.

The question suggested by the Court for argument is, "Whether the State can, under any circumstances, without action, take possession of its own property, which is in possession of another?"

It is contended by appellant's counsel, that under any circumstances, whenever the title to the land is vested in the State, no action is required on the part of the State to recover possession against one holding adversely, but the State "has the right, by her officers and agents, to enter and take possession at any time, without applying to the Courts."

This is a startling proposition, at war with all received ideas of individual right, and utterly subversive of that security in the enjoyment of property which is supposed to exist under every free or constitutional government. Yet it is a proposition which the appellant must maintain in its broadest extent, or he is without protection for the act of which we complain.

He rests it, 1st. Upon the right of the English Crown; 2d. Upon the practice of the Government of the United States.

1st. As to the right of the English Crown. It is said by the appellant's counsel that "in England the right of the Crown to land is usually asserted in one or two ways — by inquest of office, where the evidence of title is not in the Crown, and by taking possession without action, when it is."

It might well be contended that if the Crown of England did possess this extraordinary right of taking possession without action, it was only a prerogative right which could not exist here. But it is unnecessary to raise any question upon this point. Such a right never existed in the Crown of England in the terms and to the extent claimed.

"In England the King can neither take nor part with anything but by matter of record; by conveyance upon record, judgment, or by office." (8 Bacon's Abr. 99; Comyn's Dig. Prerogative, D. 66.) "It is true, that when once the title is vested in him by matter of record, he cannot be disseized or dispossessed, but if any one enters he will be an intruder upon the King's possession, for he can only be ousted by matter of record. And therefore it is that the King can maintain no action which supposes a dispossession of the plaintiff, such as an assize or ejectment," (3 Bl. Com. 257; Comyn's Dig. Prerogative, D. 71) and as no laches can be imputed to him, and he cannot be disseized by the entry of another, his right is never defeated by any limitation or length of time.

But because when title was once vested in the King by matter of record, his seizin continues, notwithstanding the entry of another; and because he cannot maintain an assize or ejectment, it by no means follows either that he cannot maintain any other appropriate action, or that he has the right by force, and without action, to remove an intruder. On the contrary, he may maintain any other action, (Comyn's Dig. Action, B. 1) and a special and peculiar action is given against one who enters upon the lands of the Crown. "If a man intrudes upon the King's lands, an information for the intrusion lies in the name of the Attorney General," (Comyn's Dig. Prerogative, D. 47; 8 Bacon's Abr. 101) and "Judgment for the King shall be, that the defendant be removed from the possession, and there shall be an injunction for the possession, for the King is supposed in possession," (Comyn's Dig. Prerogative, D. 77) and "thereupon every party to the information, or claiming under him, shall be removed from the possession." 8 Bacon's Abr. 102.

McCauley v. Weller.

---

This information of intrusion is a substitute for the action of ejectment, and accomplishes the same purpose. Why should it be resorted to, if its only end — the removal of an intruder — can be as effectually attained, without action, by the mere exercise of the inherent power of the Crown? That such an action exists, and should have been so often used as it appears to have been, (Comyn's Dig. Prerogative, D. 73 to 77) are forcible arguments against the right to exercise the power claimed for the Crown by the appellant's counsel.

The same term, to SEIZE, is used as well in speaking of the right of entry of the subject as of the Crown.

"So, an office is sufficient for the King without a scire facias against the party, where a common person may enter or SEIZE, without action." (9 Co. 96.) "But where a common person cannot enter or seize, without having an action, the King, after office, ought to have a scire facias."

The inquest of office was not a proceeding by which the King was put into actual possession of land, and an adverse claimant removed, but a mere inquiry as to the right. Its object was to determine whether the King was entitled to the possession of property, as to inquire "whether the King's tenant for life died seized, whereby the reversion accrues to the King." 3 Bl. Com. 258.

The inquest of office was a public proceeding, a trial by jury, whose finding was not conclusive, but was traversable, and might be reviewed. (8 Bacon's Abr. 99; 3 Bl. Com. 360.) So far from its giving any countenance to the idea that the King could himself determine upon his own right, and invade the possession of the subject, it was intended for the protection of the subject against the assertion and exercise of arbitrary power. In speaking of this proceeding, it is declared to be "a part of the liberties of England, and greatly for the safety of the subject, that the King may not enter upon, nor seize any man's possessions, upon bare surmises, without the intervention of a jury." 8 Bacon's Abr. 99; 3 Bl. Com. 259.

The effect of the office, if found for the Crown, was to show title and right of possession in the King, by matter of record, and by the office only the King was in possession, without seizure, (that is, without entry) if the possession was vacant, but not otherwise. 8 Bacon's

McCauley v. Weller.

Abr. 100; Comyn's Dig. Prerogative, D. 68; Com. Dig. Prerogative, D. 69; 8 Bacon's Abr. 100.

It is apparent that the office does nothing more than a deed or other matter of record. It ascertains the right and vests the title in the King. The legal seizin and possession accompanies the title if at the time of the office the land be vacant — that is, if there be no adverse possession. But the question is still undecided, what may the King do if one enters upon his possession? The answer may be found in Comyn's Dig. Prerogative, D. 71 to 77. It is there asked how he shall be redressed in such a case? and the answer is, by information of intrusion.

It may be very clearly shown, that if the case now before this Court had arisen in England, the King could not have done what has been attempted under an alleged authority from the Legislature of this State, and if that be shown, it is sufficient for the purposes of this argument.

The King leases land for a term of years by deed recorded; he parts with the possession, and delivers it to his lessee to be held under the deed of lease. Without office found, without any judicial proceeding to declare a forfeiture, he forcibly resumes the possession. 8 Bacon's Abr. 98; Comyn's Dig. Prerogative, D. 67.

Now "an entry can only be made by the legal owner when another person, who hath no right, hath previously taken possession of lands or tenements." 3 Bl. Com. 174. But in this case the tenant entered and held by right, and his landlord, if a private person, certainly cannot legally enter upon the land during the continuance of the term. Adams on Ejectment, 157. In such a case, therefore, the King could not be entitled without office found.

The power of the Crown is hardly so despotic in England as we must believe it, if it be true that without process of law, without inquiry or trial, the King may seize whatever property he may adjudge to be his own. It was declared by Magna Charta that "no freeman shall be disseized or divested of his freehold, or of his liberties, or free customs, but by the judgments of his peers or by the law of the land. And by a variety of ancient statutes it is enacted, that no man's lands or goods shall be seized into the King's hands, against the great charter and the law of the land. (3 Bl. Com. 139, and by statute 16 Charles I., c. 10.) That neither His Majesty or Privy Council, have any jurisdiction, power or authority, by English bill, petition, articles, libel, or by any other arbitrary way whatsoever, to examine or to draw into question, determine or dispose of the lands or goods of any subjects of this kingdom; but that the same ought to be tried and determined in the ordinary courts of justice, and by course of law." Ib.

McCauley v. Weller.

When it is said that the King cannot be disseized, it is only intended that notwithstanding the intrusion of one without right, the legal seizin of the King shall in contemplation of law continue, and that none of the consequences of an ouster shall follow as in the case of a subject; that is, that the intruder can gain no freehold in the land; and cannot make a lease to maintain an ejectment; that the death of the intruder and descent cast on his heir, give no better right than his ancestor had, etc., and this is the reason why the King cannot maintain an ejectment or assize. Those actions admit what the law says can never take place — a disseizin — and therefore, as a substitute, the information of intrusion must be resorted to.

In both these particulars, the impossibility of a disseizin, and the consequent impropriety of an ejectment, our law differs from that of England.

The State of California may be disseized. Ten years' adverse possession will constitute a title as against the State. Within that time it may maintain any action for the recovery of real property which an individual might do. Act of Limitations, secs. 3, 4, 5.

But even if the power of the King of England were all that it is claimed to be by the appellant's counsel, and the right of the Crown might be asserted by taking possession of land without action under certain circumstances, it is clear, from the authorities above cited, that it could never have done so in a case like the present. It was a power which could only be exerted against one who held possession without right or color of right, a mere intruder, never certainly against one who held by right derived from the Crown by matter of record. It is certainly requisite to the exercise of such a power that the King should have the right of entry; and where the Crown has leased, or parted with the possession by matter of record, the right of entry is gone, and can only be restored by office found or other proceedings of record.

McCauley v. Weller.

---

In support of some of the positions assumed above, I would refer the Court to the argument of counsel and opinion of the Court in the case of the People of the State of New York v. Brown and others, 1 Caine's R. 416.

2nd. The practice of the Government of the United States.

It is true, that on the third of March, 1807, Congress passed an "Act to prevent settlements being made on lands ceded to the United States, until authorized by law." Probably the first occasion on which the power given to the President was ever employed, was in the case of the New Orleans Batture. The Batture was claimed by Edward Livingston as his private property. Mr. Jefferson, then President of the United States, treating it as public property to which the provisions of this Act applied, instructed the Marshal to remove all persons found upon it, and take possession of it for the United States. Under these instructions, Mr. Livingston was dispossessed; and hence arose the celebrated controversy between himself and Mr. Jefferson, in the course of which was written by the latter the pamphlet referred to by the appellant's counsel, and an extract from which is given in the appellant's printed brief. As an answer to the arguments of Mr. Jefferson, I should desire to submit those of Mr. Livingston himself — a man more distinguished than Mr. Jefferson for profound knowledge of the law. But I have been unable to find any of the writings of Mr. Livingston upon the subject.

The opinions of Mr. Jefferson, quoted by the appellant, are not to be regarded as his deliberate and unbiased judgment, but rather as the argument of a heated disputant. He had been bitterly assailed, and in this pamphlet was arguing his own cause and seeking to vindicate his own conduct. Deliberately, and as a sober conviction, he could never have contended that "the holders of property are safe against the nation by its own justice."

It is to be observed, that this Act of 1807 applies only to lands "ceded or secured to the United States by any treaty with a foreign nation, or by a cession from any State to the United States;" in other words, to lands to which the United States have clear title, in which she has parted with no interest, and in which, consequently, there can clearly be no adverse right on the part of individuals. It applies only to those who are manifestly mere intruders, wrongdoers, trespassers upon that possession of the Government which results from its title. So, Mr. Jefferson speaks only of the exercise of this power of removal "where the nation holds lands in its own possession," and the opinions of the Attorney General, to which we are referred, were given in cases of mere intrusion manifestly without right.

McCauley v. Weller.

---

An application was made to the President of the United States to remove a Mr. Henderson, who was represented to be an intruder upon the public lands. It afterwards appeared that he was in possession under a Spanish title. Thereupon Mr. Wirt, then Attorney General of the United States, gave the opinion that "Mr. Henderson was not an intruder within the meaning of the Act of the third of March, 1807, and consequently it was not competent for the Executive to remove him by force under that law." Vol. 2 Public Lands, Laws, Instructions and Opinions, p. 166.

In 1833, a question was submitted to Mr. Taney, then Attorney General of the United States, in regard to the construction of this Act, and its application in the case of lands ceded to the United States by the Creek Indians. In his opinion he says: "The white men who have entered upon this land are unquestionably intruders within the meaning of the law." The Act "proposes to defend the possessions of the United States against wrongdoers, who, without any pretense of title, and in open violation of the rights of the United States, intrude upon the public property, and appropriate it to their own use." "Indeed, it can hardly be supposed by any one that the United States have not the same right that an individual possesses, to defend their possessions, by force, against a trespasser. Must they surrender up the possession of the public property whenever lawless violence attempts to seize upon it? It cannot be imagined that the United States are bound to stand idle and see their possessions wrested from them, and then be put to their action of ejectment to regain possession of their forts, arsenals and light houses, or to resort to a replevin to recover the public arms and accoutrements, or an action of trover to obtain compensation in damages for their loss." Same vol., pp. 181 to 183.

McCauley v. Weller.

---

This opinion points out the distinction between the case referred to by Mr. Taney, and the one before this Court. The United States had never abandoned the possession, and the intruders never acquired a lawful possession against them. The State of California did abandon its possession, and McCauley acquired against the State a lawful possession for a term of years.

I have examined the authorities cited in behalf of the appellant, and find in them nothing inconsistent with the views here expressed.

In The Fire Department of New York v. Kip, 10th Wend. 266, it was held only that "when, for the violation of an Act of the Legislature, a FORFEITURE of goods and chattels is imposed, and a right to sue for such violation is given by statute, the right to the property does not ipso facto, by the prohibited act being done, vest in the party to whom the property is given, but that a proceeding in a COURT OF LAW must be had ADJUDGING THE FORFEITURE and DECLARING THE PARTY entitled to the property; and that such proceeding has not been had, may be objected even by the officer who seized the property under the initiatory proceeding, in an action against him by the party claiming to be entitled to the property as forfeit.

In Fairfax's Devisee v. Hunter's Lessee, 7 Cranch, 622, the question was, whether an alien enemy could take lands in Virginia by devise, and hold them until office found. Lord Fairfax had been the owner of certain land called the Northern Neck of Virginia, under title derived from the Crown of England by grant. He died during the War of the Revolution, and devised the land to Denny Fairfax, a British subject and alien enemy, who continued seized of the land at the treaty of peace, and by the treaty it was stipulated that no future confiscations could be made; the land was granted by the State to Hunter. For the devisee of Fairfax it was contended that he was competent to take and hold the title until divested by office found, and that there having been no office found prior to the treaty, nor any equivalent act done to vest the estate in the Commonwealth, the treaty released the forfeiture, and his title had become perfect. Against this it was contended that the title of the Commonwealth was complete before the treaty by the death of Lord Fairfax; that the office was no part of the TITLE; that it was the remedy and not the right. The McCanley v. WeHer.

Court held, that it was clear by the common law that an alien could take land by purchase, and that it was settled upon the fullest authority, that the title so acquired was not divested until office found.

In Craig v. Radford, 3 Wheat. 594, the same point arose, and the same decision was made upon the authority of Fairfax's Devisee v. Hunter's Lessee.

In the case of the State ex rel. v. Arledge & Gaither, 1 Bailey's South Carolina Rep. 551, it was determined only that it was proper for the State to recover the possession of land to which it had title by information of intrusion, filed by the Solicitor of the State, and upon which the defendant could answer and a trial be had as between citizen and citizen; and that the State could not maintain trespass to try title or ejectment, because it could not be disseized.

It would seem, then, that giving to the power of the King of England, and of the Government of the United States, the utmost extent which has been claimed for it, it would reach only to the removal of a mere intruder, who has no claim of right, and indeed no possession. How far short does this fall of any application to the case before the Court, which is not one of intrusion, nor of mere claim of right, but one of lawful possession under the deed of the State?

Whether the contract of lease was valid or not, was a question for judicial determination. Both parties had acted under it. The possession of the property was delivered and held under it. That possession was itself property, and entitled to the same protection as the most perfect title.

The Act of the Legislature of the twenty-sixth of February, 1858, under which the appellant justifies, was unconstitutional and void, and can afford no protection for the wrongful act which he has committed. He stands in the same position as a Sheriff or other ministerial officer acting under process absolutely void.

The Act was unconstitutional and void:

- 1st. As impairing the obligation of a contract.
- 2d. As depriving a person of his liberty without due course of law.
- 3d. As the exercise of judicial power. It was not a law but a sentence in a single case; a judgment rendered and executed by authority of the Legislature.

4th. And as an appropriation of private property for a public purpose, if it can be so considered, though there is nothing in the Act to indicate such an intention, it is equally unconstitutional and void, for it made no provision for just compensation.

I do not propose to discuss these propositions. I submit them upon the printed opinion of counsel above referred to, the brief for respondent on file, and the following additional authorities: Sedgwick's Stat. and Const. Law, 158, 173; Osborn v. Bank of United States, 9 Wheat. 798, 843, 858; Ponder, Ex'r, v. Graham, 4 Florida R. 23; 9 Gill & Johns. 412.

Where is there to be found in the Statute of Forcible Entry and Detainer, any exception from its provisions of those who act in the name of the State, or under a void authority derived from the Legislature? Is not a forcible wrong done to the possession of a person by one acting in the name of a State, as much within the mischief intended to be remedied by that statute, as a similar wrong done by a private citizen? Or was it the intention of the statute to repress violence and outrage on the part only of the private citizen, and leave to the dignitaries of the State an unbounded license of oppression, and reserve to those acting in the name of the State a monopoly of wrong?

I do not so read the statute. It declares that "no person or persons shall hereafter make any entry into lands, tenements, or other possessions, but in cases where entry is given by law, and in such cases, not with strong hand nor with multitude of people, but only in a peaceable manner; and if any person henceforth do to the contrary, and thereof be duly convicted, he shall be punished by fine."

And throughout this Act, it is as general and comprehensive in its terms as language can make it. It provides a remedy for "any unlawful or forcible entry." It makes no exception of the State, nor of the Governor, nor the Lieutenant Governor, nor the Secretary of State, nor any of the less distinguished functionaries of the Government.

Was not the State, and were not all these officers of the State bound by this statute? If enacted in England, the King would have been bound by it, for "where an Act of Parliament is made for the public good, the advancement of religion and justice, and to prevent injury and wrong, the King shall be bound by such Act, though not particularly named therein." 8 Bacon's Abr. 92.

McCauley v. Weller.

There being no question of title in the case, and the law under which the defendant justifies, being clearly unconstitutional, and it being in the power of the Justice to declare it so, it only remains to consider whether the entry complained of was forcible within the meaning of the statute. Upon that point, the Court, I apprehend, can entertain no doubt. But in this connection, I would remark, that even had the Act of twenty-sixth February, 1858, been valid and effectual to give the right of entry, (which it was not) under its authority the defendant could not, without violating the provisions of the Statute of Forcible Entry and Detainer, enter upon the respondent's possession "with a strong hand, nor with multitude of people, but only in a peaceable manner." The Act of the twenty-sixth of February did not authorize the use of force. In making entry as he did, forcibly, "to the contrary" of what is enjoined in the Statute of Forcible Entry and Detainer, the defendant exceeded his authority, and in the words of the statute is to be "duly convicted and punished by fine."

TERRY, C. J.—This is a proceeding under the Statute concerning Forcible Entry and Unlawful Detainer to recover possession of certain premises known as the State prison, with damages for the detention.

The facts, as disclosed by the record, are as follows: In 1856, Jas. M. Estill was in possession of the premises, under a lease from R. M. Anderson, Henry Bates and G. W. Whitman, styling themselves "State Prison Commissioners;" after retaining possession for about one year, Estill assigned the lease and delivered the possession of the premises to plaintiff, who remained in possession by himself and his agents and employes until the first of March, 1858, when the alleged forcible entry was made.

At the time of this entry, plaintiff himself was not upon the premises, but the same was in charge of his agent Sims. Defendant, accompanied by several others, entered a building connected with the prison, and informed Sims that he was the Governor of the State, and had come with the intention to take possession of the premises, pursuant to an Act of the Legislature passed a few days previous. Upon the refusal of Sims to yield the possession, defendant called upon a person present, informed him that he was appointed Warden of the prison and then demanded the keys. Sims said that the keys were locked up in an adjoining room, and refused to deliver them. The door of the room was immediately forced by order of defendant, and the keys taken.

McCauley v. Weller.

---

A judgment was rendered by the Court below in favor of plaintiff for a restitution of the premises, with damages, and defendant appeals.

The errors assigned are: 1st. The refusal of the Court to change the place of trial; and, 2d. The refusal to grant a new trial.

The application for a change of venue was made upon affidavits setting up that defendants could not have a fair and impartial trial in the Court below, on account of the bias of the presiding Judge of the County Court, who was charged with having been present, consulting and advising with the agent and counsel of plaintiff during the trial before the Justice; and having, during the progress of such trial, expressed himself so strongly in favor of plaintiff's right to recover, as to occasion remonstrance from bystanders upon the impropriety of such conduct on the part of a judicial officer.

The statute authorizes a change of venue "when, from any cause, the Judge is disqualified from acting." The things which disqualify a Judge are specified in section 87 of the Act "concerning the Courts and Judicial officers," Wood's Digest, p. 157. 1st. When he is a party to, or interested in the action. 2d. When he is related to either party within the third degree; and, 3d. When he has been attorney or counsel for either party.

These are the only causes which work a disqualification of a judicial officer. The exhibition by a Judge of partisan feeling, or the unnecessary expression of an opinion upon the justice or merits of a controversy, though exceedingly indecorous, improper and reprehensible, as calculated to throw suspicion upon the judgments of the Court and bring the administration of justice into contempt, are not, under our statute, sufficient to authorize a change of venue on the ground that the Judge is disqualified from sitting. The law establishes a different rule for determining the qualification of Judges from that applied to jurors. The reason of this distinction is obvious. The province of the jury is, to determine from the evidence the issues of fact presented by the parties; and their decision is final in all cases where there is a conflict of testimony. Therefore, the expression of an unqualified opinion on the merits of the controversy, which evinces such a form of mind as renders him less capable to weigh the evidence with entire impartiality, is sufficient to exclude a juror.

McCauley v. Weller.

---

The province of a Judge is to decide such questions of law as may arise in the progress of the trial. His decisions upon these points are not final; and, if erroneous, the party has his remedy by bill of exceptions and appeal.

If forming or expressing an opinion upon the merits of the controversy was sufficient to disqualify a Judge, it would be necessary that the venue of a cause should be changed, after a mis-trial or the granting of a new trial; for, after hearing the evidence and argument of counsel upon a mis-trial, the Judge would, of course, have formed an opinion upon the merits of the controversy; and the fact of granting a new trial is often equivalent to the expression of such opinion.

The refusal to change the venue is no sufficient ground for reversing the judgment.

Under the second assignment of error, appellants seek to raise a question as to the validity of the lease to Estill, and the assignment of such lease to plaintiff. These points do not arise in the case under consideration, nor can they be considered or determined in this form of action.

The action of forcible entry and detainer is a summary proceeding to recover possession of premises forcibly or unlawfully detained. The inquiry in such cases is confined to the actual peaceable possession of the plaintiff and the unlawful or forcible ouster or detention by defendant—the object of the law being to prevent the disturbance of the public peace, by the forcible assertion of a private right. Questions of title or right of possession cannot arise; a forcible entry upon the actual possession of plaintiff being proven, he would be entitled to restitution, though the fee simple, title and present right of possession are shown to be in the defendant. The authorities on this point are numerous and uniform. We have, therefore, declined to consider the objections which are taken in the briefs of counsel to the validity of the lease and assignment.

McCaulley v. Wells.

---

The remaining points are:

First. "That, admitting the contract to be valid, the State had, at any time, a right to rescind, violate or annul it without the assent of the lessee or his assignees."

Second. "That the title of the premises being in the State, she had the right to take the same for public purposes, by providing just compensation therefor; and that such compensation was provided."

Upon the first point, the only authority cited is part of a paragraph taken from the opinion of one of the former Judges of this Court upon an entirely different state of facts; and which, when taken in connection with the context, is not at all applicable to the case under consideration.

Upon the second point, numerous authorities, both English and American, are cited, none of which, as we conceive, are directly applicable to the case under consideration. The English authorities show that an action of ejectment will not lie at the suit of the King; for the reason that the Sovereign cannot be disseized; but it does not follow that he may therefore expel by force a party in possession of lands belonging to the Crown; there are other remedies to which he may have recourse.

"If a man intrude upon the King's lands, an information for intrusion lies in the name of the Attorney General." (Comyn's Dig. Barogatine, D. 74; 8 Bacon's Abr. 101) by which proceeding the intruder and all claiming under him could be ousted and enjoined from further interfering with the possession.

The fact that such a remedy is provided to enable the King to recover lands held by a mere intruder, would seem to imply that the right to seize forcibly without legal process, did not exist at common law. In the State v. Arledge and Gaither, 1 Bailey South Carolina Rep. 562, quoted by appellants, the Court held that the State could not maintain the action of ejectment. Mr. Justice Johnson says: "It is very clear that in England the King cannot maintain an ejectment to recover lands; and the reason given by Blackstone is, that, on account of his legal ubiquity, he cannot be disseized or dispossessed. All the elementary writers hold the same doctrine; and it is even more strikingly applicable here, where the sovereign power and right are in the hands of the people themselves, who want that personal identity on which a disseizure could operate; and for the further reason, that a part of it abides in the defendants themselves." But the Court did not hold that the State could, by its officers, resume possession without process; on the contrary, it was held that the remedy was by information for intrusion.

McCauley v. Weller.

It is undoubtedly the practice of the United States Government to remove intruders upon the public lands without legal process; this proceeding is authorized by Act of Congress of March, 1807, the validity of which Act is sustained by the opinions of various Attorney Generals of the United States. The provisions of this Act, however, and the principles announced in the opinions referred to, apply only to intruders or trespassers on the public domain without claim or right, and have in no case been extended to a bona fide possession under color of title. On the contrary, it has been expressly held not to apply to such cases. Public Lands, Laws, Instructions, and Opinions, vol. 2, page 166.

Chief Justice Taney, while Attorney General, asserted the power of the United States, under the Act of 1807, to expel intruders from lands ceded by the Creek Indians, on the ground that the parties were mere wrongdoers, "who, without any pretense of title, and in open violation of the rights of the United States, intrude upon the public property and appropriate it to their own use;" and that "the United States had never abandoned their possession, and the intruders had never acquired a lawful possession against them," but were mere naked trespassers upon the public domain. See Public Lands, Laws, etc., vol. 2, p. 181.

There is a vast difference between the case of a mere wrongdoer, and one who enters by the license and consent of the Government.

In the present case, it appears that plaintiff and his assignor had been in the actual peaceable possession of the premises for a period of nearly two years, under color of title purporting to be derived from the State. The legality of his possession, and the validity of the contract under which he held, had been recognized by the successive Legislatures, as appears by the Acts of 1856 and 1857, by which appropriations were made pursuant to the terms of the contract, and by the journals of the Legislature. Plaintiff can, then, in no sense be considered as an intruder, without claim or pretense of title; and the reasoning of the authorities, cited from the opinions of the Attorney General of the United States, does not apply to the facts of this case. The possession of plaintiff having been acquired by the consent of the Legislature, and been recognized by it as legal, could only be legally divested by the judgment or decree of a competent Court.

McCanley v. Weller.

It is said that the State cannot commit a forcible entry. This position will not, I presume, be controverted; but the defendant is not the State; and certainly there is no reason why a public officer, who acts without authority, or under a void authority, or who transcends the authority conferred by law, should not be held to strict accountability for such act.

The objection that the entry complained of was not forcible, is entirely unsupported by the facts disclosed by the record. Several men go to an outer building, occupied by the agent of plaintiff, and in which were the keys of the premises, against the will, and notwithstanding the protest of this agent; an inner door is forced and the keys taken, with which an entry into the main building is effected. The acts of the parties warranted no other conclusion than that any attempt on the part of the plaintiff to resume possession would be resisted by force.

"To constitute forcible entry and detainer, it is not necessary that violence and outrage upon the person and property should in fact be resorted to. If the actual possession of another in a house or tenement be taken and held under circumstances which show that it will not be surrendered without a breach of peace on the one side or the other, this constitutes a case of forcible entry and detainer." Childers v. Black, 9 Yerg. 317; 1 Scam. 407.

The statute was intended to prevent bloodshed, violence and breaches of the peace, too likely to result from wrongful entries into the possession of others; and it would be absurd to say, that to enable a party to avail himself of its provisions, there must have occurred precisely the evil which it was the object of the law to prevent. The power of the Legislature to absolutely control the custody and disposition of the State prisoners, and to enter upon the premises for the purpose of removing such persons, does not arise in this case, and we are not disposed to question its authority to do so.

McCauley v. Weller.

---

The simple question involved in the record is, whether premises, which were in the peaceable and actual possession of plaintiff, were forcibly and unlawfully entered and detained.

The last point is, that, "admitting these premises to be the private property of plaintiff, still the State had the constitutional power to take it for public purposes, by providing just compensation therefor; and it is immaterial whether the compensation was provided in the Act directing the seizure of the property, or by subsequent act."

The first proposition is certainly true, but the Act under which defendant justified his entry, made no sort of provision for any compensation whatever, and was clearly in violation of the eighth section of article one of the Constitution. For the second proposition, we can find no authority; and we are unable to see how an illegal entry on the first of March can be affected by the passage of an Act some two months thereafter.

It is well settled, and upon this point there is no conflict of authority, that when private property is taken for public use, the means of compensating the owner must be provided before the property can be taken. Smith Com. 473, et seq.; San Francisco v. Scott, 4 Cal. 114; McCann v. Sierra Co., 7 Cal. 121.

The judgment of the Court below is affirmed.

FIELD.— The validity of the lease from the State cannot be tried in the present action, nor can the plaintiff be deprived of the advantages resulting from the possession of the premises, by a forcible ouster under any legislative enactment. Assuming the lease to have been valid, there was in the plaintiff a property of which he could not be divested for public use without just compensation. His right, so far as the land and buildings were concerned, was in no respect affected by the fact, that they were designed as a place for the confinement of convicts. The purposes for which premises are leased cannot alter the nature of the leasehold interest as property. To take such property without compensation is beyond the reach of legislative power. Such compensation must be made, or a fund provided from which it can be made in advance. So strictly is this rule adhered to, that the enforcement of any statute to take such property, where the indemnity has not been provided, will be stayed by injunction. The appropriation without providing the compensation is unconstitutional and void. In Gardner v. Village of Newburgh, (2 John. Ch. 162) Chancellor Kent said: "To render the exercise of the power [to take private property for public purposes] valid, a fair compensation must, in all cases, be previously made to individuals affected, under some equitable assessment to be provided by law. This is a necessary qualification accompanying the exercise of the legislative power, in taking private property for public uses; the limitation is admitted by the soundest authorities, and is adopted by all temperate and civilized governments, from a deep and universal sense of its justice."

McCauley v. Weller.

---

In Bloodgood v. The Mohawk and Hudson Railroad Co. (18 Wend. 17) Chancellor Walworth, in expressing his dissent to a decision of his predecessor, in Jerome v. Ross, (7 John. Ch. 344) that it was not necessary to the validity of a statute authorizing private property to be taken for public use, that a remedy for compensation to the owner should be provided, said:

"On the contrary, I hold that, before the Legislature can authorize the agents of the State and others to enter upon and occupy, or destroy or materially injure the private property of an individual, except in cases of actual necessity which will not admit of any delay, an adequate and certain remedy must be provided, whereby the owner of such property may compel the payment of his damages, or compensation; and that he is not bound to trust to the justice of the government to make provision for such compensation by future legislation. I do not mean to be understood that the Legislature may not authorize a mere entry upon the land of another, for the purpose of examination, or of making preliminary surveys, &c., which would otherwise be a technical trespass, but no real injury to the owner of the land, although no provision was made by law to compensate the individual for his property, if it should afterwards be taken for public use. But it certainly was not the intention of the framers of the Constitution to authorize the property of a citizen to be taken and actually appropriated to the use of the public, and thus to compel him to trust to the future justice of the Legislature to provide a compensation therefor. The compensation must be either ascertained and paid to him before his property is thus appropriated, or an appropriate remedy must be provided; and upon an adequate fund, whereby he may obtain such compensation, through the medium of the Courts of justice, if those whose duty it is to make such compensation, refuse to do so." Sedgwick on Statutory and Cons. Law, 525, 526, 533.

McCauley v. Weller.

To the same effect are the decisions of this Court. In the case of the City of San Francisco v. Scott, (4 Cal. 114) a street was extended through the property of one Price, by ordinance of the Common Council of the city, and in conformity with the requirements of its charter, assessments were made of the damages caused to each individual by the extension. To Price, who was in possession of a portion of the land appropriated, an award of $1,925 was made. Shortly afterwards, the street was opened, and it remained open for four or five months, during which period it was used as a public thoroughfare. At the expiration of this period, the award not being paid, the defendant, as agent of Price, entered upon the land and obstructed the street, claiming, on behalf of his principal, the right to reappropriate the same to private use. For the obstruction the defendant was prosecuted before the Recorder, by whom judgment was passed against him. On appeal, the judgment was reversed, with the concurrent opinion of all the Judges. "Our bill of rights," said the Court, "provides that private property shall not be taken for public use, without just compensation being made therefor; and it is now the better opinion, that such compensation must be made before the citizen can be divested of his rights. It is not sufficient that the law points out the mode by which the damage may be ascertained, and provides the party with a remedy to enforce his rights; no such obligation can be imposed upon him; he is entitled to the damages which he has sustained, without resorting to a legal tribunal to enforce the payment. The law watches the exercise of this prerogative of sovereignty with a jealous regard for the rights of the citizen.

"Admitting all the steps for opening this street were properly and legally taken, (a proposition denied by appellant's counsel) it is evident the premises in question did not become a public street by virtue of such ordinance, until the city had paid or tendered the amount of the assessment to the defendant; in other words, a city ordinance could not divest the title to private property, and ex proprio vigore operate a dedication to the public use."

McCauley v. Weller.

In McCann v. Sierra County, (7 Cal. 121) the Supervisors of that county had, by resolution, extended a street or thoroughfare through the land of the plaintiff, without providing any compensation for the private injury consequent thereon; and the Court, all the Judges concurring, said: "The Constitution of California provides, 'that private property shall not be taken for public use, unless just compensation be made therefor.' A similar provision is to be found in the Constitution of every State in the Union; and the result of the decision on this subject may be briefly stated thus: That compensation must be made in advance, or a fund must be provided, out of which compensation shall be made, so soon as the amount can be determined. The property of the citizen cannot be taken from him without ample means of remuneration are provided. From this it results that the act of the Supervisors of Sierra county, in appropriating the property of the plaintiff to public uses, before making provision for paying him the value thereof, was illegal, and that he might resort to the Court of Equity to restrain them from interfering with the freehold."

It is, then, the settled law, that the compensation, or the offer of it, must proceed or be concurrent with the seizure and entry upon private property of the citizen. It may not be absolutely essential that the compensation should be provided in the same Act which authorizes the seizure; but it is essential that it should be provided before the seizure can be enforced or justified. Little, indeed, would be the security afforded to the citizen, if his property could be taken by the agents of government, and himself left to the future sense of justice of the Legislature. It would be poor consolation to the head of the family, stripped of his entire possessions, to be informed that the Legislature would, at some subsequent day, deal fairly by him.

The statute upon which the Governor bases his defense and justifies his acts in terms, authorizes and empowers him, and, in fact, makes it his duty, to take immediate possession of the State prison and grounds, together with all the property of the State therein situated, and to assume the custody, control and management of the State prison convicts therein confined, or to be therein confined, and thereafter to continue the possession of the property and the control of the convicts until further provided by law. The prison and grounds, which the Governor was thus directed to take and retain possession of, were in the possession of the plaintiff, with color of title under claim of right, upon a lease of five years. Had these premises been a warehouse, occupied by a tenant under a lease from the State, for the ordinary purposes of mercantile business, no one would have had the hardihood to uphold the validity of a statute directing the seizure of the same and the dispossession of the tenant, except by regular proceedings in the tribunals of the country. How does the case at bar differ from the case supposed? Grounds and buildings were leased; the leasehold interest was property, and for its enjoyment against invasion and seizure under attempted legislation, or by individual violence, the plaintiff could claim the protection of the Constitution. The fact that the grounds and buildings leased were used for the confinement of State convicts, does not alter the case. The right to the labor of the convicts is not involved. That the State may not have any other place of confinement, as urged in argument, is its misfortune, but cannot impair the right of the plaintiff to hold the premises until indemnified for their taking. If the State had leased out the Capitol, it would afford no justification for seizing and dispossessing the tenant, that it had no other place for the meeting of the Legislature. The difficulty under which the State is resting, arises from the provisions of the lease, and the failure to insert a clause for the repossession of the premises whenever the Legislature should determine to resume the control of the prisoners.

McCaffrey v. Welles.

What I have thus far said, has been upon the supposition that the lease from the State is valid, for its invalidity cannot be questioned in this form of proceeding. In any view, whether valid or invalid, it gave a color of title to the plaintiff. It took from his possession the character of intrusion without claim of right, which alone the government can remedy by force. Where private right is asserted, the government is as impotent as the humblest citizen to impair or destroy it. The validity of the lease could only be determined in a different tribunal and by proceedings of a different character.

McCauley v. Weller.

---

Nor could the validity of the assignment from Estill to the plaintiff be the subject of consideration in the present action. The plaintiff was in peaceable possession; the defendant ousted him by force; and before the legality of the title of the parties to the premises can be the subject of consideration, they must be placed in statu quo with reference to the property. The law will not suffer the defendant, or those whom he represents, to enjoy the advantages resulting from the possession when obtained by violence and force.

Nor can the defendant rest his justification upon any possible forfeiture of the lease. Such forfeiture cannot be asserted except by force of a judicial determination. The Legislature cannot take upon itself, nor the officers of government upon themselves, to adjudge what right has accrued to the State, and then proceed to enforce it, any more than a private citizen. For the recovery of money due, or the possession of property withheld under a claim of right, the Legislature, and the highest officer, and the humblest citizen, stand upon the same footing, and must pursue the same course.

There may be, and probably is, great truth in the observation of the Attorney General, that in the hands of the defendant and those associated with him, the management of the State prison has been eminently wise and economical, and one which reflects great credit upon him and them. This may all be so, but it is difficult to see what bearing it can have upon the rights of the plaintiff. There would undoubtedly have been the same wise and economical management, if the Governor had taken by force, for the confinement of the prisoners, any other equally capacious property, belonging to any private citizen, other than the plaintiff.

I concur in the affirmance of the judgment.

Dutch Flat Water Co. v. Mooney.

DUTCH FLAT WATER CO. v. MOONEY et al.

In an action of ejectment to recover mining claims, an answer to the complaint which avers, "that any right that plaintiffs may have ever had to the possession, etc., they forfeited by a non-compliance with the rules, customs and regulations of the miners of the diggings embracing the claims in dispute, prior to the defendants' entry," is insufficient, in not setting forth the rules, customs, etc. This averment of forfeiture is a legal conclusion upon which no issue can be taken. The facts should be stated so as to enable the Court to determine whether the forfeiture did accrue.

The mode of acquiring and the extent of a mining claim must be in conformity with the local rules of miners; but, query, can the local regulations alter the general rules of the right of holding property, by creating a new and arbitrary rule, or by abrogating the old rules?

APPEAL from the Eleventh District, County of Placer.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion of the Court.

B. F. Myers for Appellant.

M. E. Mills for Respondent.

BALDWIN, J., delivered the opinion of the Court—FIELD, J., concurring.

Ejectment for mining claims. Defendant answered, averring that the plaintiff had lost whatever right he had by a failure to comply with the rules, regulations and customs of the mining district. To this loose and general allegation the defendant demurred. The Court overruled the demurrer. The parties are entitled to a definite issue upon which the case can be intelligently tried. The object of pleading is to advise the adverse party of the distinct subject matter of averment or defense intended to be relied on. If the matter itself be good—which is not a little questionable—the manner of its statement is so loose and vague that no purpose of a pleading is subserved by it; for what were these regulations or customs—how many—how violated—when—under what circumstances? The general allegation of forfeiture is a legal conclusion upon which no issue can be taken. The facts must be stated so as to enable the Court to see whether the forfeiture did accrue.

Waters v. Moss.

We do not decide the question as to the power of a mining district to pass a valid regulation declaring the tenure of this species of property to be different from that created by the general law. The Act of the Legislature giving effect to these local regulations, qualifies the power by providing that the rules so passed shall not be inconsistent with the Constitution or laws of the State. We see no inconsistency in holding that the mode of acquiring, and the extent of the claim, shall be according to these local rules; but when a right of property shall have attached, it may be more difficult to maintain that it can be divested by a rule or regulation, when the rule opposes the general law fixing the tenure.

It is true, that the right coming entirely from possession may be lost by an abandonment of the possession, and the law determines what shall be or prove an abandonment; but the question is, can the local regulation alter this general principle, either by creating a new and arbitrary rule, or abrogating the old ones. As this is an important matter, and the question has not been fully argued, we reserve a decision of it. For the errors assigned, the judgment is reversed and cause remanded.

WATERS v. MOSS, TRUSTEE OF THE SACRAMENTO VALLEY RAILROAD COMPANY.

In an action against a railroad company for running over a horse and killing him, the plaintiff has the right to prove the custom of the country, "to permit domestic animals to roam at large upon the uninclosed commons;" where the defense is negligence on the part of the plaintiff in thus allowing the horse to run at large.

Plaintiff was not guilty of negligence in thus allowing his horse to run at large. The rule of common law, which requires owners of cattle to keep them confined within their own close, does not prevail in this State. The common law was adopted only so far as it was not repugnant to the Constitution and statutes of the State.

Waters v. Moss.

---

Before the discovery of the gold mines, this was exclusively a grazing country; its only wealth consisting in vast herds of cattle which were pastured exclusively upon uninclosed lands. The custom continued to prevail after the acquisition of the country by the United States, and has been, in various instances, recognized by the Legislature.

APPEAL from the Sixth District, County of Sacramento.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

Clark & Gass for Appellant.

1st. The Court erred in refusing to permit plaintiff to prove on the trial that the custom had been throughout this State, from its earliest history, to permit cattle and horses to run at large.

2nd. That the Court erred in finding, as a fact, that the plaintiff was guilty of negligence in permitting his horse to run at large on the commons.

3d. That the Court erred in its conclusions of law in holding, that slight negligence on the part of the plaintiff, although remote, could relieve the defendant from all responsibility, and deprive the plaintiff of all redress for injury, although it resulted from the immediate negligence of defendant. 3 Ohio State R. 175; 14 Conn. R. 293; 5 Gilman's R. 130; 1 Strobhart's R. 175; Swift's Dig. R. 525; 11 East's R. 58, 567; 1 Adolph. & Ellis' R. 35; 3 Carr. & Payne's R. 554; 2 Eng. Latham & Sunderland for Respondent.

The first error complained of by appellant's counsel, is a refusal of the Court to allow, on the trial, proof "that the custom had been throughout this State, from its earliest history, to permit cattle to run at large upon the uninclosed lands in this State."

The rule of the common law was, that a man must keep his cattle on his own land, or within his own close, and was liable in trespass for allowing them to go upon his neighbor's land. But railroad companies having the exclusive right to use their roads, the very object of their incorporation forbids any joint occupation for any purpose.

Waters v. Moss.

In Ohio, it is held, "that the company is liable for want of such reasonable care as is consistent with the safety of the persons and property on the train." Kernhacker v. C. C. & C. R. Co., 3 Ohio State, 172; C. H. & D. R. R. Co. v. Watson, 2 Ohio State, 424, 433.

In Pennsylvania, where the common law has been modified as in Ohio, the Supreme Court says, that the common law rule does apply to uninclosed lands in the vicinity of railroads; and if the owner allows his cattle to run at large in the vicinity of them, he does so at the risk of losing them, and paying for their transgressions. N. Y. & Erie R. R. Co. v. Skinner, 19 Penn. State, 298; Knight v. Albert, 6 Penn. State, 472.

The same doctrine is laid down in Illinois, where they also recognize the modification of the common law rule as to cattle not being trespassers on uninclosed lands; but the Supreme Court of that State says they do become trespassers when they wander upon the track of an uninclosed railroad, and the railroad company is not liable for killing them while on the track, unless its agents are guilty of "willful or wanton injury, or of gross negligence, evincing reckless or willful misconduct." Chicago & Miss. R. R. Co. v. Patchin, 16 Ill. 198; Great Western R. R. Co. v. Thompson, 17 Ill. 131; Central Military Tract R. R. Co. v. Rockafellow, 17 Ill. 541; Illinois Central R. R. Co. v. Reedy, 17 Ill. 580.

We therefore state it to be well settled law, and in accordance with the almost unanimous authority of the Courts, that a railroad company, not compelled to fence its track by special statute, is not responsible for injuries to cattle coming upon its track, through the want of such fence, without proof of some other default.

"It may maintain an action for damages done by such cattle unlawfully coming upon its track; and, on the other hand, it is not liable to the owner for injuries inflicted on his cattle, thus trespassing, while it is in the lawful exercise of its right to the exclusive use of its track." *Perkins v. TERRY, C. J., delivered the opinion of the Court—BALDWIN, J., concurring.

This is an action to recover the value of a horse killed by the cars upon the Sacramento railroad. The case was tried below without a jury—defendant had judgment and the plaintiff appealed.

It appears that the horse had been permitted to run at large upon the uninclosed commons. That at the time the cars were passing, the horse, in company with others, was about crossing the railroad track, upon a public road; becoming frightened, it ran along the track some hundred yards, where the road crossed an open culvert, there being a fence on each side of the track; that the horse failed in the attempt to leap this open culvert, and was run over and killed by the locomotive.

The Court below refused to permit plaintiff to prove that it was the custom of this State to permit domestic animals to roam at large upon the uninclosed commons; but held that, in so permitting his horse to roam at large, the plaintiff was guilty of negligence, and that he was not entitled to recover damages for a loss which was, in fact, occasioned by such negligence.

This was error. The rule of common law which required owners of cattle to keep them confined to their own close has never prevailed in California. Before the discovery of the gold mines this was exclusively a grazing country; its only wealth consisting in vast herds of cattle, which were pastured exclusively upon uninclosed lands. This custom continued to prevail after the acquisition of the country by the United States, and has been in various instances recognized by the Legislature.

The common law was adopted only so far as it was not repugnant to the Constitution and statutes of the State. Now, the rule contended for by respondent, and adopted by the Court below, is repugnant to no less than three statutes passed by the session of the Legislature at which the common law was adopted, to wit: The law regulating rodeos; the Act concerning marks and brands, and the Act concerning lawful fences.

If it were contemplated by the Legislature that all such animals were to be confined to the close of the owner, where was the necessity of providing for a general herding of all the cattle of a neighborhood, after notice, in order that all might attend and each select his own? Or of requiring cattle and horses to be branded before reaching a certain age? Or the justice of providing that damages for loss of crops destroyed by cattle should only be recovered by those whose farms are inclosed by a certain description of fence?

Judgment reversed and cause remanded.

SANFORD v. BORING, SHERIFF.

- A Sheriff who levies a writ of attachment upon personal property, in obedience to the commands of the writ, has no right to let the property go out of his hands, except in due course of law; and if he does, and the debt is lost, he is responsible to the plaintiff in the attachment for the amount of the debt.
- No parol instruction of the plaintiff in an attachment or execution, respecting property seized by the Sheriff under either writ, will discharge such Sheriff from liability. The statute is express that such instruction must be in writing.
- The evident meaning of the language of the Act embraces all acts done by the Sheriff in respect to the execution of process, including the care and disposition of the property levied upon.

APPEAL from the Fourteenth District, County of Nevada.

This was an action against the defendant, Sheriff of Nevada county, for a failure to make a levy and sale of property — previously attached in the same suit — under an execution issued upon a judgment in favor of plaintiff and against Pultney & Armstrong.

Plaintiff also claimed the penalty of two hundred dollars given by statute for failure of the Sheriff to return the execution within sixty days, as therein commanded.

Sanford v. Boring.

The testimony, as well as the findings of the Court, disclose the following facts:

The plaintiff, Sanford, brought suit against Pultney & Armstrong for four hundred and twenty-nine dollars; sued out an attachment, and placed the writ in the hands of the Sheriff, on the eighth day of February, 1858.

On the same day the Sheriff levied said writ upon personal property of Pultney & Armstrong (then defendants) sufficient to satisfy Sanford's claim.

The Sheriff did not remove the attached property, which consisted of saddles, horses, buggies, etc., but left it all in the stable where it was attached, and in the possession of Armstrong, one of the (then) defendants, who continued in possession, and conducted the business (livery stable keeping) as he had done before.

On the fifteenth of March, 1858, one J. B. Lobdell commenced suit with attachment against Pultney & Armstrong — placed the writ in the hands of the Sheriff, who levied it on the morning of the sixteenth, upon all of the personal property then in the possession of the defendant Armstrong.

On the same day Sanford recovered judgment in his suit against Pultney & Armstrong, and in the evening of that day, and after the levy of Lobdell's attachment, placed his execution in the hands of the Sheriff, who proceeded to levy it upon the property in the possession of Armstrong.

Neither Pultney or Armstrong owned any other property whatever in the county.

Lobdell afterwards recovered judgment against Pultney & Armstrong — took out execution — under which the Sheriff sold, and paid the proceeds to Lobdell, which were only sufficient to satisfy Lobdell's judgment and costs.

On the trial, the defendant offered to prove that plaintiff verbally directed the defendant to put Armstrong in possession of the property attached at the suit of Sanford as keeper.

This evidence was objected to, upon the ground that the statute required such instructions to be in writing. The objection was sustained by the Court, and the defendant excepted.

---

Plaintiff had judgment for the full amount of his claim, and defendant appealed to this Court.

McConnell & Niles for Appellant.

Chase & Caldwell for Respondent.

BALDWIN, J., delivered the opinion of the Court — FIELD, J., concurring.

We see no error in this record. The action was brought against the defendant, Sheriff, to recover of him so much money, being the value of property in his hands, which he had levied on and suffered to remain in the possession of the defendant in attachment. Upon obtaining judgment, the plaintiff sued out execution, but the money was not made on it. We think the complaint is sufficient. It sets out the facts: That an attachment was levied upon sufficient property to satisfy the debt by the Sheriff; and that an execution was issued on the judgment subsequently had and placed in the Sheriff's hands, and the Sheriff failed to make the money. The levy of the attachment placed the property in the hands of the Sheriff to abide judgment and execution, and this property was the plaintiff's security for his debt. If the Sheriff wasted or lost it, or suffered it to be diverted to some other purpose, he is liable. He had no right to suffer the property to go out of his possession, except in due course of law, and is responsible if he did. His return charges him with this property, and he has not discharged himself.

Nor did the Court err in refusing to permit evidence of parol instructions from the plaintiff in execution to the Sheriff, to permit the defendant to take or keep possession.

The statute is express, that no direction or authority by a party or his attorney to a Sheriff in respect to the execution of process, or the return thereof, or to any act in relation thereto, shall be available to discharge or excuse the Sheriff for a liability for neglect or misconduct unless it be contained in writing, etc.

 Ellison v. Jackson Water Company.

---

The construction of appellant's counsel of this Act is too narrow and technical. The evident meaning of the language embraces all acts done by the Sheriff in respect to the execution of process, including, of course, the care and disposition of the property levied on — the most important of these acts.

The judgment is affirmed.

ELLISON v. THE JACKSON WATER COMPANY AND BAYERQUE.

The term "ratified," when used in reference to a contract, is applicable only to contracts made by a party acting or assuming to act for another. The latter may then adopt or ratify the act of the former, however unauthorized. To adoption and ratification there must be some relation, actual or assumed, of principal and agent.

E. contracted with J. W. to construct an extension to a ditch, and after the ditch was completed, was to be paid out of the sales of water. At the time of the execution of the contract, B. held a mortgage upon the ditch. After E. had partly completed his work, B.'s mortgage fell due, and he brought an action to foreclose it, and had a Receiver appointed to receive the water rents of the ditch. E. refused to go on and complete the work. B. agreed with E., that if he would go on and complete the work, he should be paid out of the receipts from the sale of water by the Receiver. Under this promise, E. completed the work; Held, That this is an undertaking to answer for the debt, default or miscarriage of another, and is therefore within the Statute of Frauds.

It is essential to the validity of such contract, that it, or some note or memorandum thereof, be in writing; that it express the consideration; and that it be subscribed by the party to be charged thereby.

A promise by B. to perform J. W.'s contract, could furnish no consideration for a promise from E., nor could the consideration of the original contract attach to the subsequent promise of B.

The Act of 1850 gave a mechanic's lien only upon buildings and wharves. The Act of 1853 extended the Act of 1850, so as to include in its provisions bridges, ditches, flumes or aqueducts constructed to create hydraulic power, or for mining purposes. The Act of 1855 repealed the Act of 1850. Held, The repeal carried with it the supplementary Act of 1853, which extended the provisions of the original Act. Without the original Act, there was no mode of enforcing the supplementary Act. The latter was so dependent upon the former as to become utterly inoperative upon the repeal.

Ellison v. Jackson Water Company.

---

Neither the Mechanics' Lien Law of 1855 or 1856 give a lien upon canals or ditches. The language of the statute is, "building, wharf, or other superstructure." A ditch is not a building, or a wharf, and in no sense can it be designated a superstructure.

Flumes constructed at different parts of the line of a ditch, cannot change the general character of the work as an excavation. Such flumes are mere connecting links of the ditch over ravines and gulches, and the whole work must be regarded as a ditch.

Equity raises no lien in respect to real estate, except that of a vendor for the purchase money.

APPEAL from the Fifth District, County of Amador.

This was an action brought to recover a judgment against the defendants in the sum of $48,154.14, for services rendered by plaintiff under a contract with the Jackson Water Company, for the construction of a ditch or canal, and also for the enforcement of a mechanics' or laborers' lien upon the work.

On the twenty-second day of December, 1855, the plaintiff contracted, in writing, to and with the Jackson Water Company, for the construction of a certain ditch or canal in continuation of one owned by the company. By the terms of the contract, the plaintiff was entitled — after the water was let into the ditch — to collect the water rents, and retain one-half thereof, which was to be applied in discharge of his debt against the company for the construction of the work. It is alleged by the plaintiff, that he completed the ditch within the contract time. A breach of the contract is alleged by the plaintiff on the part of the company, by depriving plaintiff of the right to collect the water rents of the ditch, after he had collected only $2,790.36, leaving unpaid for the work $48,154.17. On the twenty-eighth of February, 1857, the plaintiff filed in the office of the County Recorder where the ditch is located, certain papers claiming a lien upon the ditch and its appurtenances, in pursuance of the provisions of the Mechanics' and Laborers' Lien Law. In the notice of his intention to hold a lien upon the work, it is alleged that the ditch was constructed by plaintiff between the twenty-second of December, 1855, and the twenty-eighth of January, 1857.

Prior to the making of the contract between plaintiff and the company, the company had mortgaged the ditch to the defendant, Bayer-que, to secure the payment of $50,000. While plaintiff was in progress of the work, the mortgage debt fell due, and Bayerque instituted an action to foreclose the mortgage, and subsequently obtained a decree to that effect. Plaintiff alleges that, in June, 1856, he gave Bayerque notice of his contract, etc. Here is the allegation of the complaint upon which the plaintiff seeks to hold Bayerque responsible for the payment of the construction of the ditch: "On the ——— day of June, A. D. 1856, the defendant Bayerque, by himself and by his agents and attorneys, in consideration that plaintiff would not abandon his said work, and would not sue defendants at that time, adopted and ratified said contract, and agreed and stipulated that plaintiff should finish the work aforesaid contracted for, and that he be paid therefor by the Receiver, Thomas B. Wade, who, it is prayed, be made a party to this suit, and who was appointed said Receiver in the suit for the foreclosure of the mortgage aforesaid between the defendant Bayerque and the Jackson Water Company; and, pursuant to said stipulation, the said Receiver was directed to pay plaintiff for such work according to said contract, as expressed in the terms thereof. And the said plaintiff avers, that in consideration of said satisfaction of said contract, and believing that the defendant Moss was a party to such ratification — as plaintiff is informed and believes he was — the plaintiff proceeded to finish said work, and to complete the contract on his part; and plaintiff avers that it ever was the intention of defendants, Moss and Bayerque, that said contract should be carried out, and that said defendants, knowing the premises, agreed and stipulated that the same should be done."

Ellison v. Jackson Water Company.

---

On the seventh day of July, 1856, the ditch was sold under the decree of foreclosure, and Bayerque became the purchaser; and subsequently a Sheriff's deed was duly executed and delivered to Bayerque.

Plaintiff had judgment in the Court below for the amount of his demand and for the enforcement of his lien; Bayerque appealed therefrom to this Court. No appeal was taken by the company.

Levi Parsons for Appellant.

I. It does not appear that Bayerque made any promise or agreement with the plaintiff, or with any one under whom the plaintiff claims.

Hilison v. Jackson Water Company.

It is not stated with whom, in what way, at what time, or under what circumstances, Bayerque "adopted," or "ratified," or "recognized," the contract. It is difficult to ascertain what is meant by his adopting, ratifying or recognizing a contract to which he does not appear to have been either party or privy. Bayerque cannot be charged upon contract, without its being alleged what contract he made. Can any one tell from the complaint, what contract he made? With whom it was made? The terms of it? The consideration? When to be performed? What Bayerque was to do? and what the party contracting with him was to do, or was to pay?

But, did Bayerque agree to pay the plaintiff for his work? No such thing is claimed. Did Bayerque agree that the company would pay the plaintiff? That is not claimed. Did he undertake to guarantee the performance of the contract by the company? There is no such allegation, in terms; and if there were, such guaranty would be void as within the Statute of Frauds.

II. Bayerque is not liable upon any of the allegations in the complaint, because any promise or undertaking which might be inferred from them, would be void within the Statute of Frauds, as a special promise to answer for the debt, default, or miscarriage of another. Compiled Laws, 200, 201, sec. 12.

If it can be gathered from the complaint that Bayerque made any contract whatever, it is, that he undertook to perform a contract which the Jackson Water Company had made, and which it was their duty to perform; in other words, to answer for the debt, default or miscarriage of the company. And this comes not only within the terms of the statute, but within the very mischief which the statute was intended to guard against. If a person can be made liable, on such loose generalities as are contained in this complaint, to perform a contract entered into by another, the statute would be of no effect. Indeed, such a construction would amount to a judicial repeal of it, and the gate would be thrown wide open for all the frauds and perjuries which the statute was made to shut out of Courts of Justice.

It is not pretended that Bayerque "subscribed" any "agreement," or note, or memorandum thereof, expressing the consideration<sup>16</sup> in writing." His agreement, therefore, was void. This seems too plain to admit of discussion.

Ellison v. Jackson Water Company.

It is unnecessary to go over the authorities on this point, inasmuch as the case of Clay et al. v. Walton, 9 Cal. 328, saves us that trouble. The entire opinion of the Court might, with strict propriety, be embodied in this case; for the reasoning upon which it proceeds, and the authorities cited in support of it, are as applicable to the facts now before the Court, as they were to the facts in that case. And I ask the Court to consider that opinion as embodied verbatim in this argument.

III. Though the contract be valid, the law gave no lien for the work done under it.

No lien was given by the common law, and there is no statute giving one.

The Statute of 1850 (Compiled Laws, p. 808) gave a lien only on a "building or wharf." Under this Act it was held, (Burt v. Washington, 3 Cal. R. 246) that a bridge was not a "building," within the meaning of the Act, and was not subject to a mechanic's lien. Clearly it was not a "wharf."

But by the Act of 1853, (Compiled Laws, 811, 812) the Act of 1850 was extended so as to "include in its provisions bridges, ditches, flumes, or aqueducts, constructed to create hydraulic power, or for mining purposes," etc.

By the Act of 1855, (Laws of 1855, pp. 156-159, sec. 12) the Act of 1850 was repealed, which repeal, of course, carried with it the amendment of 1853; for, after such repeal of the Act of 1850, there was left no method of enforcing the amendment of 1853, and this amendment became, by reason of such repeal, a dead letter.

The same Act of 1850 was again repealed by the Statute of 1856. Laws of 1856, pp. 203-205, sec. 11.

The contract in question was made in December, 1855. The work under it was performed between the twenty-second day of December, 1855, and the twenty-eighth day of January, 1857, and must, therefore, have been mostly, if not entirely, done after the Act of 1856 took effect.

It might, therefore, be a very nice question, which act must govern

Ellison v. Jackson Water Company.

---

the case. But there is no need of discussing that question here, as the plaintiff can have no lien under either Act.

Both these Acts give a lien only upon a "building, wharf, or superstructure." See Laws of 1855, p. 156, sec. 1; Laws of 1856, p. 203, sec. 1.

These statutes, from 1850 to 1856, being in pari materia, must all be construed together, as forming one general system. (Dwarris on Stat. 568-572.) In this way we arrive at the meaning of the several terms used by the Legislature.

The Legislature, by repealing the Act of 1853, which in terms gave a lien on "ditches, flumes and aqueducts, constructed to create hydraulic power, or for mining purposes," and by omitting these terms in the Acts of 1855 and 1856, have declared, as explicitly as they could, without using express negative words, that they did not intend to give a lien on "ditches, flumes, aqueducts," etc.

Even though we could not, however, resort to this clear legislative construction, and were left to interpret the Statutes of 1855 and 1856, from their terms alone, we must arrive at the same conclusion. The words used in these two Acts are the same — "building, wharf, or superstructure"; and it would be deserving of nothing but ridicule, to suppose a mining "ditch" to be included within either category, were it not that we are treating of serious matter, and that important interests are at stake.

The language of these Acts, giving rights in derogation of the common law, must be construed strictly. Bottomly v. The Rector, etc., 2 Cal. R. 91; Houghton v. Blake, 5 Cal. R. 240.

We have seen that a "bridge" is not a "building or wharf," (3 Cal. R. 246) much less, then, is a "ditch." Is the latter a "superstructure?" There might be some plausibility in calling a "bridge" a "superstructure." But a "ditch" — who would think of denominating a "ditch" a superstructure! We might as well call a hole in the ground a "superstructure."

A building and a wharf are classed by these Acts within the term "superstructure." The language is, "building, wharf, or other superstructure." The meaning, then, of the term "superstructure," extends only to things analogous to a "building," or to a "wharf;" and thus, the benefit of the Acts is extended only to "other superstructures," of a character similar to a "building" or a "wharf."

---

Again: that this is the true construction is made still more manifest by the language used in sec. 5 of Stat. of 1855, and by sec. 4. of Stat. of 1856.

Did these statutes give a lien for digging a tunnel through a mountain? Why not, if it gives a lien for digging a "ditch" around one?

If the latter can be deemed a superstructure, I see no reason why the former should not be also. But the plaintiff might as well claim that the cayote has a lien upon his hole, "together with a convenient space around the same," or so "much as may be required for the convenient use and occupation of the premises."

I. It is claimed by counsel that the complaint does not charge that Bayerque contracted with Ellison. The allegation is, that Ellison notified Bayerque of the terms of his contract, and demanded his adoption of it; and in "consideration that Ellison would do the work and comply with the contract on his part, Bayerque adopted, ratified and confirmed it on his part." The contracting parties are tolerably clearly defined.

We refer the Court to the definition of "a contract" given in counsel's brief; from 3d Blackstone, 442, as our authority on this point, and then direct their attention to that part of the complaint of which the foregoing is an extract.

II. The next error assigned grows out of the attempt to enforce a lien, and counsel has construed statutes and cited authorities on statutory liens sufficient to make a very good library on that question. In reply it is not necessary to admit or deny his logic. It is sufficient to remind this Court that there were such things as equitable liens, and liens ex contractu, before our statute was made. We have heretofore been of the opinion, that if by contract a workman was to retain his work until he was paid therefor, that he had a lien on the work, not only as against the party for whom the work was done, but as against all the world. And we have further understood, that as against the owner, equity always gave the vendor, laborer, mechanic or architect a lien for the price.

Ellison v. Jackson Water Company.

---

Let us see if we were right, when tested by authority.

In Bagley v. Greenleaf, the equitable lien of the vendor for the purchase money as against the vendee is fully recognized and confirmed, and many cases are cited in support of the decision. 7 Wheaton U. S. Reports, page 46; Cox v. Fenwick, 3 Bibb, 183; Fish v. Howland, 1 Paige, 29.

Independently of the general equitable lien, however, there was a contracted lien. The words of the contract are, that respondent is to have half the water running in the main flume, and is himself to sell the same and collect the rents thereof, until he is entirely paid. In other words, the work itself is pledged for the payment of the contract price, and respondent was entitled to possession of it by virtue of this pledge.

In conclusion, upon this point we differ with the learned counsel as to the effect of our statute.

It is admitted, that by the lien law of 1853, a statutory lien independent of the contract, would have existed. A reference to the law will show that the Act of 1853 was an independent Act of the Legislature which extended the provisions of the Act of 1850 to ditches, flumes, etc. Then, in the reading of the Act of 1853, the words used in the law of 1850, should be considered part and parcel of the latter law. There was no repugnancy in their respective provisions, and the latter Act stood as if all the words of the former had been engrossed in and made a part of the latter.

The Act of 1855 only repealed the law of 1850. The subsequent law was not affected by this repeal. The fact that the same words in the law of 1850, as were used in the law of 1853, were stricken out of that law, would not by any reasonable construction strike them out of the other. There is nothing in the law of 1855 repugnant to the law of 1853. The only persons affected by the law of 1855, are the mechanics and builders of houses, wharves, and superstructures. So far as the law of 1850 affected this class of liens, it was repealed, but so far as the lien of laborers and material men on ditches, flumes and the like, were concerned, they were left where the law of 1853 had placed them. See Act of 1855, page 159, sec. 12.

In the construction of legislative enactments, Courts will so construe the law as to give effect to all the legislative declaration, and where there are two statutes on the same subject, the Court will, if possible, so construe them as to give effect to each. 1 Blackstone's Com. 89. Opinion of Chief Justice Murray, Cheever v. Hays, 3d California, p. 537.

"Another rule of equal importance is, that remedial statutes are to be liberally construed, and so as to most effectually secure the beneficial end in view." Broom's Legal Maxims, marginal, p. 247.

Another salutary rule is, that a "law shall not be repealed by implication. The repealing Act must either contain repealing words or be couched in negative language." And again: "If both Acts be merely affirmative, and the substance such that both may stand together, they shall both have concurrent efficacy. 1 Blackstone, marginal pages 89 and 90.

But it is argued that the repeal of the law of 1850 took away the remedies of the Act of 1853. This argument seems to us wholly untenable. The Act of 1850 provided benefits to one class of persons; the Act of 1853 provided them to another class. The repeal of the Act for the former did not affect the latter.

III. As to the argument founded on the Statute of Frauds, we confess our inability to apply it to the case at bar. Every word of Bayerque's promises were in writing. The contract itself, when Bayerque took hold of it, was only executory. The consideration had not passed, a debt had not been created, but on the contrary, his promise was his own. The consideration was expressed in Parsons' letter to Captain Ellison. "If you extend the ditch," the promise was, "the extension shall be pledged for payment." In the stipulation made in the case of Bayerque v. "The Jackson Water Company," the consideration was again expressed "that Capt. Ellison do the work contracted for." The promise was, "that he be paid therefor according to his contract."

It is unnecessary to pass in review the several objections raised on demurrer to the sufficiency of the complaint, and which are urged upon the attention of the Court by the counsel of the appellant in a very elaborate brief, as the case can be disposed of upon its merits, independent of any question of pleading. The action is brought to recover a judgment against the Jackson Water Company and Bayerque, for work performed by the plaintiff in the construction of a ditch, under an alleged contract between him and the company, made in December, 1855, and to obtain a decree enforcing a lien claimed for the work upon the ditch thus constructed. Other parties were made defendants but as no judgment passed against them, they may be dismissed from the consideration of the case. The action, as against the company, rests upon the alleged contract, and as against Bayerque, upon what is inaptly termed by the plaintiff its "adoption and ratification" by him. The contract purports to have been made on the part of the company, by only three of its five trustees; one of that number acting as attorney in fact for the third; but whether for this reason, or for any of the reasons assigned, it was without binding obligation, it is immaterial to inquire. The company have not appealed from the judgment, and cannot, therefore, raise any question as to the legality of the contract, and the defense of Bayerque rests upon independent grounds. As against the company, the judgment for damages must be affirmed. It is only necessary, then, to determine the effect of the alleged "adoption and ratification" of Bayerque, and the validity of the lien asserted upon the ditch.

It cannot in strictness be said that Bayerque "adopted and ratified" the contract between the plaintiff and the company. These terms are properly applicable only to contracts made by a party acting or assuming to act for another. The latter may then adopt or ratify the act of the former, however unauthorized. To adoption and ratification there must be some relation, actual or assumed, of principal and agent. No such relation existed between the company and Bayerque; the contract between it and Ellison was not made in Bayerque's name, or for his benefit, or upon any authority from him. What the plaintiff, however, intends by these terms, is this: that Bayerque assumed the obligations of the company to Ellison upon the contract, or in other words, guaranteed the performance of the contract on the part of the company. In examining, then, the evidence contained in the record, we find nothing which establishes or even tends to establish any undertaking upon which Bayerque can be personally charged. The stipulation of the solicitor in the foreclosure suit only goes to the extent of authorizing the Receiver to apply one-half of the net proceeds of the extension of Ellison, in pursuance of his contract with the company. It does not purport to make any new contract, or to assume any obligation on the part of Bayerque, even had the solicitor possessed any power to do so, of which there is no pretense. The certificate of the Receiver, based upon such stipulation, and the supposed authority of his appointment, acknowledging and confirming the contract, was utterly inoperative to charge Bayerque. Neither the order or stipulation gave the least power to the Receiver to execute any such acknowledgment and confirmation. And, besides, the Receiver testifies that neither Bayerque nor any of his agents either knew of it or assented to it. The letter of Parsons does not even purport to have been written on behalf of Bayerque, or by his direction, or with his knowledge or approbation. It purports to have been written after a consultation with T. F. Moss, who is not a party to the suit. This Moss was, it would seem, a superintendent of the affairs of Bayerque in connection with the water ditch, but that his authority went beyond an ordinary superintendence nowhere appears. No evidence was given that he possessed any power to make an original substantive contract of the character claimed by the plaintiff. The record is bare of any attempt to establish the possession of such a power.

Ellison v. Jackson Water Company.

---

But aside from this view of the case upon the record, there is another fatal objection to the plaintiff's recovery. The undertaking which he seeks to establish against Bayerque falls within the Statute of Frauds. It is an undertaking to perform a contract which the Jackson Water Company had made, and which it was obligatory upon the company to perform; in other words, it was an undertaking to answer for the debt, default or miscarriage of another. By the 12th section of our Statute of Frauds, which is substantially borrowed from the 4th section of the English statutes of 29 Charles II, it is essential to the validity of any such contract, that it, or some note or memorandum thereof, be in writing; that it express the consideration; and that it be subscribed by the party to be charged thereby. Neither of these particulars are found in the present case. There was no agreement in writing, or any note or memorandum of any agreement, and of course it would be idle in such case to speak of the want of an express consideration or the subscription of the party. The plaintiff was bound by his contract to perform certain work for the Jackson Water Company. A promise to Bayerque to perform this contract could furnish no consideration for a promise by him. The consideration of the original contract could not attach to the subsequent promise. On this point the authorities are numerous, and without conflict. Clay v. Walton, decided by this Court, (9 Cal. 328) is one, and the cases cited in the opinion fully sustain the position.

Millson v. Jackson Water Company.

In Packett v. Bates, (4 Ala. 390) the plaintiff had agreed with one Kelly to construct a house, at the usual rate of charges. Whilst the house was in the progress of erection, Kelly left the State, and went to Louisiana. The defendant then verbally promised to pay the plaintiff, if he would proceed and complete the work; and it was held the promise was collateral, and within the statute, and consequently without binding effect. The consideration resting wholly in the performance by the plaintiff of his antecedent contract, did not support the promise of the defendant.

The remaining question for determination relates to the validity of the lien asserted by the plaintiff upon the ditch. The Act of 1850 gave mechanic's lien only upon buildings and wharves. (Comp. Laws 808.) The Act of 1853 extended the Act of 1850, so as to include in its provisions bridges, ditches, flumes or aqueducts constructed to create hydraulic power, or for mining purposes. (Comp. Laws, 811.) The Act of 1855 repealed the Act of 1850. (Session Laws, 156, sec. 12.) The repeal carried with it the supplementary Act of 1853, which extended the provisions of the original Act. Without the original Act, there was no mode of enforcing the supplementary Act. The latter was so dependent upon the former as to become utterly inoperative upon the repeal. The Act of 1855 gave a lien only upon buildings, wharves and other superstructures. The same is the case with the Statute of 1856. The work for which the plaintiff asserts a lien, was performed between the twenty-second of December, 1855, and the first of February, 1857, and was therefore chiefly done after the Act of 1856 took effect. It is immaterial, however, under which Act the work was done, as both give a lien upon the same structures; neither gives a lien upon ditches in terms. The flumes constructed at different parts of the line cannot change the general character of the work as an excavation. These flumes were mere connecting links of the ditch, over ravines and gulches. As a ditch, then, the general work must be regarded, and as such, the statute gives no lien upon it for labor bestowed, or materials furnished, in its construction. The language of the statute is, "building, wharf or other superstructure." A ditch, of course, is not, a building, or a wharf, and in no sense can it be designated a superstructure.

Ellison v. Jackson Water Company.

---

The plaintiff cannot, therefore, maintain the lien he asserts, under the statute; and outside of the statute, there is no lien which can be enforced. Equity raises no lien in relation to real estate, except that of a vendor for the purchase money.

We purposely refrain from the expression of any opinion on the point whether Bayerque acquired any lien by his mortgage, or any right by his purchase, under the decree in the foreclosure case, upon the extension constructed by the plaintiff. The mortgage, it is true, does, in terms, purport to cover, not merely the works completed, or in progress at the time, but also lines of ditches and flumes for conducting or distributing water, which might be thereafter constructed by the company, as appurtenant to, or connected with, the works. This broad language cannot, however, we apprehend, give a lien upon ditches, for the construction of which no steps had been taken, by a survey and location of their lines, and which rested merely in contemplation. Some specific right of way — capable of identification from a previous survey or location — would seem to be necessary to constitute such property as is capable of mortgage or transfer, so as to pass subsequently constructed works thereon. In the present case, it does not appear from the record, whether, at the date of the mortgage, any survey or location had been made of the line of the extension: and without it, the property was not covered by the mortgage, and did not pass by the master's deed. It would still remain subject to execution on the plaintiff's judgment, as the property of the company. The effect, however, of the mortgage in creating a lien, cannot be determined upon the evidence in the present case.

Fraser v. Sears Union Water Co.

It follows, from the views we have taken, that the judgment for damages against the Jackson Water Company, must be affirmed, and that the judgment for damages against Bayerque, and the decree adjudging a lien upon the works constructed by the plaintiff, must be reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings.

Ordered accordingly.

FRALER et al. v. SEARS UNION WATER CO.

Is an action for injuries to a mining claim, a claim for damages to the plaintiff by reason of the breaking away of the defendant's dam, and the consequent washing away of the pay-dirt of the plaintiff, may properly be joined with a claim for damages in the preventing plaintiff from working his claim.

The owner of the dam is bound to see to his own property, and to so govern and control it, that injury may not result to his neighbors.

The want of reasonable care on the part of another, who is injured by the breaking, cannot be set up in defense to an action for damages for the injuries thus suffered.

APPEAL from the Fourteenth District, County of Sierra.

This was an action for damages resulting from the careless and negligent construction of a dam by the defendants, across a stream, and the consequent injury therefrom, to the plaintiffs' mining claim.

The plaintiffs had judgment in the Court below, and the defendants appealed.

The facts are sufficiently stated in the opinion of the Court.

Francis J. Dunn for Appellants.

The complaint is defective in this, that this Court has well said, that although the form of actions, under our Practice Act, has been well defined, yet as to the matter of complaint, as of old, two separate causes of action — unless in the same class — may not be joined without the distinctive features dividing them. Keegan & Co. of Cold Spring

Fraser v. Sears Union Water Co.

Co. v. Bigelow et al. of Bigelow Co., Jan. Term, Supreme Court of California, 1847.

In this case, then, is a clear conflict with the rule laid down in the case above referred to, in this: that the cause of action, that is, for the breaking of the dam of the defendants, and the consequent injury resulting therefrom, is joined with a count in the same complaint, mixed and joined for damage, in consequence of the plaintiffs being prevented from working their claims.

We say, the demurrer should have been sustained, in virtue of the fact, as set forth in the demurrer, that the true cause of action is not stated in the complaint. At common law, we take it, that the cause, as the facts elicited, was one in trespass only, being immediate and not consequential; yet the said complaint is one for consequential damages.

The action is in the nature of an action of trespass; although the count or complaint is in case, the two could not be joined.

1st. The instructions given for plaintiffs, numbered 1, 3, 6 and 7, refer to the degree of negligence of defendants, in the construction of their dam, which would render them liable for injuries resulting from its breakage.

In the case of Tenney v. The Miners' Ditch Co., (April Term, 1857) this Court said: "There is no doubt that the owners of a ditch would be liable for wanton injury or gross negligence, even if prior in point of time." We do not believe that this Court intended to say that the ditch owners, prior in point of time, would be liable only for wanton injury or gross negligence; but in the case at bar, we may safely admit that it was the intention of this Court, in the case cited, to extend the limit of the ditch owners' liability to that extreme, for every one of the plaintiffs' instructions call upon the jury to find for plaintiffs, only in case they find the defendants guilty of gross negligence or recklessness.

It was the breakage which caused the injury, and no care of plaintiffs in the management of their property, could have prevented it. Hence defendants' instructions were properly refused. Cook v. Cham-

BALDWIN, J., delivered the opinion of the Court — TERRY, C. J., concurring.

This was an action for injuries to mining claims, and loss of gold-bearing earth, occasioned by the negligent building of defendants' dam across and over a ravine, upon which the plaintiffs' claims were located — the claims being above the dam. The injury is charged to have resulted to the plaintiffs, from the careless construction of the dam, and a reservoir, whereby the gold-bearing earth of the plaintiffs was washed away by the water and lost, and other injuries done to their mining claims and property.

The defendants demurred to the complaint, and assigned several technical causes of demurrer. The main ground taken here in argument is, that there is a misjoinder of causes of action in the complaint in this: that the complaint claims damages for the immediate injury by the breaking of the dam, to the pay-dirt, etc., of the plaintiffs, and also to the plaintiffs in preventing them from working their claim. But this is no misjoinder — if the objection be warranted by the facts — even according to the rules of common law pleading, which recognized the nice, and now obsolete, distinction between the action of trespass vi et armis, and the action of trespass on the case. For either of these classes of damages, the form of remedy would be case by the old rule; the gist of the action not being the erection or breaking of the dam, but the negligence — the indirect consequence of which negligence was the injury — just as in cases of injuries caused by the not keeping of streets in repair, and the like. Chitty on Pleadings, 1 vol. 126.

The complaint seems to be well drawn, and sufficiently states the facts, viz.: that the plaintiffs, before the committing the grievances complained of, owned and possessed the premises injured, and that the defendants carelessly, negligently and unskillfully built the dam and reservoir, and filled it with great quantities of water, which they detained at and along the dam, thereby causing the plaintiffs' claims to overflow, and the gold-dirt to be washed away, and the claims to remain unworked, etc.

Prater v. Sears Union Water Co.

Numerous instructions were given, and several were refused. The Court instructed the jury that the plaintiff could not recover unless the defendant was guilty of gross negligence. This was repeated in a variety of forms. We think that, if any fault is to be found with the charges given, it is that they were too favorable to the defendant.

An instruction (marked No. 4 of those asked by the defendant) was refused, and the refusal excepted to. The Court was asked to charge that, if the jury believe that the injuries could have been prevented by the exercise of reasonable care on the part of the plaintiffs, they must find for the defendant. This was refused. If such an instruction be proper in any case, it is not in this. The plaintiffs were in no default for keeping their property on their own premises, nor were they bound to remove it, nor to rebuild or alter the defendant's dam. He could not be held to the knowledge of the consequences, or the probable injuries resulting from the defendant's negligence. The defendant was bound to see to his own property, and to so govern and control it, that injury would not result to his neighbor's. If, in consequence of gross neglect, on the part of the plaintiffs, the injury happened, a different rule might be applied; but a mere want of reasonable care to prevent the injury, does not impair the right to recover. We apprehend, if a man carelessly fires a gun into the street, that it would scarcely be admissible for him, when sued for the injury done another by it, to say that, by reasonable care, the other might have got out of the way. The instructions given in this general form, if the substance could be supported under any given state of facts, could only be to mislead the jury in this case; for what would be reasonable care under the circumstances? What should the plaintiffs have done? Should they have controlled the property of defendant? or removed his own effects? if so, when? or inspected the dam — or offered to repair it — or given formal notice of defects? These inquiries show the danger of such an instruction, as well as illustrate the radical error it embodies. See Lynch v. Nurdin, 1 Adol. & El. 29.

Several other instructions were asked, but the substance of them had already been given; and the body of the charges—some twelve or more—presented to the jury, fully and clearly, the propositions of law which applied to the whole case, and every material point, and enabled the jury fairly to pass upon the entire issue.

We cannot interfere with their verdict, there being some evidence upon which it can rest.

Some other errors were assigned, but we think it unnecessary to notice them.

The judgment is affirmed.

BALDWIN v. SIMPSON.

Where a party takes possession of a tract of land, and incloses it with a fence consisting of posts seven feet apart, and one board, six inches wide, nailed on to the posts, and the same is not sufficient to turn cattle, and the land is not cultivated, such possession is not sufficient to sustain an action of ejectment as against a party in possession of a part of the tract, under a deed to the whole. Possession of a part, under a deed to the whole tract, where the possessor's grantors had the land surveyed, and the lines marked by the blazing of trees, is sufficient possession as against a party who enters upon a part of the tract, and builds a fence wholly insufficient for any other purpose than to mark the line of his claim.

APPEAL from the Eleventh District, County of Placer.

This was an action to recover the possession of a tract of land, and for an injunction to restrain the defendant from cutting and moving timber therefrom.

The land in controversy is probably a part of the public domain. The claims of both parties are stated in the opinion of the Court. The cause was tried in the Court below by a jury, who returned a verdict for the defendant, and judgment was entered thereon; plaintiff appealed to this Court.

Tuttle & Hillyer for Appellant.

B. F. Myers for Respondent.

BALDWIN, J., delivered the opinion of the Court—FIELD, J., concurring.

This was a controversy for a piece of land—forty acres. Defendant claimed under a deed for four hundred and eighty acres; his predecessor had it surveyed and the trees blazed; and the defendant entered under the deed into actual possession. The plaintiff afterwards entered upon this forty-acre tract, but did not reside on it. He inclosed it with a board fence, but the fence was insufficient to keep out cattle, etc.—the fence being one board in height. The land was not cultivated in any way, and was chiefly valuable for its timber.

We do not think the points of appellant well taken. The plaintiff was not entitled to recover on this statement, against the defendant. He had no sufficient possession to justify a recovery against the defendant. The fence, such as it was, if sufficient under other circumstances to show possession, was not sufficient as against a party in possession of part, under claim to the whole. We do not see why a survey, a stake and blazed trees, are not equal to such a fence as this was, to show possession. The rule, we believe, is general, that a party entering under a deed with specific boundaries, and holding actual possession of part, is to be taken as against a mere trespasser, as in possession of all the land within the boundaries of his deed; at least, he could not be dispossessed by one who merely comes on part of the land, to build a fence entirely insufficient for any other purpose than to mark the line of his claim.

Upon this admitted state of facts, the plaintiff was not entitled to recover, and the Court might have so charged the jury. The plaintiff was not prejudiced by the errors assigned, if there were any; but we think there was no material error.

Judgment affirmed.

MORLEY v. DICKINSON *et al.

Plaintiff was surety on a contract for the payment of money, upon which judgment was obtained against all the parties, and execution was subsequently issued and levied upon property of the principal sufficient to satisfy the same. After the levy, the Sheriff, under the directions of the plaintiff in execution, took the principal's note for the amount of the judgment, and released the levy. Subsequently, a second execution was issued upon the judgment, and an attempt made to levy it on the property of plaintiff; Held, That the release of the levy of the first execution, and the taking of the principal's note, discharged the surety.

The contract, until rescinded by the return of the note, was sufficient to postpone any right to enforce the execution, although the note may have been given in fraud.

APPEAL from the Thirteenth District, County of Stanislaus.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

Morley v. Dickinson.

---

L. Quint & Jas. W. Coffroth for Appellants.

I. The plaintiffs had the right, any time within five years, to issue execution upon the judgment, provided it was unsatisfied. See Practice Act, 209.

The execution, with the return of the Sheriff, (which is made a part of the complaint) did not operate as a satisfaction. The return, after reciting a levy upon certain personal property, reads as follows: "I return this execution, satisfied by two notes of hand — one for $91.72, the other for $650 — making in all $741.72; and the above property is released."

II. The Sheriff had not the power to discharge the execution even by returning it satisfied, unless he proceed and execute it in due course of law.

The taking of a negotiable promissory note, receipting as payment, and returning the execution satisfied, would not operate as a discharge of the execution (much less of the judgment) even though the defendant afterwards pay such note to third parties, to whom it has been transferred. Bank of Orange Co. v. Wakeman, 1 Cowen's R. 46.

E. F. Hunter for Respondent.

1st. The levy of the execution on sufficient personal property of one of the judgment debtors, was a satisfaction of the judgment. The authorities are clear on this point. Vide Hoyt v. Hudson, 12 Johns. 207; Ladd v. Blant, 4 Mass. 403; 1 Salk. 322; Ex parte Lawrence, 4 Cowen, 417; Ontario Bank v. Hallett, 8 Cowen, 194.

BALDWIN, J., delivered the opinion of the Court — FIELD, J., concurring.

Plaintiff filed this bill in equity, alleging that he was surety on a contract for other parties, and judgment was recovered against all the makers thereof, himself included; that execution issued on this judgment, and was levied on sufficient personal property of one of the principals; that the Sheriff released the property on the giving by the principal of his promissory note; the Sheriff returned the execution satisfied — stating these facts; and further, that defendants — plaintiffs in the execution — have sued out another execution, and are proceeding to levy it on the property of plaintiff here; that the promissory note for all except the costs due on the execution was received by the plaintiffs in execution, who participated in and assented to this arrangement.

Morley v. Dickinson.

---

It seems that the note so received by the plaintiffs was sued on by them, and a recovery defeated.

These facts, with some others not material, are found by the Court. The case was tried by the Judge, and a decree of perpetual injunction rendered. We think the decree right. The creditor having secured his debt by a levy on the property of the principal debtor, could not discharge the levy to the injury of the surety. Any extension for a definite period by the creditor to the principal, without the assent of the surety, if the contract be on good consideration, discharges the surety. So any discharge of securities of the principal in the hands, or within the power of the creditor, operates a like discharge of the liability of the surety. This has been held in many cases, and is a well settled principle of law. Parsons on Cont. 510, 514, and cases in note W to P, 511.

In this case, the money might have been made by the plaintiffs in execution, had they not voluntarily released the property subject to the process. Whether the note was given in fraud or not, the contract, until rescinded by the return of the note, was effectual to postpone any right to enforce the execution; but no such rescission seems to have been made.

Although some minor errors may have intervened, yet as this is an equity case, and the facts above stated are not affected by the alleged errors, we think there is no sufficient reason shown for disturbing the decree. It is affirmed.

Ingoldsbey v. Juan.

INGOLDSBY v. JUAN et al.

- A deed properly executed and acknowledged by the wife, of her separate property, with the assent of her husband underwritten, not under seal, but properly acknowledged, is sufficient to pass the title.
- Lands acquired by a married woman, under the Mexican laws, and which were her separate estate, might be conveyed, before the adoption of our statute, with the bare assent of the husband, by any informal instrument, or, possibly, without writing. By our Constitution, property thus acquired is the separate estate of the wife; she does not, therefore, look to our statute respecting conveyances, as the source of her authority to sell or dispose of her property. On the contrary, the statutes are a limitation upon the power — prescribing a new and distinct mode of conveying the land or evidencing the sale or disposition of it. It disables her from disposing of her property as she could before have done. So far as the disability is clearly evidenced, the restraint exists; but it goes no further to restrain her than this manifest intent. She retains all her original rights and powers over the subject, except such as are expressly taken away.
- In such case, the joining of the husband in the conveyance is not for the purpose of passing title, for he has none to convey. It is only as a precaution against imposition, or to afford her his protection, or similar reasons of policy or to evidence his renunciation of the right to manage or control it.
- A deed which recites the title of the wife, and then declares that the husband unites in the conveyance, in pursuance of the statute, is sufficient.
- Literal conformity with the statute concerning conveyances of the separate property of the wife, as a general rule, is not required. A substantial compliance is all that is necessary.
- It is a familiar rule, recognised by this and all other Courts, that where several papers, concerning the same subject matter, are executed by or between the same parties at the same time, all are to be construed together as one instrument.
- There is no peculiar form for the signing of a deed. Any writing which clearly shows that a party has adopted a sealed instrument as his own, intended to be bound by the contents of it, is, if not a formal, at least a sufficient execution to satisfy the statute.
- The sixth section of the Act concerning Husband and Wife, relates only to separate property acquired after the passage of the Act. No retrospective operation was intended, or, perhaps, could have been given to it. In such cases the statute only operates upon future transactions and matters.
- A County Clerk may take and certify an acknowledgment to a deed, although he has no seal of office. This general phrase, "having a seal," was only intended to denote a Court of Record, which is defined to be a Court having a seal. The power of the Clerk was never intended to be made to depend upon the fact of his having procured this article, or the care with which he preserved it.

APPEAL from the Seventh District, County of Contra Costa.

Ingoldby v. Juan.

This was an action of ejectment. The facts are stated in the opinion of the Court, but will, probably, be better understood by setting forth the amended answer of the defendants, which presents the question upon which the opinion of the Court is based. It is as follows:

"That all the right, title or interest which Martina Castro ever had in any part of the demanded premises, was held by her before her marriage with Lewis Depeaux, in 1849, and before the adoption of the Constitution of this State, and, that the same was her separate property; that she, in August, A. D. 1850, with the knowledge, consent and concurrence of her husband, made a deed to her children, for a valuable consideration, purporting to convey to them eight-ninths of the demanded premises, which conveyed an equitable title, and converted her into a trustee for their use and benefit; that all the rights which the children took under that deed, had, by divers conveyances, vested in the defendants; that the children entered into possession of the property, after the execution of the aforesaid deed, with the consent of the aforesaid Martina and her husband; and that they and defendants had made improvements to the amount of $18,700, which were now on the premises demanded; that plaintiff and his co-tenant and grantor subsequently purchased the demanded premises of the said Martina Castro and her husband, with reference to her said deed to her children, and with full and actual notice thereof, and that the price paid by them was about one-half of the ninth part of the demanded premises, which she, in said deed to her children, reserved to herself; and that they purchased with full and actual notice of the rights of the defendants — of their possession and of the value of their improvements; and defendants deny any interference with the said Martina or plaintiff, in the enjoyment of the remaining one-ninth part of the land sought to be recovered." This answer was sworn to.

Plaintiff moved to strike out the amended answer upon the following grounds:

1st. Because the same was irrelevant.

2d. Because the same set up a sham defense.

The Court ruled that the amendment should be stricken out, unless defendants should elect to rely on such amendment to the exclusion of the original answer; and defendants refusing so to elect, the amendment was stricken out, and defendants excepted.

R. F. Peckham for Appellant.

The first question presented in this connection is, whether the Act of April 17th, 1850, applies to property acquired before its passage. That it was not the intention of the Legislature that the Act should be so applied, appears from the fifteenth section thereof, which reads: "The rights of husband and wife, married in this State prior to the passage of this Act, or married out of this State, but who shall reside and acquire property herein, shall also be determined by the provisions of this Act, with respect to such property as shall be hereafter acquired." (Wood's Dig., art. 2616, sec. 15.) Martina Castro and her husband were married prior to the passage of the Act, and the property was previously acquired. If it was the understanding of the Legislature, that the provisions of the Act were to govern parties before then married in relation to all their property, there was no necessity of section 15 applying them to such persons as to property thereafter acquired; the maxim, expressio unius exclusio alterius est, must be applied, and the conclusion is obvious, that the Act under consideration has no application to property held by a woman married in this State before its passage. But, discarding the provisions of section 15, and the position that the Act would then have no application to parties married before its passage as to property before then acquired, would be fully sustained by the case of Sawyer v. Plumb, 21 Conn. Reports.

We are to contemplate the feme covert, before the passage of this Act, with reference to the laws then in force, and the rights and capacities which she enjoyed under them, and which were fixed, guaranteed, and protected by the Constitution, and ask whether they have been divested or abridged by the Act in question? In examining the question, we are to regard the wife as clothed with a separate legal existence so far as her separate property is concerned: in this we are supported by authority. Edrington v. Mayfield, 5 Texas; Wood v. Wheeler, 7 Texas; Holmes v. Holmes, 4 Barbour; Harney v. Hill, 7 Texas, 591.

In Mitchell v. Tucker, (10 Mis. 260) Scott, Justice, delivering the opinion of the Court, says: "By the Spanish law, which prevailed here prior to the introduction of the common law, lands might have been aliened by parol; this is settled. So in the civil laws, which is the foundation of the Spanish system of laws, no verbal solemnities were required to give validity to a contract; all that was required was the apprehension and consent of each party, expressed in any form of words."

Ingoldsbey v. Juan.

---

Thus stood the law, and her power and rights in regard to the alienation of her property, until the adoption of the Constitution, which declares the rights of husband and wife, (see Wood's Dig. p. 36, sec. 14) which was adopted from the Constitution of Texas. This clause placed husband and wife upon terms of equality, so far as their separate property is concerned. See the remarks of this Court in Selover v. The Russian American Co., January Term, A. D. 1857, in connection with the following cases from the Supreme Court of Texas: Edrington v. Mayfield, 5 Texas, 363; McRay v. Treadwell, 8 Texas, 176; Womack v. Womack, 8 Texas, 397.

Under this Constitution, and the laws then in force, she was vested with as full, perfect and absolute title to her separate property, as the husband possessed in reference to his, and the right of alienation was an inseparable incident to such ownership. She could sell and dispose of the same as she pleased, without the interference of her husband. American Home Society v. Wadhams, 10 Barb. 597; 2 Story Eq., sec. 1390; Roper, 177, 198; Vanderhayden v. Mallory, 1 Comst. 452.

We hold that this right, and power of alienation, could not be abridged or divested by any subsequent legislative enactment, and that all laws requiring her husband to join with her in the deed, to enable her to alienate her separate estate, are abridgments of her vested rights in the property under the Constitution, and are null and void; and in support of our position upon this point, offer to the Court for consideration the following authorities: Wilkinson v. Leland, 2 Pet. 627; Wilson v. The State of New Jersey, 5 Cranch, 164; Westervelt v. Gregg, 2 Kernan, 202; Commercial Bank of Natchez v. Chambers et al., 8 S. & M.

But it is not upon the ground alone that the Act divests vested rights, that appellants contend that it is unconstitutional; but also upon the ground that it impairs the obligations of the married contract. We have seen that by the law of the marriage in 1849, Martina Castro could convey without his joining with her in the deed; and this law was a contract on his part, that she should enjoy and exercise that privilege. Smith v. Smith, 1 Texas, 621; Holmes v. Holmes, 4 Barb. 295; Edrington v. Mayfield, 5 Texas; Womack v. Womack, 8 Texas, 397; Hooper v. Smith, 23 Ala. R.; Woods v. Wheeler, 7 Texas, 13; Selover v. The Russian Co., 7 Cal. 266.

---

The principles laid down in these cases show conclusively that the deed in question was valid, and binding upon Martina Castro, notwithstanding the Act of April 16th, A. D. 1850, without the signature of the husband, or her private acknowledgment.

But we insist, that if her separate acknowledgment was necessary to pass her title, that the acknowledgment by her on the day of execution of the deed, taken and certified by Peter Tracy, Clerk of the County Court, and the certificate thereof, were in all things sufficient to entitle the deed to be read in evidence; he was Clerk of a Court having a seal, within the meaning of section fourth of the same Act. (Wood's Digest, art. 341.) The law required that the County Court should have a seal. (Session Laws of 1850, p. 218, sec. 14.) And though no official seal had in fact been provided for that Court, yet it would be too narrow a construction to hold that its officers could not perform their assigned functions until an official seal should be in fact procured. On the contrary, the same section provides, that until the official seal be provided, the private seal of the Clerk may be used instead of a seal of the Court; and in Kentucky, where no such provision was made for the use of a private seal, it was decided that the seal generally used by the Clerk, though a private seal, must be presumed to have been adopted as the seal of the Court. Collins v. Boyd, 5 Dana, 316.

Gregory Yale for Appellants.

In addition to what is stated in Mr. Peckham's brief, respecting the sufficiency of the conveyance from Depeaux and wife to the defendants, we wish to repeat what was stated by counsel in the oral argument in this Court, that there is an important distinction in the terms used in the "Act concerning conveyances," passed April 16th, 1850, and the "Act defining the rights of husband and wife," passed April 17th, 1850, so far as relates to the form of the conveyance.

---

Ingoldsbey v. Juan.

---

This inquiry is pertinent, in view of the objection made to the introduction of the deed of Martina Castro to her children, in which her husband, Lewis Depeaux, joined, upon the ground that the acquiescence of Depeaux was not under seal.

By the Act of the sixteenth of April, 1850, sec. 1, "conveyances of lands, or any estate or interest therein, may be made by deed, signed by the person by whom the estate or interest is intended to pass, being of lawful age, or by his lawful agent or attorney, and acknowledged, or proved, and recorded," as therein directed, construing "may" as meaning "shall," this provision signifies, generally, that conveyances of real estate made under that Act, must be by deed. This mode of conveyance necessarily imports a sealed instrument.

By section 19th, "a married woman may convey any of her real estate by any conveyance thereof, executed and acknowledged by herself and her husband, and certified in the manner hereinafter provided by the proper officer taking the acknowledgment."

She may convey "by any conveyance." The term is here used as the instrument by which the contract of conveyance is consummated. "Conveyance," as an instrument, does not necessarily, as the term "deed," import a sealed instrument.

But under the operation of the Act of the seventeenth of April, "defining the rights of husband and wife," the rights of a married woman, as respects her separate estate, are fixed and defined. By section six, "the husband shall have the management and control of the separate property of the wife, during the continuance of the marriage, but no sale or other alienation of any part of such property can be made, nor any lien or incumbrance created thereon, unless by an instrument in writing, signed by the husband and wife," etc. Here, in this special Act, relating to husband and wife, the terms "deed" and "conveyance" are not used, when speaking of the "sale" of the separate property of the wife. A "sale" cannot be made, "unless by an instrument in writing." An "instrument in writing" does not import a deed, duly signed and sealed. It may be of such a character, but not necessarily. 2 Tomlin., 210, title "Instrument." It is the evidence of an agreement, when reduced to writing. It is the form of the agreement, and may be valid, and the agreement void on account of fraud. 1 Bouvier, 703, Ib.

The conveyance by Depeaux and wife to the defendants in August, 1850, or the conveyance by the wife, in which he acquiesced in the form stated in the record, is to be controlled by this Act. This is the sense in which these two Acts have been regarded by this Court, so far as the negative words used in the latter are interpreted to be a prohibition against any other mode of conveyance. Selover v. The American R. Co., 7 Cal. 266.

A "sale," therefore, by the husband and wife, of the separate estate of the wife, can be made by "an instrument in writing," acknowledged as the Act requires, and need not be made by "deed" under seal, as contended in the objections made to the introduction of the title under which the children claimed.

She, however, uses a seal, and one seal is good for twenty grantors to a deed. (Bohannons v. Lewis, 3 Monroe, 877, citing Shepherd's Touchstone, 55.) The same doctrine is extended to scrawls, in the United States. Ib.

John Wilson for Respondent.

As to the first point made by Mr. Peckham, that our Statute concerning Conveyances does not apply to property held before the Act, was only intended to regulate the transfer of such as should be obtained after the passage of the Act.

There is no exception in the Act itself, and there is no reason why there should be; and there are no authorities which authorize such a construction of the Act, and if there were, such a construction as he contends for would certainly lead to great confusion, and its practical results would be absurd; and under it the Act in many cases would not take effect for more than half a century after its passage, as to some property, and as to other property owned by the some individual it would take effect immediately upon its passage. The Legislature certainly intended no such absurdity. The fourteenth section of the eleventh article of our Constitution provides, that the Legislature shall have power to prescribe the mode in which married women may dispose of their separate property, and the Legislature has done so; and it seems to me that there is no necessity for further argument upon this point. The case of Selover v. The American Russian Co., 7 Cal. 266, seems to settle this whole question.

Ingoldsbj. v. Juan.

Mr. Peckham insists that married women could convey by parol, and without the assistance and authorization of their husbands. I believe this Court has held that conveyances could not be made by parol; and the proposition is as old as the civil law itself, that a wife must either have the authorization of her husband, or a decree of a Judge, before she could convey any of her rights, or make any contract under the civil law.

I come, then, to the proposition of the defendants, to give in evidence the supposed deed from Martina Castro. I maintain that it was rightly rejected, and refer to the second section of the Act of sixteenth April, 1850, concerning conveyances, which in so many words requires a wife's property to be passed by joint deed. The same Act requires all conveyances to be by deed, and by the sixth section of the Act of seventeenth April, 1850, no sale or other alienation of the wife's property can be made unless by an instrument of writing signed by the husband and wife.

Now, while she held the separate property in the ranch, as the paper on its face shows she did, still her husband had the entire control of, and was entitled to receive the whole rents and profits, and had an equal interest with her in all the improvements put upon it during the marriage, and his heirs after him would have inherited all he was entitled to therein at the time of his death. Therefore he had a large interest that could not pass unless by his deed. The paper shows no pretence that his interest was conveyed, and in his endorsement there are no words of conveyance, and if there was, then there was no seal, and without doubt he cannot convey his interest unless by deed.

Then the deed must be a joint one, or the instrument in writing must be signed by both, and therefore in no fair construction that can be put upon the statutes, can it be called a joint deed or instrument of writing signed by them both. The statute must mean that both shall be bound by the covenants therein — both must jointly convey all their interest in the subject matter of the conveyance.

In 1 Martin, N. S. R. 611, held, that separate deeds did not transfer the wife's estate. The law there is exactly the same as ours.

In Cal. Rep. January Term, 1856, Helen Pool v. F. Gerard, this Court decided the same as to the sale of a homestead, which stands on the same footing as to this point.

Selover v. The American Russian Co.; Sempers & Cranmar v. E. Sloan, 5 Cal. 457, the late cases of Another v. Tewksbury, all seem to me to settle this point. Turnbull v. Cerba, 1 Martin, N. S.

In 12 Robinson's R. 82, the Court held that where the husband authorized the wife to sell, she could not take back a mortgage for part of the purchase money.

In 1 Martin Rep. (O. S.) 294, the Court enters fully into the discussion of the power of married women to contract under the civil and Spanish law, and held that every condition must be strictly complied with.

See to same point, 19 Howard Rep. (U. S.) 148, Megan v. Boyle; 3 Louisiana R. (O. S.) 581, Boucler v. Launse; 3 Louisiana R. (O. S.) 84, Draugent v. Prudomme; 4 Barb. Ch. R. 296, Holmes v. Holmes; 4 Harris, (Penn.) R. 484, Trainer v. Hagg. These are ample authorities, as I suppose, to satisfy this Court that nothing passed by this paper upon its face.

I deny that Tracy had any authority to take the acknowledgment of this paper as County Clerk. Our statute only authorized a Clerk of a "Court having a seal." It is true he was ex officio Clerk of the District, County, Probate and Court of Sessions, and yet some of them had no seal at the date of this paper, or now and then of necessity, he must state in what capacity he took it, that the Court might see and inspect the seal he used, to see if it was the correct one. The County Clerk had no seal; he says he uses his private seal.

Proving the handwriting cannot help the case, because a married woman can only convey as pointed out by the statute. See case of Another v. Tewksbury, lately decided.

Ingoldby v. Juan.

In 1 Peters (U.S.) Rep. 328, Elliott v. Pearsal, it was decided you cannot even show by parol proof that the wife was duly examined — the certificate must state that, and its defeat in form cannot be healed by parol or other proof.

In 3 La. Rep. 74, it is said that those who rely upon a married woman's deed, must show everything was done as the law requires. 7 B. Monroe, 255, 4th and 5th sections of Act 1850, page 249. Therefore this deed is also void for want of acknowledgment in accordance with the requirements of the statute.

BALDWIN, J., delivered the opinion of the Court — TERRY, C. J., concurring.

This action of ejectment was brought to recover a tract of land, lying in Santa Cruz county, being part of the Soquel Ranch. The plaintiff claims, under a deed, made by one Martina Castro to plaintiff, and one Labaria, dated January 22, 1855, and a deed from Labaria, on the tenth of September, 1855, to plaintiff.

The record shows that the grantor claimed to be entitled to the premises in dispute, by virtue of a grant from Figueroa, the Governor of the late territory of California. It shows, also, that the defendants were in possession, claiming by virtue of a deed, made by the same Martina Castro (or Depeaux) on the twenty-ninth of August, 1850. At this time she was the wife of one Lewis Depeaux; but she had been, before her marriage with Depeaux, the wife of one Michael Lodge, who died previous to her inter-marriage with Depeaux. The grant to her by Figueroa was made while she was the wife of Lodge.

Many interesting questions are raised by the counsel, and they have been argued with learning and ability. We do not consider it essential to the disposition of this case upon its merits to pass upon them all. The main question which, we think, disposes of the question of title, rests upon the validity of the deed set up by the defendants in bar of the plaintiff's action. This deed purports to be a deed of bargain and sale, executed by Martina Castro to her children, eight in number, conveying to each one an undivided ninth part of the ranch. This deed was signed and sealed by her, in the presence of T. R. Perlee and Peter Tracy, as subscribing witnesses. The deed was acknowledged, in proper form, before Peter Tracy, County Clerk of Santa Clara county, on the day of its date. The husband, Depeaux, did not sign the deed in the body or at the foot of it, as usual in such cases; but at the bottom of the deed, and after the certificate of acknowledgment, these words were added: "I have read the foregoing, and fully agree with the conveyance made by my wife; Lewis Depeaux" — witnessed by the same persons as the deed. Then follows the certificate of acknowledgment by Depeaux before the same officer, that he executed the foregoing instrument freely and voluntarily, and for the uses and purposes therein expressed.

Ingoldesby v. Juan.

---

All this was contemporaneous with, and a part of the execution of the original deed.

The deed being the predicate of the title of the defendant was ruled out, because, under the statute of 1850, it did not convey the title of the grantor, Martina, in the premises. If this pretension could be maintained, probably no case could be found in which technical law so far prevailed over natural justice. The grant was made to Mrs. Castro for the benefit of her family. She sought unquestionably to carry out the true intent of the grant by securing to her children a portion of its benefits. The deed she afterwards executed to the plaintiff's predecessor, evidently by the terms of it (whatever its strict technical meaning) was only designed to convey the interest remaining in her after the deed to the children. But it is charged that, by force of some general words after a particular description of the part intended to be conveyed, the whole tract passed, the deed to the children being inoperative, because, though the husband, Depeaux, assented to the deed, yet he was not, stricti juris, a joint grantor with her.

We assume for the argument, and that only, that this property was the separate estate of Mrs. Castro, and that a separate estate vested before the passage of that Act defining the rights of husband and wife.

By the fourteenth section of the eleventh article of the Constitution, "all property, both real and personal, of the wife, owned or claimed by her before marriage, and that acquired afterwards by gift, devise or descent, shall be her separate property." The sixth section of the Act "defining the rights of husband and wife," passed April 17th, 1850, provides that the husband shall have the management and control of the separate property of the wife during the continuance of the marriage; but no sale or other alienation of any part of such property can be made, nor any lien or incumbrance created thereon, unless by an instrument in writing, signed by the husband and wife, and acknowledged by her upon an examination separate and apart from her husband, before certain officers — the County Clerk not being one.

Ingoldby v. Juan.

The Act of April 16, 1850, (Wood's Dig. 100) section two, provides that a husband and wife may, by their joint deed, convey the real estate of the wife in like manner as she might do by her separate deed if she were unmarried. Section three declares, that proof of acknowledgment of every deed of land may be taken by some Judge or Clerk of a Court having a seal. Section twenty — a married woman may convey any of her real estate by any conveyance thereof, executed and acknowledged by herself and her husband, and certified in the manner hereinafter provided, by the proper officer taking the acknowledgment.

Taking these Acts together, we think it cannot be contended that it was the intention of the Legislature to restrict the making of a contract respecting land by the wife to a formal deed. We do not consider these statutes as enabling Acts. They probably would be so if the common law operated upon the relations or marital contracts of the parties at the time of the contract. But, by the Mexican law and by the Constitution, the property was a separate estate in the wife. She could, before the statute, dispose of it, with the bare assent of the husband, as she chose, by any informal instrument, or, possibly, without any writing. The wife does not, therefore, look to the statutes as the source of her authority to sell or dispose of her property. On the contrary, the statutes are a limitation upon the power — prescribing a new and distinct mode of conveying the land or evidencing the sale or disposition of it. It disables her from disposing of her property as she could before have done. So far as the disability is clearly evidenced, the restraint exists; but it goes no further to restrain her than this manifest intent. She, of course, retains all her original rights and powers over the subject, except such as are expressly taken away. The law neither presumes nor favors restraints upon alienations of property or upon contracts. One of the attributes of property is the power to sell and dispose of it. By the general law the sale may be absolute or conditional, partial or complete; and the contract executory or executed. It may be evidenced in various ways or made in various forms; as, by mere memoranda in writing, or deed under seal, by agreement for a title, or mortgage, or on conditions precedent or subsequent.

Ingoldaby v. Juan.

It has been seen, that the Act of April 17th, uses the term "instrument" in writing. The Act of April 16th, in the twentieth section, the word "conveyance." By section thirty-six of the Act concerning conveyances (the Act of April 16th, Wood's Dig., p. 104) "the term 'conveyance,' as used in this Act, shall be construed to embrace every instrument in writing by which any real estate, or interest in real estate, is created, alienated, mortgaged or assigned, except wills," etc.

It is argued, that the words "may convey," especially in connection with the sixth section of the Act of April 16, which is prohibitory of any mode except that given, are to be construed as authorizing only a conveyance as therein provided; that is, that in order to make the deed of the wife effectual, the husband must join in the deed. It will be observed, that the estate is confessedly in the wife; her title it is that is to pass; the joining of the husband is not for the purpose of passing title. It is only as a precaution against imposition, or to afford her his protection, or similar reasons of policy, or to evidence his renunciation of the right to manage or control it. [In this case, the contract having been made, and the right of the wife having vested under a different system, it is, to say the least, doubtful whether the Legislature could give the husband any power to control or manage such separate property, and more than, if he had it under the old system, the Legislature could take it away.]

The deed was formally executed by the wife and acknowledged. She signed and sealed it; but for the coverture it would have passed her estate. But the husband, it is argued, did not seal it, and was no party to the deed. But after the deed was signed and sealed, the husband did sign, at the foot of it, an express approval and adoption of it. In terms he agreed to the conveyance. It is true this agreement was not under seal. The agreement did not convey any title, for he had none to convey. If he had signed and sealed the deed as an express party named in the premises thereof, the result would have been the same. All that his formal execution of the deed could have done, would have been a signification of his assent and agreement. Having no estate in the land, unquestionably the law would not require of him the vain act of pretending to convey title. It would have been enough if the deed had recited the title of the wife, and then declared that the husband united in the deed in pursuance of the statute. We know of no rule which requires a construction of this statute different from other Acts of the Legislature. Literal conformity is not, as a general rule, required. A substantial compliance is all that is necessary. When the end is answered, the mere mode is not usually of the substance of the Act. No prohibitory words are used in the clause (section nineteen) we are now construing. The language is, that a married woman may convey any of her real estate by any conveyance executed and acknowledged by herself and her husband. Prohibitory words are not used in the twenty-second section, as to the mode and fact of acknowledgment. The question now arises, what is a conveyance? We know of no authority which holds that a conveyance of an interest in land must necessarily be under seal; and, if it were so at common law, it does not follow that it is so required by our statute. On the contrary, the definition given by the thirty-sixth section, quoted before, shows that such was not the intention, for the language is, "Every instrument by which an interest in land is created" is a conveyance; and we all know, that "an interest in land" may be created by writing not under seal. The question is not — as we shall presently more fully explain — whether a paper unsealed passes the fee or strict legal title, but whether any right in or to the estate can pass without a seal.

Ingoldsbey v. Juan.

It is a familiar rule, recognized by this and all other Courts, that where several papers, concerning the same subject matter, are executed by or between the same parties at the same time, all are to be construed together as one instrument. Makepeace v. Harvard College, 10 Pick. 297; Stone v. Hansborough, 5 Leigh, 422.

There is no peculiar form for the signing of a deed. It takes effect from delivery. The old form required no signature even, but a sealing was sufficient; and now the signature is often good, if made by another and adopted by the grantor. Any writing which clearly shows that a party has adopted a sealed instrument as his own, intending to be bound by the contents of it, is, if not a formal, at least a sufficient execution, to satisfy the statute. We have seen that a formal execution of this deed by the husband, would only be a written expression of his assent to it. But surely, in equity, a contemporaneous expression, in writing, of that assent, is not the less effectual because it is expressed; not in the body of the deed, but on the same paper, a few lines below the signature of the wife. If he had added, "The above is my deed," no one would have questioned that it was a good execution. Is there any substantial difference, when he says, "I agree to or with the foregoing deed," especially when, as said before, all that his signature as a party to the deed could amount to, is that agreement? But it is said that there was no execution of the deed by Depeaux, because the instrument is not sealed by him. We do not admit that the statute ever intended so great a strictness in the mode of execution by the husband. The fact of execution is indispensable, but we see no greater reason for holding to any more strictness in the manner of execution in this than in other cases. Could it be contended that if the deed were executed with a seal by the wife, and without a seal by the husband, that this defect would vitiate the deed? We are at a loss to see upon what principle. If there had been no seal, the instrument would have been good, as creating an equity, if not good to cast the fee. But this memorandum, signed by Depeaux, adopts the entire deed, and with it the seal affixed to the signature of the wife. (3 Monroe, 377.) But it may well be doubted whether, in such a case as this, the seal of the husband is necessary, having no estate to convey, but merely assenting to the passing of the wife's title. If the execution were defective in form, the substance or the Act having been complied with, it would be the common case of a defective execution of an instrument, which chancery might correct; but it would vest an equity in the grantees in possession under the deed.

Ingoldsby v. Juan.

---

The vice of the whole adverse argument, is in supposing that because there must be a joining by the husband in the execution of the deed, and an acknowledgment by the wife in the required form, that there must necessarily be a strict pursuance of the usual form of the execution of the deed; whereas, as to the mere mode of execution, there is no difference between this class of deeds and other deeds; and as to the rules of construction, between this statute and other general Acts, no difference exists; the sense, policy and substance being the guides, and not the mere words. We think that in equity and practical effect, this deed was executed by the husband and wife; the husband doing, by his agreement at the foot of the deed, (which was duly acknowledged by him) all he could do if he had signed and sealed it as a formal party.

Ingoldsby v. Juan.

---

We have examined the cases cited against this view, but we can find no one which, upon principle and analogous facts, opposes it.

The sixth section of the Act of April 17th, 1850, already quoted, requires the acknowledgment to be made before the Judge, etc., and does not empower the Clerk to take it. As this Act was passed the day after the general Act of conveyances, and as the language is prohibitory, it is urged that the acknowledgment before the Clerk of the County Court is invalid.

There is an apparent confusion in the statutes on this subject, but the cause is easily perceived. The Act of seventeenth of April was designed to fulfill the requirement of the Constitution, "more clearly to define the rights of married women." After declaring, in the sixth section, that the husband should have the control of the separate estate of the wife, it was thought necessary to qualify and prevent misconstruction of this language; and, therefore, the Legislature added, by way of proviso, that the husband should not sell — nor the wife — except, etc.

But the sixth section only relates to separate property acquired after the passage of the Act. No retrospective operation was intended, or, perhaps, could have been given to it. In such cases, (see Grimes v. Norris, 6 Cal. 621) the statute only operates upon future transactions and matters.

The general Statute of Conveyances embraced as well deeds of separate property, existing before, as that acquired subsequent, to its passage; it did so by express terms—for the matter of the statute was the conveyance of estates—those conveyances being in the future, though the estates presently existed. But the subject of the Act of the seventeenth of April was the separate property itself, and that statute was passed to define and fix the relations of the parties to it; and, by the sixth section, the husband is made the manager of the separate property of the wife, and then the power of sale by him is denied, and the mode of sale fixed; but this only, by obvious rules of construction, applies to separate property afterwards acquired, or to property held as separate by women married after the passage of the Act. The Legislature had no power to affect marital relations or rights fixed by law previously; and if they had, we are not to presume, in the absence of an express declaration to that effect, that they so intended. See authorities cited in Grimes' case.

Ingoldaby v. Juan.

It is next objected that Tracy, the Clerk of Santa Clara, had no power to take the acknowledgment, because he had no seal of office. But this construction of the statute is too narrow. The Court of which he was Clerk, was entitled to a seal. This general phrase, "having a seal," was only intended to denote a Court of record, which is defined to be a Court having a seal. The power of the Clerk was never intended to be made to depend upon the fact of his having procured this article, or the care with which he preserved it.

We have avoided the expression of any opinion upon many questions presented by the record, and have assumed some positions more for the purpose of argument than with a view to decide them, the real question passed upon being the validity of the deed from Martina and Depeaux. We expressly leave open the question whether a grant, made in the usual form and with the usual conditions, by the Mexican authorities, to a married person, creates a separate estate or common property. The Court erred in striking out the answer setting up this defense.

The error in excluding this defense, founded on this deed, is sufficient to reverse the judgment below, and, probably, decides the entire controversy.

Judgment reversed and cause remanded for further proceedings, in pursuance of this opinion.

passage; it did so by express terms—for the matter of the statute was the conveyance of estates—those conveyances being in the future, though the estates presently existed. But the subject of the Act of the seventeenth of April was the separate property itself, and that statute was passed to define and fix the relations of the parties to it; and, by the sixth section, the husband is made the manager of the separate property of the wife, and then the power of sale by him is denied, and the mode of sale fixed; but this only, by obvious rules of construction, applies to separate property afterwards acquired, or to property held as separate by women married after the passage of the Act. The Legislature had no power to affect marital relations or rights fixed by law previously; and if they had, we are not to presume, in the absence of an express declaration to that effect, that they so intended. See authorities cited in Grimes' case.

It is next objected that Tracy, the Clerk of Santa Clara, had no power to take the acknowledgment, because he had no seal of office. But this construction of the statute is too narrow. # REPORTS OF CASES

DETERMINED IN

THE SUPREME COURT

APRIL TERM, 1859.

BARKER v. KONEMAN et als.

- ▲ Said by a husband of his separate real estate to a Trustee, for the benefit of his wife, whether executed in compliance with an ante-nuptial contract, or by way of settlement upon his wife independent of any previous contract, the husband being at the time free from debts and liabilities, is valid.
- ▲ nominal consideration stated and the operative words of transfer — grant, bargain, sell, and convey — do not change the character or object of the deed.
- ◊ Seems, that the husband, being free from debts and liabilities, may convey his separate property, as a gift, directly to his wife, without the intervention of a Trustee.
- ◊ The law allows, and even regards with favor, provisions made by the husband, when in solvent circumstances, for his wife and family, against the possible misfortunes of a future day, by setting apart a portion of his property for their benefit.

APPEAL from the Sixth District.

Ejectment to recover a lot situated in the city of Sacramento. The plaintiff claimed under a deed from Wm. M. Carpenter, executed on the 16th of December, 1857.

On the 15th of June, 1853, said Carpenter executed a deed of the lot in controversy to John Brannan, as Trustee, for the benefit of his wife, Mary Ann Carpenter. This deed recites that on the 9th of July, 1852, a marriage was solemnized between said Wm. M. Carpenter and wife, and "that upon the treaty of said marriage, and in consideration thereof, it was stipulated and agreed between the said parties, that the sum of ten thousand dollars out of the real property of the said Wm. M. Carpenter should be secured to the said Mary Ann and her heirs, in order to form a separate and independent competency for her, not subject to the authority, disposal, control, or management, of her said husband;" and purports to be executed "in order to carry the said agreement more effectually into execution, and to make the same valid in law and to secure the said sum of money to the said Mary Ann and her lawful heirs, so that the same shall not be in the power or disposal of her said husband," and for the further consideration of ten dollars, received from Brannan, the Trustee. The words of transfer used by the grantor in the deed are, that he "hath granted, bargained, sold, and conveyed, and, by these presents, doth grant, bargain, sell, and convey," the premises to the Trustee, etc. In December, 1854, Badlam, one of the defendants, was substituted Trustee in place of Brannan, by consent of all parties to the deed and by order of the Sixth District Court.

The plaintiff was a nominal party to the suit. He never gave any consideration for the property, and took the deed at the request of his Attorney, with an agreement, in case of recovery, to convey the property to such party as the Attorney might name. It was admitted that Wm. M. Carpenter, on the 15th of June, 1853, was the owner of the lot. It was his separate property, and at the time of executing the deed to the Trustee he was free from debts and liabilities. Mrs. Carpenter received the rents of the lot from December, 1853, to September, 1856, and Badlam, as Trustee, was in possession from his appointment. The defendants, Kone-man and Murray, were tenants under the Trustee. The defendants relied on the trust deed and recovered judgment, and the plaintiff appealed.

FIELD, J. delivered the opinion of the Court — BALDWIN, J. concurring.

The deed of Carpenter, bearing date in June, 1853, recites that the marriage between himself and wife was solemnized in July of the year previous; and that by the treaty of marriage, and in consideration thereof, it was stipulated that the sum of ten thousand dollars should be secured to her out of his real property, in order to give her a separate and independent competency, not subject to his disposition or management; and purports on its face to be executed to the Trustee designated therein for the purpose of carrying into effect this stipulation. The nominal consideration of ten dollars and the operative words of transfer — grant, bargain, sell, and convey — do not change the character or object of the conveyance. Nor is it material whether it was executed, as it purports, in compliance with the ante-nuptial contract. It would be equally valid if made by way of settlement upon the wife, without reference to any antecedent stipulation. The husband was at the time free from debts and liabilities. The property was his separate property, in which the wife possessed no interest, and over which he had the absolute power of disposition. He could even have conveyed it as a gift directly to his wife, without the intervention of a Trustee. (Act defining the Rights of Husband and Wife, Sec. 1.) The law allows, and even regards with favor, provisions made by the husband, when in solvent circumstances, for the wife and family against the possible misfortunes of a future day, by setting apart a portion of his property for their benefit.

The deed to the Trustee, Brannan, passed upon its delivery the estate of Carpenter, and the plaintiff took nothing by, as he paid nothing for, the deed, subsequently executed to him.

Judgment affirmed.

WAUGH v. CHAUNCEY et al.

THE Board of Supervisors of a county is a special tribunal with mixed powers — administrative, legislative, and judicial — and jurisdiction over roads, ferries, and bridges, is given to it by Statute. Its judgments or orders cannot be attacked collaterally, any more than the judgment of Courts of Record. The Statute, (Wood's Dig. 460,) gives such Board discretionary power over the location of new bridges and ferries within a mile of those previously established. And if, in the opinion of the Board, public convenience requires, such new bridges and ferries may be so located. It is doubtful whether an appeal lies from the exercise of this discretion. But if it does, it must be made direct to some superior tribunal.

APPEAL from the Ninth District.

For case see opinion.

Isaac Baggs, for Appellant, cited: 6 Cal. 590; 3 Cal. 458-460; 8 Id. 58.

---

Waugh & Chauncey.

---

R. T. Sprague, for Respondent, cited: 6 Cal. 590; 8 Id. 58; Wood's Dig. 460, Sec. 6.

BALDWIN, J. delivered the opinion of the Court — TERRY, C. J. concurring.

This is a bill filed to enjoin the erection of a toll-bridge on the Sacramento River.

The defendants had procured a license and order from the Board of Supervisors of Shasta County. The plaintiff complains that he is the owner of a ferry legally established, situated near the site of the proposed bridge, and that the effect of the building of the bridge will be to injure his franchise and property. He asserts that various irregularities in the action of the Board, in granting the bridge license, occurred; and, among other things, that the Board acted upon insufficient proof in granting the bridge license.

On demurrer, the Court held that the plaintiff was not entitled to an injunction.

Hence, this appeal.

The opinion of the learned Judge of the Ninth Judicial District is in the record, and states the law in reference to this case with clearness and accuracy.

The Board of Supervisors is a special tribunal, with mixed powers — administrative, legislative, and judicial — and jurisdiction over roads, ferries, and bridges, is given it by the statute. Its judgments or orders cannot be attacked in a collateral way any more than the judgments of Courts of Record. (1 Black. 68; 6 Cal. 590.)

By the sixth section of the Act concerning ferries and toll-bridges, (Wood's Dig. 460,) it is provided that no ferry or toll-bridge shall be established within one mile immediately above or below a regularly established ferry or toll-bridge, unless it be required by the public convenience, or where the situation of a town or village, etc. It is thus seen that the mere fact of proximity is no bar to the establishment of a ferry or toll-bridge; but the meaning of this section is, that the Board shall be governed, in cases of such application, by its sense of the public convenience. Its discretion is trusted on that subject, and its judgment is conclusive. We do not see that any appeal would lie from a fair and proper — if, indeed, from any — exercise of this discretion. But if any appeal does lie, the appeal must be made directly to some superior tribunal. Its judgments or orders cannot be collaterally impeached, whether it acted upon sufficient or insufficient proof, regularly or irregularly. (Norris v. Farmers' & Teamsters' Company, 6 Cal. 598; 17 Ala. 576.)

Haffley v. Maier.

---

Judgment affirmed.

HAFFLEY v. MAIER.

- A mortgage on public land, or the improvements thereon, is not void because it does not follow the provisions of the Chattel Mortgage Act. That act gives a new remedy, but does not take away the old.
- The mortgagor having mortgaged the land as his own property is estopped, as are his privies in estate, from saying it is public land.
- A mortgage is a mere security for a debt, and does not pass the fee, nor give a right of entry. Hence, if land mortgaged is sold, the vendee of the mortgage cannot be ousted from possession by a purchaser under the decree of foreclosure and sale, unless such vendee was made a party to the foreclosure suit.

APPEAL from the Fifteenth District.

Ejectment for premises situated in Butte County. In June, 1857, one Schiller and his wife executed a mortgage upon the premises in controversy to the plaintiff. This mortgage is in the usual form. The plaintiff foreclosed the mortgage, and on the sale had under the decree, became the purchaser and obtained the Sheriff's deed. Under this deed he claimed.

In September, 1857, Schiller, the mortgagor, conveyed the mortgaged premises to one Geer, under whom the defendant, Maier, through mesne conveyances, claimed the property; Maier was not made a party to the foreclosure suit. Schiller and wife were alone made parties to that suit. The decree of foreclosure and sale was entered on the 5th of May, 1858, and the Sheriff's deed was executed to the plaintiff on the 3d of the following December.

The Court below found that the land mortgaged was public land of the United States, and that the mortgage not being made in pursuance of the provisions of the Chattel Mortgage Act, was of no legal force or effect against any person not a party to it, and that the defendant by a subsequent purchase of the premises in controversy, was not affected by the mortgage, and that the foreclosure and sale gave the plaintiff no right of possession as against him.

Judgment was rendered for the defendant, from which the plaintiff appealed.

Burt & Rhodes, for Appellant. 1. The Chattel Mortgage Act changes the common law, by permitting chattels to be mortgaged without delivery, on certain conditions, and by taking away the right to mortgage possessory claims to lands, except with certain formalities. Hence this act must be strictly construed and limited to the species of property named therein. By the act the claims are confined to lands of the State. (Melody v. Reab, 4 Mass. 471; 15 Id. 205; 9 Pick. 496; 13 Id. 284; Lock v. Miller, 3 Stew. & Port. 13; Sedg. Const. and Stat. L. 313-334; 1 Blac. Com. 59; 6 Cal. 172; 5 Id. 408; Smith Const. and Stat. Com. 786.) 2. Defendant deriving title and possession from the mortgagor, after the mortgage, cannot set them up to defeat the recovery.

BALDWIN, J. delivered the opinion of the Court — TERRY, C. J. concurring.

1. The Court below erred in holding that the mortgage executed on the public land, or improvements thereon, was void, because it did not follow the provisions of the Chattel Mortgage Act. That Act gave a new remedy, but did not take away the old; but, on the principle of estoppel, the mortgagor having mortgaged the land as his own property, was estopped, as are his privies in estate, from saying this is public land. The fact of his ownership, for all purposes of such foreclosure and title, is concluded by the deed, and is not admissible of dispute or question.

2. The mortgage was made by one Schiller. Afterwards, Schiller sold, subject, of course, to the mortgage, to another, and this last to another, who sold to Maier, the defendant in possession, who is now resisting the plaintiff's claim. The plaintiff foreclosed the mortgage of Schiller, and bought at the sale. But, though Schiller, the mortgagor, was made a party, Maier, the subsequent vendee of his interest, was not.

According to repeated decisions of this Court, (see McMillan v. Richards, 9 Cal. 365) a mortgage is held in this State to be merely a security for a debt. It does not pass the fee to the mortgagee, nor give him a right of entry. It only gives him a right to sell in a certain event, and the title comes from the sale. Until the sale, the fee is in the mortgagor. Before the sale in this case, the fee or legal estate, clogged only with the incumbrance of the mortgage, passed to Maier.

Crandall v. Blen.

It could not be divested by a sale of Schiller's interest; indeed, at the time of the sale, Schiller had no interest. What is sold is not the interest of the mortgagee, but the estate of the mortgagor; if the mortgagor has parted with his estate, the holder, to be affected by a decree, must be made a party. If he is not, his rights remain as they were before, and, having the legal estate, with a right of possession until that legal estate is sold, this is a good defense to an action at law, brought to oust him of the possession.

The judgment was right on the undisputed facts, though a wrong reason was given for it. But we do not reverse for what we regard as bad logic, but for what we consider bad law.

The judgment is affirmed. But, of course, neither this affirmation, nor the judgment below, affects the right of the plaintiff to foreclose the title of Maier, and then maintain his ejectment.

Ordered accordingly.

CRANDALL v. BLEN.

Query: Whether a chose in action, as a note or judgment, and the like, calling for a definite sum without condition, is the subject of levy and sale? And if so, then query: Whether such levy and sale can be made without actual possession of the chose by the officer?

Contingent and complicated contracts cannot be levied upon and sold without being in the possession of the officer at the sale, to be exhibited to the bystanders and assigned to the purchaser, unless a full and accurate description of the particular interest and chose in action, with all of its conditions and covenants, and a full explanation of the facts determining the value of the chose be given by the levy and announced at the sale.

APPEAL from the Eleventh District.

Bill in equity to compel defendant to deliver to plaintiff a certain contract or agreement between defendant and the Bear River and Auburn Water and Mining Company, set forth in the opinion of the Court. Complaint alleged plaintiff to be the owner of said agreement by virtue of the Sheriff's sale and return, also named in the opinion; that he had demanded of defendant the delivery to him, plaintiff, of the same, which demand was refused.

Crandall v. Blen.

---

Plaintiff further averred, that defendant had, previous to said sale, brought suit on said agreement in said Court against said company, which suit was then pending; that defendant was insolvent, and if he were permitted to collect the money due on said agreement, plaintiff would be irreparably injured.

The prayer was for the delivery of the agreement, substitution of plaintiff in the place of defendant in said suit, and an injunction against any further proceedings by defendant therein.

The answer denied most of the allegations of the complaint, and averred that the Bear River and Auburn Water and Mining Company had broken said agreement, to the damage of defendant, in the sum of thirteen thousand dollars, and that suit therefore was pending; that plaintiff is, and has been, for three years past, Secretary of the company and a large stockholder therein. The answer further charges, in substance, fraud and conspiracy on the part of plaintiff and the company, in breaking said agreement and in the issuance of the execution and the sale referred to, the object being to cheat defendant out of his rights by litigation and a secret sale of his property, of which sale neither he nor his Attorneys knew anything until after it was over. The case was tried by the Court, and defendant had judgment. Plaintiff appeals.

E. B. Crocker, for Appellant.

I. Choses in action are liable to sale on execution under the statute.

Section 124 of Practice Act provides that "all debts due the defendant and all other property" may be attached.

Section 217 — "Debts and credits and other property not capable of manual delivery" may be levied upon by execution.

Section 220 — Directs the Sheriff to "collect or sell the things in action" levied upon.

Section 227 — Provides that the purchaser of personal property capable of manual delivery shall receive the possession, and also a certificate of sale if he desires it; but

Section 228 — Provides that the Sheriff "shall execute and deliver to the purchaser of personal property not capable of manual delivery a certificate of sale and payment. Such certificate shall convey to the purchaser all right, title, and interest, which the debtor has in and to such property on the day the execution was levied."

This Court has already decided that judgments, notes, and other choses in action, are liable to sale on execution under these provisions of the statute. (Adams & Co. v. Hackett et al. 7 Cal. 187; Johnson v. Reynolds, Jan. T. 1857.)

In Louisiana they have a similar law. (Louis. Code of Practice, 272, Secs. 642-647.)

The interest of a party in a note may be sold on execution without the Sheriff taking possession of it. (Brown v. Anderson, 4 Martin N. S. 426.)

The seizure of the choses in action is not required, as they are not tangible, the note being the mere evidence of the debt, and not the debt itself. (Wilson v. Munday, 5 Louis. 486.)

An execution may be levied on a sum of money directed by the Legislature to be paid to the defendant. (3 Martin N. S. 180.)

II. Defendant objects that the levy was not properly made; that the Sheriff should have taken possession of the note, and that the note is not sufficiently described, etc.

The foregoing authorities in the Louisiana Reports are sufficient to show that it is not necessary for the Sheriff to take actual possession of the piece of paper which is the mere evidence of the debt. Section 217 of the Practice Act speaks definitely of "debts and credits" as property not capable of manual delivery, and Section 228 provides that the certificate of sale shall be sufficient to transfer the title in such cases without any manual delivery.

As to the description required, it is sufficient if it will enable one to identify the property intended, even though in some particulars it may be false or inconsistent. (Wing v. Burgess, 1 Shepley, 111; 29 Maine, 62; 6 Green. 162; 3 N. H. 525; 19 Vt. 334; Stamford Bank v. Ferris, 17 Conn. 259.)

As against the judgment defendant, no great strictness or form is necessary in making a levy upon personal property; the mere entering of the property upon the execution will conclude the defendant, though the property is not present and the officer does not know where it is, though such a levy would not be good against third persons. (Crocker on Sheriffs, Sections 427-429; 9 Barb. S. C. 620-629.)

Crandall v. Blen.

---

The failure of the officer to comply with the law respecting levies and sales on execution will not vitiate the sale, but the remedy of the party injured is by action against the officer. (Smith v. Randall, 6 Cal. 47.)

III. Alleged fraud in the sale.

We object that the sale cannot be attacked in this collateral action, but can only be done by a direct motion, in the action in which the sale was made, to set it aside.

But even if it can be done in this collateral way, still defendant's answer does not show sufficient to authorize a Court of Equity to set aside the sale and cancel plaintiff's certificate of sale. If he claims that the property was sold for an inadequate price, he must first do equity before he can claim equity, by tendering to plaintiff the amount that is justly due him, or at least, the amount of the purchase money; and this he has not done or offered to do.

In 4 J. C. R. 118, cited by defendant, the sale was set aside upon proof of actual fraud, but only upon payment of the whole debt due on the judgment, all incumbrances paid by the purchaser, and all improvements made on the property by him. (6 J. C. R. 205.) This Court has held, after a thorough and most able examination of the authorities, that mere inadequacy of price is never of itself sufficient to annul a sale on execution, but there must be circumstances showing fraud in the officer making the sale. (Smith v. Randall, 6 Cal. 47.)

The case of Argenti v. San Francisco, was one of actual fraud, and was a peculiar case in itself, and does not conflict with Smith v. Randall.

Tuttle & Hillyer, for Respondent.

The Court properly dismissed the bill. The complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. Under the common law, a chose in action could not be sold on execution. (9 Johns. 96; 4 Id. 41; 17 Id. 351; Allen on Sheriffs, 161; 17 Mass. 263.)

The contract or debt which the Sheriff professed to sell was not for the payment of money absolutely. Blen's demand is for unliquidated damages, for failure to comply with the contract. These damages cannot be ascertained except by a verdict.

Crandall v. Blea.

They are a question of fact, and their amount rests on proof. No one, can, therefore, say what was sold. As well might an officer sell a demand of A against a stage company, or steamboat company, for failure to comply with a contract of affreightment or passage.

The return of the Sheriff shows that he made no levy. He did not have possession of the contract, and only levied on the indebtedness, as mentioned in the contract, without describing what was mentioned. To constitute a levy, goods must be in the immediate view of the Sheriff. (19 Wend. 495; 2 Hill, 666; 9 Barb. 619; 16 Id. 585.)

The property must be present and in the view of those attending the sale. (4 Barbour, 484, 485; 14 John. 352.) Our statute provides a way in which the Sheriff may have a chose in action in view of those attending the sale. He must return an inventory of the property attached, and if the person owing the debt refuse to give a memorandum he may be taken before a Judge and compelled to return it. The debtor may, also, in the same way be compelled to deliver up any notes or evidences of the debt.

The Sheriff, when he did not receive bids anything proportioned to the value of the property, should have adjourned the sale. (Crocker, Sheriff, p. 201, paragraph 474; 5 Sewell, 253.)

A chose in action cannot be assigned without an assignment of the writing; if so, can a Sheriff sell without possession of the contract? (Palmer v. Merrill, 6 Cushing, 282; Howe v. Glenkworth, 17 Mass. 243.)

A demand for fourteen thousand dollars is sold for one hundred. It is bought by a man, too, out of whose property a large proportion of it must be collected, if collected at all. Inadequacy of price alone is sufficient to authorize a Court to set aside a sale. (See 12 Wend. 253; 6 Wend. 522; 18 Wend. 611; 1 Story's Eq. Sec. 185, Notes 6, 7; Neilson v. McDonald, 6 John. Ch. R. 205; Howell v. Baker, 4 Ib. 118.)

BALDWIN, J. delivered the opinion of the Court — FIELD, J. concurring.

The main question in this case is, can a chose in action, like that in evidence, be sold by the Sheriff under execution, by virtue of a general levy, so that the title of it passes to the vendee. Plaintiff had judgment and execution against Blen for some seven hundred and fifty dollars, and issued execution thereon, which the Sheriff returns, levied as follows:

"I hereby certify that I received this annexed execution March 23d, 1858, and by virtue of its commands, I, on said day, levied upon all right, title, interest, and claim, of Joshua Blen, of, in, and to, a certain contract or agreement executed by the Bear River and Auburn Water and Mining Company, by James Neall, President, to the said Joshua Blen, dated the fourteenth day of February, 1856, for the payment of the sum of fourteen thousand five hundred dollars, in the manner specified therein, and also, indebtedness and liability of the said Bear River and Auburn Water and Mining Company to the said Blen, under said contract, or in any other way by delivering personally to H. W. Brouse, Esq. Managing Agent of said Bear River and Auburn Water and Mining Company, at the office of said company, in the town of Auburn, county and State aforesaid, a copy of this annexed execution, with notice upon said execution of my levy upon said interest, right, title, and claim, of said Joshua Blen, of, in, and to, said contract, and also upon all indebtedness and liability of the company to said Joshua Blen, under said contract, or in any other way.

And, after giving public and lawful notice for seven days, by posting notice of sale in three public places in the town of Auburn, in said county and State, I, on the 29th day of March, A. D. 1858, sold at public auction, in front of the Court-House, in said town of Auburn, county and State aforesaid, said right, title, interest, and claim, or any indebtedness or liability under the mentioned contract, or in any other way, of Joshua Blen from the Bear River and Auburn Water and Mining Company to J. R. Crandall, for the sum of one hundred dollars, cash in hand to me paid, it being the highest and best bid made for said property. And I also, on said 29th day of March, A. D. 1858, made out and gave to said J. R. Crandall a certificate of sale of said property. And on this 30th day of March, A. D. 1858, I have applied the one hundred dollars as a credit on this annexed execution, for the part satisfaction of the same. March 30th, 1858.

CHARLES KING, Sheriff

By L. BULLOCK, Under Sheriff."

Crandall v. Blen.

The agreement claimed to have been made is in these words: "The Bear River and Auburn Water and Mining Company, for and in consideration of the ditch, known as the Tracy Ravine and Mississippi Bar Ditch, by them this day purchased of Joshua Blen, and in consideration of the interest claimed and held by the said Blen in the Beals' Ditch, which interest in said last named ditch the said Blen has this day assigned to said company as value received, promise to pay to said Blen fourteen thousand five hundred dollars, as follows: Two thousand five hundred dollars in cash, and twelve thousand dollars in the manner following, to wit: First, the expenses of keeping said ditches in good working order, and the expenses of employing agents to attend to said ditches, are paid out of the proceeds of the sale of the water from said ditches; the revenues and profits arising from the sales of water from said ditches, over and above said charges, are to be applied to the liquidation of said sum of twelve thousand dollars, until the whole sum is paid; and to hasten and make certain the timely and early payment of said sum as aforesaid, said company promise to furnish from their ditch, to be used in the above named ditches, so much water, which, added to the water supplied to said ditches from their other sources, shall be sufficient to effect sales to the amount of one thousand dollars per month; and when said company shall fail to furnish water as aforesaid, the said company hereby obligate themselves to pay to said Blen interest at the rate of ten per cent. per annum on the said monthly deficiency until met by receipts by sales over and above the one thousand per month.

Given this 10th day of February, 1856.

JAMES NEALL,
President, B. R. & A. W. & M. Co.

Test, C. W. Langdon."

There were some two or three persons at the sale, and the agreement was struck off for one hundred dollars to plaintiff. The agreement was not present at the sale, nor fully explained to the bystanders. The plaintiff was a stockholder of the Bear River Company, against which company a suit was pending by Blen at the time of the sale, and the question of liability of the company on this agreement was in controversy.

---

Crandall v. Bien.

The contract was not read to the few persons present at the Sheriff's sale, nor was any more particular description made than that given in the levy. Section 124 of the Practice Act provides that all debts due the defendant and all other property may be attached. Section 217 — debts and credits and other property not capable of manual delivery, may be levied upon by execution. Section 220, directs the Sheriff to collect or sell the things in action. Section 227 — the purchaser of personal property capable of manual delivery, shall receive the possession, and also a certificate of sale if he desires it. Section 228, provides that the Sheriff shall execute and deliver to the purchaser of personal property not subject to manual delivery a certificate of sale and payment.

It is contended by the Appellant that choses in action are subject to levy and sale as other property, and certainly some countenance seems to be given to this idea as well by the provisions of the statute as the cases of Adams & Co. v. Hackett & Co. (7 Cal. 187,) and Johnson v. Reynolds. No statute could be more impolitic or more unnecessary, if this be its true interpretation; for the exercise of the right must necessarily lead to the most enormous sacrifices and the grossest frauds; and effectual modes are already provided by which these rights of property can be reached by the creditor, and for their full value, as well as by a levy and sale of them. It is contended that this levy may be made, not upon the chose in action, that is, upon the written contract note, etc. but upon the debt — that is, upon a mere guess of indebtedness, and that this levy at once changes the property from the debtor to the Sheriff, and, by the sale, from the sheriff to the purchaser. Of course, the Sheriff sells in every such case, neither knowing himself, nor could the purchaser know, where the note was — whether assigned or not — whether there were any defenses or not — or, probably, where the title of the note was, or what its value. The purchase would, in such instances, be a mere gambling speculation, in which one man would probably be ruined if the chose was for a large amount, for the benefit of some speculator having secret information as to the facts. It is contended, further, that this applies not only to liquidated claims, but to unliquidated — to every sort of chose in action — we presume to executory contracts — to contingent contracts — to ex-ery sort of contract whereby one man is or may become indebted to another; that a covenant of warranty may be thus sold and assigned, bonds of indemnity, open accounts, partnership balances, and in fine, every sort of remote or contingent interest, in suit, or however complicated. According to this theory, a chancery suit may be sold out, or, perhaps, even a claim for damages in slander or assault and battery. Before we give our sanction to so sweeping and destructive a construction of the statute, we must be very thoroughly convinced the terms of it require this interpretation. The common law recognized no such notions, and this statute, so far derogating from it, is to receive a strict construction.

If we concede that a chose in action is the subject of levy, are we authorized to hold that the chose itself need not be levied on? To decide that there may be a mere ideal levy? There need be nothing tangible and physical, or a reduction to actual possession and dominion of the thing itself which is the subject of the levy? If this were so as to notes, judgments, etc. can we hold that contingent and complicated contracts are embraced by the act, and not only a chose in action, calling for a definite sum without any condition?

But, not passing on these points, we hold when the paper evidencing the debt is not present to be assigned to the purchaser, and exhibited to the bystanders, that at the very least, a full and accurate description of the particular interest and chose in action, with all of its conditions and covenants, and a full explanation of the facts which determine the value of such instrument or contract, must be given by the levy and announced at the sale. If a sheriff could sell a piece of property — as a horse running loose in the woods — we suppose no one would doubt that he must so describe it as to give some idea of its character, qualities, and value; and the reason is not less for requiring such a description in a case like this — the whole value and motive to purchase depending upon this description and these facts — and, certainly, if a bill were filed to enforce such a purchase as the one just supposed, the defendant might set up, if a horse worth a thousand dollars were sold by the Sheriff, in the presence of three persons, for a dollar — that the sale should not be enforced. It is of the essence of every public sale that there be a description sufficient to apprise the bystanders, with reasonable accuracy, of what is sold or offered. It will be seen by reference to the levy and agreement before fully set out, that the Sheriff did not pursue this course; and, therefore, no title whatever passed by this sale.

Houston v. Williams et al.

---

Judgment affirmed.

HOUSTON v. WILLIAMS et al.

~~The~~ Legislature cannot require the Supreme Court to give the reasons of its decisions in writing. The constitutional duty of the Court is discharged by the rendition of its decisions.

The practice of giving the reasons in writing for judgments is of modern origin. And it is discretionary with the Court whether it give an opinion upon pronouncing judgment; and if given, whether it be oral or in writing.

A decision of the Court is its judgment, the opinion is the reasons given for that judgment. The former being entered of record immediately, can only be changed upon a petition for rehearing or a modification. The latter is the property of the Judges, subject to their revision, correction, and modification, until it is transcribed on the record with the consent of the writer, when it ceases to be the subject of change, except through regular proceedings before the Court by petition.

The records of Courts are under the control of the Judges so far as essential to the proper administration of justice, and this control is beyond the reach of legislation.

The Clerk of a Court, though a constitutional officer, is subject to its orders in the control of the records. The Court cannot, without great abuse of its powers, take from the Clerk, in any way, the perquisites of his office for copies of opinions and papers on file.

APPEAL from the Third District.

This was an action of ejectment. The defendant recovered judgment in the District Court. On appeal, the judgment was reversed by the Supreme Court from the bench — no opinion in writing being delivered. The reasons for the decision were stated orally. The counsel for plaintiff afterwards presented a petition asking the Court to file a written opinion.

William T. Wallace, for Petitioner.

Spencer & Rhodes, for Respondent.

FIELD, J. delivered the opinion of the Court — TERRY, C. J. : concurring.

At the present term the judgment in this case was reversed without any opinion being given setting forth the reasons for the reversal. The Appellant now moves the Court to file an opinion, and cites Section 69 of the statute of May 15th, 1854, amending the Practice Act, which provides that "all decisions given upon an appeal in any Appellate Court of this State, shall be given in writing, with the reason therefor, and filed with the Clerk of the Court," except in cases tried in the County Court, on appeal from a Justice's Court.

The provision of the statute had not been overlooked when the decision was rendered. It is but one of many provisions embodied in different statutes by which control over the Judiciary department of the government has been attempted by legislation. To accede to it any obligatory force, would be to sanction a most palpable encroachment upon the independence of this department. If the power of the Legislature to prescribe the mode and manner in which the Judiciary shall discharge their official duties be once recognized, there will be no limit to the dependence of the latter. If the Legislature can require the reasons of our decisions to be stated in writing, it can forbid their statement in writing, and enforce their oral announcement, or prescribe the paper upon which they shall be written, and the ink which shall be used. And yet no sane man will justify any such absurd pretension, but where is the limit to this power if its exercise in any particular be admitted?

The truth is, no such power can exist in the Legislative Department, or be sanctioned by any Court which has the least respect for its own dignity and independence. In its own sphere of duties, this Court cannot be trammelled by any legislative restrictions. Its constitutional duty is discharged by the rendition of decisions. The Legislature can no more require this Court to state the reasons of its decisions, than this Court can require, for the validity of the statutes, that the Legislature shall accompany them with the reasons for their enactment. The principles of law settled, are to be extracted from the records of the cases in which the decisions are rendered. The reports are full of adjudged cases, in which opinions were never delivered. The facts are stated by the Reporter, with the points arising thereon, and are followed by the judgments rendered, and yet no one ever doubted that the Courts, in the instances mentioned, were discharging their entire constitutional obligations. (See, by way of illustration, Cases in 1 Day's Conn. Reports; in 1 Brockenborough's Va. cases; and in 4 Harris & McHenry's Maryland Reports.)

The practice of giving the reasons in writing for judgments, has grown into use in modern times. Formerly, the reasons, if any were given, were generally stated orally by the Judges, and taken down by the Reporters in short hand. (1 Blackstone, 71.)

In the judicial records of the King's Courts, "the reasons or causes of the judgment," says Lord Coke, "are not expressed, for wise and learned men do, before they judge, labor to reach to the depth of all the reasons of the case in question, but in their judgments express not any; and, in truth, if Judges should set down the reasons and causes of their judgments within every record, that immense labor should withdraw them from the necessary service of the commonwealth, and their records should grow to be like Elephantini Libri, of infinite length, and, in mine opinion, lose somewhat of their present authority and reverence; and this is also worthy for learned and grave men to imitate." (Coke's Rep. Part 3, Pref. 5.)

The opinions of the Judges, setting forth their reasons for their judgments, are, of course, of great importance in the information they impart as to the principles of law which govern the Court, and should guide litigants; and right-minded Judges, in important cases — when the pressure of other business will permit — will give such opinions. It is not every case, however, which will justify the expenditure of time necessary to write an opinion. Many cases involve no new principles, and are appealed only for delay. It can serve no purpose of public good to repeat elementary principles of law which have never been questioned for centuries. The Court must therefore exercise its own discretion as to the necessity of giving an opinion upon pronouncing judgment, and if one is given, whether it shall be orally or in writing. In the exercise of that discretion, the authority of the Court is absolute. The legislative department is incompetent to touch it.

With the expression of these views, we might close this opinion, by denying the motion, but it will not be impertinent to the matter under consideration, to say a few words as to the control of the Court over its opinions and records. There are some misapprehensions on the subject, arising chiefly from a confusion of terms, and from a misconception of the relation of the different departments of Government to each other, and the entire independence in its line of duties of the Judiciary. The terms "opinions" and "decisions," are often confounded, yet there is a wide difference between them, and in ignorance of this, or by overlooking it, what has been a mere revision of an opinion, has been sometimes regarded as a mutilation of a record. A decision of the Court is its judgment, the opinion is the reasons given for that judgment. The former is entered of record immediately upon its rendition, and can only be changed through a regular application to the Court, upon a petition for a re-hearing, or a modification. The latter is the property of the Judges, subject to their revision, correction, and modification, in any particular deemed advisable, until, with the approbation of the writer, it is transcribed in the records. In the haste of composition, some errors will occur; in the copying, several; in the printing, many. There will also be at times, expressions of opinion on incidental questions, too strong and unqualified. All these errors, whether in language, form, or substance, should be corrected before a publication is permitted, as an authoritative exposition of the law, and, as such, binding upon the Court. The power of enforcing a correct publication, when the publication is authorized, cannot reasonably be denied. In no civilized State, except in California, has the existence of this power ever been doubted. Every Judge, from the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, down, claim and exercise, without question, the right of revision, including thereby modification and partial suppression of his opinions. In the recent case in relation to the Sutter grant, we are informed that application was made for a copy of the opinion delivered, and that the application was refused, on the ground that Mr. Justice Campbell, who delivered it, wished to revise it before it left the Clerk's office. When the opinions have been revised and finally approved and recorded, then they cease to be the subject of change. They then become like judgment records, and are beyond the interference of the Judges, except through regular proceedings before the Court by petition.

Houston v. Williams et al.

---

The records of the Courts are necessarily subject to the control of the Judges, so far as may be essential to the proper administration of justice. The Court hears arguments upon its records; it decides upon its records; it acts by its records; its openings, and sessions, and adjournments, can be proved only by its records; its judgments can only be evidenced by its records; in a word, without its records, it has no vitality. Legislation, which could take from its control its records, would leave it impotent for good, and the just object of ridicule and contempt. The Clerk, it is true, is a constitutional officer—not subject to appointment or removal by the Court—but subject, in the control of the records, to its orders. It is true the Court cannot, without great abuse of its powers, take, directly or indirectly, from the Clerk, the perquisites of his office for copies of opinions, and papers on file, nor authorize the destruction or mutilation of any of the records, but, subject to these limitations, it must necessarily exercise control that justice may be done to litigants before it.

The power over our opinions and the records of our Court we shall exercise at all times while we have the honor to sit on the Bench, against all encroachments from any source, but in a manner, we trust, befitting the highest tribunal in the State. We cannot possibly have any interest in the opinions except that they shall embody the results of our most mature deliberation, and be presented to the public in an authentic form, after they have been subjected to the most careful revision.

THE words "matter in dispute" in section 4 of Article 6 of the Constitution, conferring jurisdiction on the Supreme Court, mean the subject of litigation—the matter for which suit is brought.

Costs of suit form no part of the matter in dispute. The appellate jurisdiction of this Court in cases of mere money demands, not involving the legality of any tax, toll, impost, or municipal fine, can be exercised only when the amount for which suit is brought exceeds two hundred dollars. Gordon v. Ross, 2 Cal. 156, overruled.

APPEAL from the County Court of Tuolumne County.

defendant for costs, seventy-six dollars and fifty-five cents. Plaintiff appealed to the County Court, where the judgment below was reversed and a new trial ordered in that Court. In the County Court a nonsuit was first granted, and afterwards, on motion to set it aside, judgment final was rendered for defendants for costs, ninety dollars and ten cents, which includes a part of the costs in the Justice's Court. Plaintiffs appeal to the Supreme Court.

H. P. Barber, for Appellants.

This Court has jurisdiction. The note sued on in the Justice's Court being ninety-eight dollars and ninety-one cents; the costs paid by plaintiffs, seventy-six dollars and fifty-five cents; and the costs in the County Court, ninety dollars and ten cents; in all two hundred and sixty-five dollars and fifty-six cents, constitute the amount in dispute. (Gordon v. Ross, 2 Cal. 156; 7 Peters U. S. 647; 16 Peters U. S. 97.)

L. Quint, and Robinson, Beatty & Heacock, for Respondents, argued:

First — That in estimating the amount in dispute, the item of seventy-six dollars and fifty-five cents, costs in the Justice's Court, should not be included, because when the County Court ordered a trial de novo the judgment for costs became a nullity. (Campbell v. Howard, 5 Mass. 378; Keen v. Turner, Ib. 265.) And that as the original demand, ninety-eight dollars and ninety-one cents, added to the costs in the County Court, ninety dollars and ten cents, fell below two hundred dollars, this Court had no jurisdiction.

Second — That the true rule was for this Court not to entertain jurisdiction except in cases where two hundred dollars, over and above costs, are involved.

FIELD, J. delivered the opinion of the Court — TERRY, C. J. concurring.

This action was brought originally in a Justice's Court, where the defendant obtained judgment for seventy-six dollars and fifty-five cents costs. The demand claimed in the complaint is ninety-eight dollars and ninety-one cents. On the trial upon appeal in the County Court the plaintiff was nonsuited and judgment was entered against him for ninety dollars and ten cents costs. From this judgment the appeal is taken, and the proposition presented is, whether this Court possesses any appellate jurisdiction to entertain it; and the solution of the proposition depends upon the question whether costs can properly be considered as forming any part of the matter in dispute between the parties.

Dunphy and Hildrith v. Guindon et al.

Section 4 of Article 6 of the Constitution provides that "the Supreme Court shall have appellate jurisdiction in all cases when the matter in dispute exceeds two hundred dollars; when the legality of any tax, toll, or impost, or municipal fine, is in question, and in all criminal cases amounting to felony, on questions of law alone;" and in Conant v. Conant, (10 Cal. 253,) we construed this section to mean that the Court possesses appellate jurisdiction in all cases; provided, that when the subject of litigation is capable of pecuniary computation, the matter in dispute must exceed in value or amount two hundred dollars, unless the legality of a tax, toll, impost, or municipal fine, is drawn in question. By matter in dispute, is meant the subject of litigation. It can have no other rational meaning. It is the matter for which suit is brought—the matter upon which issue is joined, and in relation to which witnesses are examined, juries are called, and the verdict is rendered. The costs are merely incidental to the suit. It is not for them the action is brought or defended, or upon them the witnesses are examined or the jury pass. We are aware of the decision in Gordon v. Ross, (2 Cal. 156,) and if any reason were wanting for overruling it as authority, aside from the inherent defect in the reasoning of the opinion, it is to be found in the practical operation of the decision, which has been, to a great extent, to destroy the limitation expressly imposed by the Constitution upon appeals to this Court, in cases under two hundred dollars. It has led to appeals in cases of money demands where the amount claimed was less than one hundred dollars, as in the present case, to the manifest departure from the intention and language of the Constitution. That instrument allows appeals when the legality of a tax, toll, impost, or municipal fine, is in question, without reference to the actual amount claimed, but in money demands under two hundred dollars, involving no such question, it leaves, and we think, wisely, the remedy of the parties to their own appeal to the County Court.

 Brady v. Reynolds.

Our conclusion, then, is that the costs of a suit form no part of the matter in dispute; that to the exercise of the appellate jurisdiction of this Court in cases of mere money demands not involving the legality of any tax, toll, impost, or municipal fine, the amount for which suit is brought must exceed two hundred dollars, and, as a consequence, that no appeal lies in the present case.

Appeal dismissed.

BRADY v. REYNOLDS.

WHERE a promissory note was made payable to S. and previously to its delivery to the payee, was indorsed for the accommodation of the maker, by H. and brother and defendant, upon an agreement of the indorsers with each other that each would become surety if the other would; Held, that the indorsers were guarantors and were jointly and not severally liable, in a suit by the payee, or a third person taking the note after maturity.

To create a several liability, express words are necessary.

The decision of this Court in Riggs v. Waldo, 2 Cal. 485, only goes to the extent of holding that a notice of protest is an essential to charge a guarantor as an indorser.

Quere: Whether the intimation of the Court in that case as to there being no distinction between the undertaking of an indorser and that of a guarantor, is correct. The contract of indorsement is, primarily, that of transfer; the contract of guaranty is that of security.

A judgment against one or more joint guarantors of a note bars the action against the others. When the contract is joint, and not joint and several, the entire cause of action is merged in the judgment.

APPEAL from the Fourth District.

Plaintiff had judgment below, and defendant appealed.

The facts appear in the opinion of the Court.

Heydenfeldt and Papy for Appellant.

Charles H. S. Williams, for Respondent.

FIELD, J. delivered the opinion of the Court—TERRY, C. J. concurring.

This action is brought to charge the defendant as indorser upon a promissory note of one Minier. The note is payable to one William Smith, and previously to its delivery to the payee, was indorsed by Harper and brother and the defendant. These parties were accommodation indorsers; they placed their names on the paper to assist the maker in obtaining money upon it.

The indorsement was made by them upon an agreement with each other that they would each become surety if the other would, or, in other words, that they would become sureties together. The indorsement is not evidence of any title in the parties, or of any transfer thereof; it is of an irregular character, not made in the usual course of business, and is, in fact, nothing more than a guaranty. It is of no consequence whether the name of Reynolds was in fact signed before or after that of the Harpers, as the undertaking of all must be regarded as joint, as much so as if they had signed the contract on a distinct and separate instrument. Had they signed a promissory note, their contract would, of course, have been regarded as joint, and not several, and it is only by overlooking the fact that they are not regular indorsers, but guarantors, that any doubt can be suggested of their joint liability. Over their names a contract of guaranty could have been written in terms, and its construction would necessarily have been that it was joint, and not several, for it is a settled principle that there must be express words to create a several liability. (Chitty on Contracts, 96; 1 Chitty's Plead. 41.) The decision of this Court in Riggs v. Waldo, (2 Cal. 485,) only goes to the extent of holding that a notice of protest is as essential to charge a guarantor as an indorser. It does not change the previous rule in relation to guarantors in any other respect. There are words, it is true, in the opinion which lead to the inference that the distinguished Judge, who delivered it, considered the distinction between the undertaking of an indorser and that of a guarantor, more nice and subtle than solid and just. In this we may differ from him, for we are disposed to regard the undertaking of the two as materially different. The contract of both is conditional, but the conditions are unlike. The contract of indorsement is primarily that of transfer; the contract of guaranty is that of security. It is unnecessary, however, to question the language or reasoning of the opinion — the case only decides that notice of protest is equally necessary to fix the liability of a guarantor as to fix that of an indorser.

The undertaking of the Harpers, and the defendant being then regarded as joint, the principal question raised upon the appeal is susceptible of a ready solution. The payee sued the Harpers upon the guaranty, and recovered judgment. The en-

---

the contract was merged in that judgment. The defendant was not made a party to the suit, and as he was only liable jointly with the Harpers, the effect of the judgment was to relieve him of all responsibility. The payee could not have maintained a suit subsequently against the defendant, and the assignment of the note gave to the plaintiff no greater rights than the payee possessed. There is no rule better settled than that a judgment against one on a joint contract of several, bars the action against the others, even though the latter were dormant partners unknown to the plaintiff when the original action was brought. (Smith v. Black, 9 Seargt. & Rawle, 142; Ward v. Johnson, 13 Mass. 148.) When the contract is joint, and not joint and several, the entire cause of action is merged in the judgment. The joint liability of the parties not sued with those against whom the judgment has passed, being gone, their entire liability is extinguished. They cannot be sued separately, for they have incurred no several obligation; they cannot be sued jointly with the others, because judgment has been already rendered against the latter, who would otherwise be subject to two suits for the same matter. (See, also, Pierce v. Kearney, 5 Hill, 86; Taylor v. Claypool, 5 Black. 557.)

The views we have taken go to the marrow of the case, and render it unnecessary to consider the other positions urged upon our attention.

Judgment reversed and cause remanded.

ORTMAN et al. v. DIXON *et al.

QUERY: Whether a water right, to pass the legal title from grantor to grantee, the premises being in adverse possession, must be conveyed by deed?

Any contract executed which passes the equitable right to a ditch and the use of the water appurtenant to, or connected with, the ditch, as the property of the grantee, is enough to insure to him the rights for which he stipulated as against an adverse claimant.

The difference between instruments sealed and unsealed is, at this day, a mere unmeaning and arbitrary distinction made by technical law, unsustained by reason. By the common law, the equitable title to realty may be conveyed by instrument not under seal, if otherwise sufficient; and this equitable title, accompanied by possession, is sufficient under our system to give the right of possession.

Under our system, probably, an action can be maintained upon any title legal or equitable, or upon an instrument, sealed or unsealed, which entitles plaintiff to the possession of the property in dispute as against the defendant.

In a proceeding in equity an equitable title is as good as a legal title, either for defense or recovery.

A prior appropriator of the water of a stream for mill purposes is entitled to it to the extent appropriated, and for those purposes to the exclusion of any subsequent appropriation of it for the same or any other purpose. But the extent of the right depends on the nature and uses of the appropriation. If he suffers a portion of the water, or the body of it, after running the mill, to go on down its accustomed course, persons below may appropriate this residuum so as to make it a vested right.

No distinction can be drawn between a mill owner and a miner as to their rights in appropriating water.

Query: Whether a party, by erecting a mill and dam, becomes entitled to the water in specie, and whether he is entitled to anything more than the use of the water as a motive power — whether there may not be an appropriation of a mere use of the water as well as an appropriation of it as property for sale?

In equity cases, where the proofs are conflicting, the findings will not usually be disturbed.

APPEAL from the Tenth District.

The facts appear in the opinion. The Court below decreed:

1st. That defendants were first entitled to the water flowing in Mill Creek for the use of their saw-mill.

2d. That plaintiffs were entitled to the use of a sufficient quantity of the water of the stream to fill and supply their Ditch No. 2, at such times as the defendants were not using the same to propel their mill.

3d. That plaintiffs were entitled to the water to fill their Ditch No. 2, in preference to the ditch of defendants, No. 3.

4th. That when plaintiffs' ditch is filled according to its capacity to contain water, then, if there remain any surplus of water flowing in the stream, the defendants are entitled to have such surplus.

Defendants appeal.

E. D. Wheeler, for Appellants.

1st. Can the legal title to a water right pass by a bill of sale not under seal? As a legal proposition, this is too clear to need much argument. A water right is a thing lying in grant, and can be conveyed only by deed under seal. The authorities all agree on this point. It is a rule as firmly established as any principle of the common law. The common law rule upon this subject was expressly adopted in this State in Hill v. Newman, 5 Cal. 445. The same rule is laid down in Bullen v. Runnels, 2 N. H. 261, 262; Fentiman v. Smith, 4 East, 107; Carson v. Blazer, 2 Binney, 490; Thompson v. Gregory, 4 Johns. 83; Angell on Water Courses, Secs. 168-171.

---

Ortman et al. v. Dixon et al.

---

Defendants had a right to change the point of diversion from the main stream, provided only such change did not impair the rights of others. In this case the same quantity of water was taken, and hence no one was injured. The fact that defendants did not always use all the water they were entitled to at their mill amounts to nothing. (Angell on Water Courses, Sec. 230.) That a party may change the mode, object, and place, of using a water right, so that the quantity be not increased. (See Whittier v. Coch. Man. Co. 9 N. H. 458; Bullen v. Runnels, 2 N. H. 255; Johnson v. Rand, 6 N. H. 22; Saunders v. Newman, 1 Barn. & Ald. 258; Bigelow v. Battle, 15 Mass. 313; Kelly v. Natoma Water Co. 6 Cal. 105; Maeris v. Bicknell, 7 Cal. 261; Angell on Water Courses, Sections 227, 228, 229; 14 Mees. & Wels. 789; Tyler v. Wilkinson, 4 Mason, 397; Palmer v. Mulligan, 3 Caines, 307.)

The question whether a water right can pass, except by deed, does not arise in this case, because there is no issue as to the ownership of the ditch. Besides, if no writing at all had been executed the respondents are in possession, and had been for years prior to the commencement of this action, and certainly, their possession will enable them to maintain an action against a trespass.

The authorities cited by the Appellants' counsel are not applicable to a case of this kind. In those cases the right to use the water followed the ownership of the soil over which it ran, and was an incident thereto; but in this State, and particularly in the mountains and mineral regions, the right to the use of the water is acquired by prior appropriation and user only, and this is the only notice that third parties can have of such a right in any one.

Appellants' second point amounts to this, that one who happens to be the first appropriator, no matter at what point on a stream, has the right at any time, by virtue of his naked appropriation and possession, to abandon his original location and divert the water at any point higher up the stream, notwithstanding others may have, in the meantime, at intermediate points, erected improvements and appropriated the water to useful purposes, and thus completely cut off such intermediate parties; this cannot be done.

Ortman et al. v. Dixon et al.

---

The authorities cited by Appellants have no bearing upon the case, so far as we have been able to discover; they only go to the extent of deciding that one may turn the water out of the stream at a point below his original place of diversion, provided he injure no one else. This, so far as our case is concerned, we are willing to admit.

BALDWIN, J. delivered the opinion of the Court — TERRY, C. J. concurring.

Bill filed for an injunction against the defendants, to restrain them from turning the waters of a stream, called Mill Creek, into a ditch constructed by them, known as Ditch, No. 3, as marked on the map accompanying the pleadings.

Two main questions arise on the record: 1st. Can a water right be conveyed by a bill of sale not under seal? and, 2d. Has the prior locator of a water privilege the right to change the point of diversion from the main stream under the facts hereafter stated?

First — We do not consider that it is at all necessary to hold that a water right, so as to pass the legal title from grantor to grantee (the premises being in adverse possession), must be conveyed by deed; for here the right of the water was appurtenant to, or connected with, a ditch. Any executed contract which passed the equitable right to the ditch, and the use of the water as the property of the grantee, is enough to assure to him the rights for which he stipulated as against an adverse claimant. Possession itself would be enough, and surely that possession is no worse for being associated with an equitable right. The difference between instruments sealed and unsealed is at least, at this day, a mere arbitrary and unmeaning distinction made by technical law, unsustained by reason; and, though the Courts may have no right to abrogate what the law has established, even when the rule be senseless, yet we will not go out of our way to give effect to such distinctions, when the law does not clearly so require. But this distinction between sealed and unsealed papers has no force, as a general rule, except in a particular class of cases to which this does not belong. Where an instrument touching title to the realty is not under seal, the strict legal title, at common law, was not conveyed; but the equitable title might be conveyed by an instrument not sealed, if otherwise sufficient; and this equitable title, if accompanied by possession, is sufficient, under our system, to give a right of possession. Indeed, we do not see, under our system of practice, which recognizes none of the old forms of action, but which was designed to afford a plain, unembarrassed remedy upon the particular facts of each case, why an action cannot be maintained upon any title, legal or equitable; or upon an instrument sealed or unsealed, which entitles the plaintiff to the possession of the property in dispute as against the defendant. But this is a proceeding in equity, and in that form an equitable title is as good as a legal title, as a matter for defense or recovery.

Second — The second question is of more difficulty; it involves the necessity of an examination of the particular facts in connection with which it is made. In the fall of 1851, the first ditch was constructed, designated on the map filed as Ditch No. 1, for the purpose of conveying the water flowing in Mill Creek to Atchinson's Bar. Ortman first commenced the building of the ditch, and constructed it only a few rods. It was afterwards extended by the miners in that locality to the claims on Atchinson's Bar. It appears, when first located, to have been used as common property. No charge was ever made for the waters it conveyed, and the miners indiscriminately repaired the ditch and took the water as they required it to wash their dirt. It was not reputed or known to be the exclusive property of any particular person, though, from the testimony, Ortman was the first to commence its excavation. Ortman and all others have long since abandoned the use of the first ditch.

In January, 1852, the defendants took up the waters of the creek for milling purposes, and erected a saw mill, which they have owned ever since, and used the same from time to time. In 1853, Louis Duhamel, with two others, commenced the construction of a second ditch, marked Ditch, No. 2 on the map, at a point above defendant's mill-pond, and higher up the stream, by means of which they diverted water of the creek to the same mining claims as the first ditch did. Duhamel & Co. used the water which their ditch afforded at such times as the defendants were not engaged in running their mill, but desisted whenever the defendants had use for the water. The evidence shows that

Duhamel & Co. recognized and acquiesced in the prior rights of defendants to the water of this creek. Sometime in the year 1853, Duhamel & Co. sold the ditch to the plaintiffs, by which they acquired all the rights and privileges possessed by Duhamel & Co. and have since that time used the water for mining. The defendants, in the fall of 1856, constructed a third ditch, still higher up the stream, and above the last mentioned Ditch, No. 2 of the plaintiff, through which they diverted all the water ordinarily flowing in the creek, and conveyed it to near the same mining claims as the other two ditches, which water they disposed of to the miners.

We presume that it is not to be doubted that the defendants, having first appropriated the water for their mill purposes, are entitled to it to the extent appropriated, and for those purposes to the exclusion of any subsequent appropriation of it for the same or any other use. We hold the absolute property in such cases to pass by appropriation as it would pass by grant.

But another and different question arises, and that is, to what extent does this power or right go? The measure of the right, as to extent, follows the nature of the appropriation, or the uses for which it is taken. The intent to take and appropriate and the outward act, go together. If we concede that a man has right by mere priority to take as much water from a running stream as he chooses, to be applied to such purposes as he pleases, the question still arises; what did he choose to take? And this depends upon the general and particular uses he makes of it. If, for instance, a man takes up water to irrigate his meadow at certain seasons, the act of appropriation, the means used to carry out the purpose, and the use made of the water, would qualify his right of appropriation to a taking for a specific purpose, and limit the quantity to that purpose, or to so much as necessary for it. So, if A erects a mill on a running stream, this shows an appropriation of the water for the mill; but, if he suffers a portion of the water, or the body of it, after running the mill, to go on down its accustomed course, we do not see why persons below may not as well appropriate this residuum as he could appropriate the first use. The truth is, he only appropriates so much as he needs for the given purpose. It may be true, as the counsel has ingeniously argued, that he may change the use, and even the place of using; but this concession does not help the argument, for the question is not how he may use his own, but what is his own?

Ortman et al. v. Dixon et al.

The principle is not materially different when applied to the fact that the ditch of defendant was built above plaintiff's mill, and the water diverted so as to be carried out of the old channel or course; for, upon the ground suggested, plaintiff was only entitled to the water for the purposes of the mill. He was entitled to all, whenever all was necessary for the mill; but whenever the mill did not need or could not use it for its operations, the defendant could use it for his purposes. It is not a question of priority, as to two classes of appropriators; for we cannot draw any distinction between the mill owner and the miner. But it is a question between claimants of the same article — each claiming a part. There is no real conflict of title — the latter only claiming what is left by the former, and what the former has not taken. The mistake of the argument of Appellants' counsel is, in assuming that the mill owner had appropriated all of this water, and, therefore, could use all for any other purpose. But the finding is, and we assume the proof, that he only appropriated so much as was needed for running his mill. It is as if the paramount proprietor had made him a grant of so much water as was so needed. When the Respondent's predecessor located his ditch, this was the beginning of his right. The Appellant could not impair this right.

It might be argued with great force that the mill owner was not entitled by erecting his mill and dam to the water in specie, and as a commodity to be taken out and sold; that he is only entitled to its use as a motive power; that it would lead to injurious consequences to hold that a man erecting a mill and dam on a large stream of running water, could use it as long as he chose and then divert it from the ditches below; that the right to water comes from the appropriation, and that appropriation is taking with the intent to apply to the uses of the person taking; and there may be as well an appropriation of a limited quantity, or for a limited purpose — an appropriation of a mere use as an appropriation of the water as property for sale. But it is not necessary to go to this length for any purpose of this decision. It is enough to hold that this appropriation, according to the finding of facts, was not an appropriation of all this water as the property of the Appellant; but only an appropriation of so much as necessary for the mill; and that the Appellant, after the claim to this residuum had attached by the plaintiff's appropriation, could not enlarge his right at the expense of the Respondent's rights already vested.

We take the facts as they are found by the Court below. It is admitted by the counsel that the proofs are conflicting; and we do not usually interfere in such instances.

CRAVENS v. DEWEY.

If in any case one partner can assign to another partner his interest in a firm claim and then become a witness for him, he cannot when the claim is for goods sold and delivered, because this is an unliquidated demand within the Practice Act.

The granting of a nonsuit on the facts is a question of law, and, if the proper exceptions be taken, may be reviewed on appeal without motion for new trial. Nonsuit not proper where there is any evidence tending to prove the indebtedness. In a bill of sale of goods sold and delivered a recital that the consideration was paid, is only prima facie evidence of that fact, which may be rebutted or explained by parol.

APPEAL from the Fifteenth District.

On the 25th of November, 1857, Goodwin & Cravens being indebted to defendant, Dewey, in the sum of five thousand three hundred dollars, agreed to sell to him their stock of goods, in their store at Spanish Ranch, together with their hogs, cows, mules, etc. The goods, etc. were inventoried and estimated at seven thousand dollars, which was agreed to be the consideration of the sale. A bill of sale was executed by Goodwin & Cravens to Dewey, in which the consideration is thus stated: "For the sum of seven thousand dollars to us in hand paid, in lawful money of the United States, the receipt whereof is hereby acknowledged." Defendant receipted, and delivered to plaintiffs their notes and accounts, amounting to about five thousand three hundred dollars, in part payment of the goods, etc.

sold, but never paid anything more. Defendant took possession of the goods after the sale, and sold them to third parties.

Plaintiffs sue for the difference between the consideration in the bill of sale, seven thousand dollars, and the indebtedness receipted for, five thousand three hundred dollars.

The Court below nonsuited plaintiff on the ground

First—That he had failed to show any contract or agreement on the part of defendant to pay the difference; and,

Second—That the bill of sale was unimpeached, and being a contract in writing, could not be impeached unless uncertain in its terms.

Jas. L. English, for Appellant.

First—The Court below erred in sustaining the objection to the competency of Goodwin as a witness for plaintiff, and in excluding him from testifying in the case. The demand sued on was not “unliquidated” within Section 4 of the Practice Act as amended by the Act of May 7th, 1855, p. 303. (Allen v. Citizens' Navigation Co. 6 Cal. 402; Gray v. Garrison, 9 Cal. 325.)

Second—The Court below erred in sustaining the motion for and entering a judgment of nonsuit, the evidence adduced by plaintiff being sufficient in law to have entitled him to a judgment for the amount claimed.

The bill of sale, though reciting the consideration as paid, is merely prima facie evidence, and may be contradicted by parol proof. This is true even of a deed. (1 Green. Ev. Section 305; 3 Phillips on Ev. by Cowen & Hill, 384; 4 Ib. 583, 584, note 289; Shephard v. Little, 14 Johns. R. 210; Jordan v. Cooper, 3 Serg. & Rawle, 564, 580; Gulley v. Grubbs, 1 J. J. Cravens v. Dewey.

First — Goodwin was properly rejected as an incompetent witness for plaintiff, because he was the assignee of one-half of the account sued on. The suit was for the balance of an account for a stock of goods sold. Section — Practice Act as amended by Act of 1855. The complaint treats the demand sued on as an account, and plaintiff must abide by it. (4 Cal. 400.)

Second — The appeal must be dismissed, because no motion for new trial was made in the Court below. The Court will not look into the statement and review facts where no motion for new trial was made. (Ingraham v. Guildemester et al. 2 Cal. 161; Garwood v. Simpson, 8 Cal. 108; Dewey v. Bowman, Id. 148.)

Where the plaintiff is nonsuited on the facts, no motion for new trial is necessary, the action of the Court in granting a nonsuit being a pure question of law. (Pratt v. Hull, 13 Johns. 335.)

BALDWIN, J. delivered the opinion of the Court — TERRY, C. J. concurring.

This action was brought to recover a sum of money due for goods sold by Goodwin and plaintiff, partners, to the defendant, Goodwin assigning his interest to the plaintiff. The case having been tried by the Court a nonsuit was ordered, from which plaintiff appeals. Two errors are assigned:

First — That Goodwin, who was offered as a witness for plaintiff, was rejected as incompetent. If in any case one partner can assign to another his interest in a firm claim and afterwards become a witness for him, he could not in this case, for the claim here sued on was clearly an unliquidated demand, within the meaning of the Practice Act.

Second — The second error assigned is in granting a nonsuit. A preliminary objection is taken that no motion for a new trial was made. Nor is any necessary. The granting of the nonsuit on the facts, being a pure question of law, which is properly raised on the record for review by exception taken.

The Court, we think, should not have granted a nonsuit. There was some evidence tending to prove an indebtedness, by express contract or implied, from defendant to plaintiff. The fact that the bill of sale recited the consideration as paid did not conclude the plaintiff as to that fact, for it is well settled that such recitals are only prima facie evidence, which may be rebutted or explained by parol proof.

Judgment reversed and cause remanded.

HOLVERSTOT v. BUGBY et al.

WHERE no grounds or reasons are stated on motions for nonsuit and new trial, and no exceptions taken to instructions of the Court, errors cannot be assigned.

APPEAL from the Sixth District.

Action by plaintiff, as sole trader, under the Act of 1852, to recover of defendants damages for the wrongful seizure and detention of certain personal property. About eight o'clock on the morning of December 5th, 1856, plaintiff made her declaration of intention to carry on business as a sole trader. This declaration, acknowledged before a Justice of the Peace, was filed in the Recorder's office, December 29th, 1856, and published January 18th, 1857. At nine o'clock in the morning of December 5th, 1856, J. B. Wilson executed and delivered to plaintiff a bill of sale of the furniture, fixtures, liquors, etc. of a restaurant owned by him, and delivered possession of the same, which possession was retained by plaintiff until noon of that day, when defendant, Bugby, as Constable, seized them under a writ of attachment in the suit of Greenbaum & Bucki v. Wilson. Plaintiff, however, carried on the restaurant for about two weeks, when the property was sold by Bugby.

On the trial plaintiff offered in evidence her declaration as sole trader, with the Recorder's certificate of filing, etc. indorsed; to the admission of which, defendant's counsel objected, on the ground that said declaration was recorded too late. The Court overruled the objection, and defendant excepted.

W. S. Long, for Appellant.

The declaration of intention to become a sole trader was not competent evidence, because it shows on its face that it was acknowledge on the 5th December, 1856, recorded on the 29th December, 1856, and was not published until January 18, 1857. Under the Act (Wood's Dig. 489, 490, Sections 2, 3,) plaintiff did not become a sole trader until the 18th January, 1857, and hence was incapable of contracting with Wilson on December 5th, 1856, for the goods in the restaurant, and they still remained liable to execution at the suit of any creditor of Wilson.

Winans, for Respondent.

The record discloses no error, nor could the defendant avail himself of it, if error there were, because he took no material exceptions, nor did he state the grounds of his motions for nonsuit and new trial.

BALDWIN, J. delivered the opinion of the Court — FIND, J. concurring.

We are not satisfied, from the examination of this record, that there is any substantial error to the prejudice of the Appellant. But we cannot consider the errors assigned, except that as to the admission of the declaration of plaintiff as sole trader, which is not well taken.

1. No grounds or reasons were given for the nonsuit asked.
2. No grounds were given for the motion for the new trial.
3. No exceptions were taken to the instructions of the Court.

We cannot, then, look into the evidence to see if the verdict is sanctioned by the proof, or the instructions by the law. The affidavits for new trial, for newly discovered evidence, are insufficient if we could consider them.

Judgment affirmed.

- A note stating, that "We, the undersigned Trustees of the First African Methodist Episcopal Church, in behalf of the whole board of Trustees of said Association, promise to pay," etc. and signed, without qualification, by two persons, having authority, is the note of the church, and not of the signers.
- If, on the face of an instrument not under seal, executed by an agent, with competent authority, signing his own name simply, it appears that the agent executed it in behalf of the principal, the principal, and not the agent, is bound.
- If, in the body of a note, it appear that the note is the note of the principal, or made by the signer for and as agent of the principal, it is the note of the latter even though the words "agent for," or the like, are not added to the signature.

APPEAL from the Twelfth District.

To the facts stated in the opinion it may be added, that the Court below refused the following instructions asked by defendant:

1. That if the jury believe, from the evidence, that the notes on which this suit is brought were given by defendants, bona fide, as "Trustees of the First African Methodist Episcopal Church," for work, labor, and material furnished by, and services due, Stokes by the Church, then the plaintiff is not entitled to recover in this action.
2. If the jury believe, that at the time the notes were signed the defendants had authority from the Trustees to execute notes to Stokes, and that these were given at the solicitation of Stokes, and with his knowledge and agreement, that they were not binding on the defendants, individually, then the defendant is not liable.

Plaintiff had judgment, and defendants appeal.

H. Lee, also for Appellants.

This note differs very materially from those instruments in which it has been held that the words "Trustees," etc. is a mere descriptio personæ. (Hills v. Bannister, 8 Cow. 33; Aud v. Magruder, 10 Cal. 282.)

Haskell v. Cornish et al.

The legal effect of this note is, that the signers, in their capacity of Trustees of the Church, will pay. (6 Harris & Johns. 618.) The words "for value received by said association," make the agency of the makers apparent on the face of the note. (Maher et al. v. Overton, 9 La. 117, 118. See, also, Ten Eyck et als. v. Vanderpoel, 8 John. 120; Stanton v. Camp, 4 Barb. 274; Mott v. Hicks, 1 Cow. 515, 540.) The church being liable, the signers of the note are not. (Randall v. Van Vechten et al. 19 John. 59, 63.) Even if this be not so, still it does not follow that the defendant is liable. (Ogden v. Raymond, 23 Conn. 384-5.) The face of the note is sufficient to put a purchaser on inquiry. (1 Cow. 539.)

G. P. Fobes, for Respondent.

The defendants evidently intended to make themselves personally liable on said notes, for the reason, that it nowhere in said notes appears that they were officers of the Board of Trustees, they don't describe themselves as President and Secretary, but merely as Trustees, who promise in behalf of the whole Board of Trustees, not of the association; they don't say the notes are to be paid out of the association, but that they will pay them, themselves individually, and they execute the notes in their individual capacity; what is contained in the notes more than in an ordinary note is merely descriptive, going to show the consideration; evidently in compliance with the Statutes concerning Fraudulent Conveyances and Contracts. (Wood's Digest, p. 106, at 400, Sec. 12.) The addition of Trustees, etc. is a mere descriptio personarum. (8 Cowen's R. 33; 9 John. 33, 41; Sayer v. Nichols, 7 Cal.; 5 Cal. 458; Story's Promissory Notes, p. 70, Secs. 63, 70; Packard v. Nye, 2 Met. R. 47; Simmonds v. Heard, 23 Pick. R. 121; Tippet v. Walker, 4 Mass. R. 595.)

Suit below on a promissory note in this form:

Haskell v. Cornish et al.

“San Francisco, April 5, 1855.

Eight months after date, we, the undersigned, Trustees of the First African Methodist Episcopal Church, in behalf of the whole Board of Trustees of said Association, promise to pay to Darius Stokes, or order, four hundred and ninety-eight and seventy-five one hundredth dollars, with interest at three per cent. per month, payable monthly till paid, for value received by said Association.

(Signed,)

HENRY C. CORNISH,

The main question depends upon the construction of this instrument. Is it the note of the individuals signing it, or of the Board of Trustees of the Church, which was shown to be a corporation, or of the corporation?

The general rule which governs in such cases is, that although a party acts, in making an obligation of this kind, as an agent, yet he does not protect himself from liability unless the instrument shows that in executing it he is such agent, and meant only to contract for his principal. A person being agent, may as well bind himself personally to pay a note, as if he were not agent; and an agent, if he chooses, may bind himself for his principal as well as he may bind himself on his individual account. In instruments not under seal, or not required to be executed with any particular formality, it is not important in what form the obligation of the party executing as agent or principal, is expressed — if, from the entire instrument, the true character of it can be gathered. The essential thing is, that the paper show this fact. It has been held, that generally, the mere words “agent, trustee, guardian, administrator,” and the like, added to the name of the signer do not qualify the terms in the body of the obligation, when those terms import a duty of payment by such signer. These terms are considered as merely descriptive of, or as identifying, the person signing. But in cases of promissory notes, it is not necessary that the agent should add to his signature the words “agent for,” etc. or sign the principal’s name by himself as agent, as is the usual and proper way of executing deeds by Attorney. If, in the body of the paper, it appears that the note is the note of the principal, or made by the signer for, and as agent for, the principal, this is enough to make it the note of the principal. It has been held in many cases, that this is the rule even in respect to sealed instruments. The rule is thus stated in Pentz v. Stanton, (10 Wend. 277.)

Haskell v. Cornish et al.

"There is no doubt that a person may draw, accept, or indorse, a bill by his agent or Attorney, and that it will be as obligatory upon him as though it were done by his own hand. But the agent in such case must either sign the name of the principal to the bill, or it must appear on the face of the bill itself, in some way or another, that it was in fact drawn for him, or the principal will not be bound. The particular form of the execution is not material if it be substantially done in the name of the principal. (1 East, 434; 2 Id. 142; 3 Esp. 266; 2 Strange, 705; Comyn's Dig. Attorney, C. 14; 1 Camp. 485-6, 384; 6 T. R. 176.) This doctrine is very clearly stated in Stackpole v. Arnold, (11 Mass. R. 27,) and in Arfredson v. Ladd, (12 Id. 173.) * * * It is well settled that if a private agent draw a bill or enter into any other contract in his own name, without stating that he acts as agent, so as to bind his principal, he will be personally liable. (Chitty on Bills, 36, and cases there cited; 5 Taunt. 749; 2 Marsh, 454; 5 East, 148; 1 Bos. & Pul. 368; 1 T. R. 181.) It is not sufficient to charge the principal or protect the agent from personal responsibility merely to describe himself as agent, if the language of the instrument imports a personal contract on his part. (5 Mass. R. 299; 6 Id. 58; 8 Id. 103; 1 Gale, 630; Chitty, 52; 9 Cranch, 155.) But where the name of the principal appears on the face of the instrument or contract, and it is evident that the agent did not intend to bind himself personally, but acted merely on behalf of the principal, if he acted by competent authority, the principal, and not the agent, will be bound." (Rathbone v. Budlong, 15 Johns. R. 1; Owen v. Gooch, 2 Esp. R. 567; Mott v. Hicks, 1 Cow. 513, and the cases there referred to in the Opinion of the Judges; Rossiter v. Rossiter, 8 Wendell, 494.)

Let us apply this rule to the note before us. The defendants say: "We, the undersigned, Trustees of the F. A. M. E. C. in behalf of the whole Board of Trustees of said Association, promise to pay, etc. for value received of said Association." The defendants were two of this Board, and they promise on behalf of the whole Board, which it seems consisted of seven members, to pay so much money, for value received, of the Association. It is not the sole note of two signers. It imports, taken altogether, to be the note of the whole Board of Trustees of the corporation, and thus the note of the corporation itself. We think this is the fair and legitimate meaning of the instrument. If A says, "On behalf of B, and for value received by him, I, A, as agent for B, promise to pay C one hundred dollars," it would seem that this is the note of B. It is true A makes the note, but he makes it on behalf of B, which, especially in connection with the statement of the consideration passing or having passed to B, would imply very clearly that the note was signed by A as agent of B, the obligation to pay being his. We understand Mr. Parsons on Contracts, (1 vol. p. 119) to maintain, substantially, this doctrine. Speaking of corporations, he says: "If a conveyance, purporting to be the conveyance of a corporation, made by one authorized to make it for them, be in fact executed by the Attorney as his own deed, it is not the deed of the corporation, although it was intended to be so, and the Attorney had full authority to make it so. And if the deed be written throughout as the deed of the corporation, and the Attorney when executing it declares that he executes it on behalf of the corporation, but says in witness whereof I set my hand and seal, this is his deed only, and does not pass the land of the corporation. If, however, it was only a simple contract which was executed in this way, it might be inferred from the general principles of the law of agency that it would be valid as the contract of the corporation, for it would be a contract made by one as the agent of another, and containing the express declaration that it was so made."

Haskell v. Cornish et al.

This is even a stronger case, for here the note is given for the debt of the church by the Trustees, the proper officers of the corporation, reciting the consideration to have proceeded from the corporation. Such a note, so written, we think, should have put every purchaser upon inquiry as to the character and extent of the liability thereby incurred, if, indeed, it does not show a clear case of the liability of the corporation. It seems that this debt was incurred for building the church, and the note made in pursuance of a resolution of the Board of Trustees. If the defendants had no power to execute this note, a different question might arise as to their liability, but the Court erred in its rulings on the point noticed above.

Hutchinson v. Bours.

---

Judgment reversed and cause remanded.

---

HUTCHINSON v. BOURS.

WHERE there is no question as to the proper judgment to be entered on a verdict, the judgment should be entered at once, without waiting for a motion for new trial.

A suspension of proceedings under the judgment will fully protect the losing party.

A Court may, in term time or vacation, order judgment on a verdict rendered and recorded, if the motion for new trial were taken under advisement. Pending a motion for a new trial, taken under advisement for decision in vacation by consent of parties, another term of the Court intervenes, when, upon some incidental motion, the cause was continued and the Court adjourned: Held, that the continuance was only a continuance of the motion for new trial, and did not affect the power of the Court to act on the motion at its convenience.

The judgment, in pursuance of the verdict, is the act of law upon record facts, and follows as a matter of course, unless the Court intervenes.

A statement agreed on by parties should not, probably, be amended by the Court on motion, except under a very clear showing of mistake or fraud.

A statement on appeal, to be regarded, must be entire.
Statements and exceptions should be speedily settled.

APPEAL from the Fifth District.

For case see opinion.

Hall & Huggins, for Appellants.

The Court had no power to render judgment in vacation. (Smith v. Chichester, 1 Cal. 409; 5 Cal. 493; Ib. 406; Robb v. Robb, 6 Id. 21; Whippley v. Flower, Id. 630; People v. Talmadge, Id. 256; Phelps v. Peabody, 7 Id. 50; Morris v. Dopman & West, 3 Cal. 257; Turner v. McIlhany, 6 Id. 287; Stearns v. Aguirre et al. 7 Cal. 443; Feillett v. Engler, 8 Ib. 76.)

The agreement only extended to deciding the motion for new trial in vacation. Besides, the motion to amend the statement should have been decided before the motion for new trial.

D. W. Perley, for Respondent.

The law is, that when a District Court adjourns for the term it loses all control over cases where final judgment has been rendered, unless jurisdiction is retained by some motion or proceeding made during the term; but that where such motion or proceeding has been made during the term, the jurisdiction of the Court still obtains and the Court may, at any time after the determination of said motion, render or amend a judgment in that case nunc pro tunc, provided there is anything in the record to render a judgment upon or to amend by. The judgment to be rendered or the amendment to be made, must be based upon the minutes of the Court or upon some matter of record, and not resting merely in the memory of the Judge. And these principles govern this case for Respondent.

---

Hutchinson v. Boura.

---

The main error assigned is that the judgment was entered in vacation. A verdict was found in the Court below, in January, 1857, and motion was thereupon made for a stay of proceedings, which was granted, to enable plaintiff to move for a new trial. No judgment was then entered. On the 26th day of January, plaintiff filed his statement on motion for new trial, and, on the following day, defendants filed their amendment. On the 31st January, plaintiff and defendants made an agreed statement and filed it, and on the same day, by consent, in open Court, waived all objections to having the motion for a new trial heard and determined before the Judge in vacation. The motion was not heard in vacation, but came up for hearing at the April Term, and plaintiff moved for leave to amend the statement, and upon filing motion and affidavits in support thereof, an order was made continuing the cause. The Court adjourned the next day. On the 27th May, 1857, plaintiff's motion for leave to amend came up for hearing before the Judge at chambers, and the motion was sustained and the amendment allowed. The Judge then overruled the plaintiff's motion for a new trial, and ordered judgment to be entered upon the verdict. This was done accordingly by the Clerk.

1. Before proceeding to consider the point made, we think it well, in order to secure uniformity of practice, to suggest that we consider it better, in all cases where there is no question as to the proper judgment to be entered on a verdict, for the Court to direct judgment to be entered at once, without waiting for a motion for a new trial or any proceedings to set aside the verdict. The judgment can as well set aside as the verdict, while there may be some embarrassments, as in this case, attending the postponement of the entry, and the plaintiff ought to have the benefit of the security, which is sometimes very important, afforded by the lien of the judgment. A suspension of all proceedings under the judgment fully protects the losing party from all loss or injury if, from any cause, the verdict be set aside or the judgment vacated.

Hutchinson v. Bours.

2. The verdict having been rendered and appearing of record, the Court could, in term time or vacation, order the proper judgment when the motion was taken under advisement by it. The continuance of the case at the April Term was only a continuance of the motion, for there was no cause pending for trial in Court; but this order did not change the condition of things before existing, nor affect the power of the Court to act on the motion at its convenience. The judgment, in pursuance of the verdict, is the act of the law upon record facts, and follows as a matter of course, unless the Court intervene to prevent it. It is not necessary to pursue this matter, for we have, in effect, decided the point in the recent case of McMillan and Richards, at this term. The authorities cited by the Appellant apply to an entirely different state of facts from those in this record.

3. The statement having been agreed upon by the parties, probably the Court below should not, unless under a very clear showing of mistake or fraud, have permitted an amendment; but we cannot very well see how the plaintiff can complain that his amendment was allowed, whether with or without notice, when the Court, without his amendment, would have been justified in acting upon the motion.

4. The agreed statement is not in the record. We see no error in the matter presented by the amended statement, but we could not consider it if we saw apparent error, for we cannot act upon a piece of a statement. It is necessary for us to see the entire statement as settled before we can pronounce that there is error in any part, unless, indeed, the part is complete in itself, in its relation to a given exception.

The delays and confusion which have come to our knowledge, in this and other cases, suggests the propriety of a speedy settlement of statements and exceptions. They can be better settled soon after the trial than any other time, and there is seldom any necessity for a delay of more than a few days to make an accurate and entire record of the proceedings had at the trial. If the District Judges acted upon this suggestion, and compelled Attorneys to settle the bills of exceptions or statement immediately after the trial, it would save a good deal of delay, contention, and dispute, and insure a more faithful history of the facts, and a more accurate statement of legal propositions. Of course these remarks are not intended to reflect upon the parties here or their Attorneys, much less the Judge below, but are made in consequence of many evils illustrated by a contrary practice to that suggested.

The judgment is affirmed.

RICE v. GASHIRIE.

THE terms of new trial are peculiarly within the discretion of the Court, with the exercise of which, the Appellate Court will not interfere, except upon a clear showing of abuse, or grossly unreasonable terms.
For error of law, excepted to, an appeal lies, without motion for new trial.

APPEAL from the Tenth District.

Ejectment. The only fact upon which the decision turns appears in the opinion of the Court.

Reardon & Dunn, for Appellant, argued that the facts of the case show it was inequitable and unjust to impose costs as a condition of new trial. They are only imposed where a new trial is awarded for reason of some remote or indirect laches of the party applying, and not in any degree contributed to by the opposing party. But where the Court below erred in its rulings, or where the verdict is against evidence, costs are never imposed. In this case, the one or the other was conceded by the Court in awarding the new trial. (Amsby v. Dickhouse, 4 Cal. 102.)

Bryan & Filkins, for Respondent, cited Battelle v. Conner, (6 Cal. 140.)

BALDWIN, J. delivered the opinion of the Court — TERRY, C. J. concurring.

---

The defendant in this case moved the Court for a new trial. This motion was granted, on the payment of costs — such payment having been made by the order a condition precedent. The defendant did not, at the time, except to these terms; the plaintiff excepted. The defendant, some two or three months afterwards, gave notice of appeal.

The only thing from which the defendant could appeal, under these circumstances, is the annexing of this condition to the granting of his motion. The terms upon which a Court will grant a new trial are peculiarly a matter within its discretion. This must necessarily be so; for so many reasons relating to the conduct, management, and peculiar circumstances of the trial, may exist, that it would be impossible to prescribe any general rules on the subject. If error at law intervenes, a party may take his exceptions, and prosecute his appeal without motion for a new trial; but if he makes his motion, and relies upon that for redress against an improper verdict, he must subject himself to the equitable power of the Court. The verdict may have gone against him, in some degree, or wholly, by his own neglect or default, or even the rulings of law be chargeable to his own laches or want of diligence. In such cases it may be proper to grant him a new trial — yet, only upon equitable terms. We cannot interfere with this exercise of discretion unless upon a clear showing that it has been abused, or that the terms were grossly unreasonable. This record shows no such case.

Judgment affirmed.

CROWELL et al. v. GILMORE et al.

THIS lien of mechanics for labor performed and materials furnished towards the erection or repair of a building attaches, even though the employer has but an equitable interest in the land and building.

The lien may be recorded within sixty days after the completion of the building, and, by relation, will attach from the date of the commencement of the work.

Persons dealing with the property during the progress of the work, are charged with notice of the claims of the mechanic.

APPEAL from the Ninth District.

In 1853, J. C. Spencer became, and has since been, the owner of a lot in Shasta, upon which the building referred to in this case was erected, excepting, however, a small fraction not material to be noticed. In 1854, John Ball leased the lot of Spencer, and, in 1855, erected a building thereon, Spencer agreeing to sell Ball one-half of the lot at a price agreed on, and to pay one-half the cost of the building. Ball completed the building without assistance from Spencer. In the fall of 1856, Ball, with the knowledge and consent of Spencer, began to enlarge this building by adding two stories and running it back thirty-five feet, at a cost of thirty thousand dollars, Spencer signing mortgages on the property, with Ball, to raise money. This enlargement began in November, 1856, and ended on or about April 1st, 1856. The plaintiffs were the carpenters and laborers employed by Ball at day's work during this time to enlarge the building. Ball was in possession ever since his lease in 1854. Defendants, with the exception of Gilmore, held mortgages on the property executed by Ball and Spencer jointly in November and December, 1856, but subsequent to the time when the enlargement of the building commenced. The liens claimed were all recorded according to law. Plaintiff Crowell brought suit against Gilmore, the assignee in insolvency of Ball, to enforce his lien. The other plaintiffs appeared, and proved their liens under the statute, and the mortgagees asked permission to intervene and defend. The Court below decreed that the intervenors be paid first, as the legal title to the land mortgaged was in Spencer. Spencer was not a party to the suit.

Crowell et al. v. Gilmore et al.

Crocker & McKune, for Appellant, argued, that Ball had an equitable interest in the land, sufficient to support the lien of the mechanics, which has priority over the mortgagees. (Wood's Digest, 538, Sec. 4; Gaskill v. Trainor, 3 Cal. 334; Gaskill v. Moore, 4 Cal. 233.)

That the mortgagees were estopped from denying the title of Ball, he being one of the mortgagors. (12 Wend. 65; 17 Id. 164; Doe v. Clifton, 4 Adolphus & Ellis, 809; Doe v. Vickers, Id. 782; 2 Cal. 263; 4 Id. 247.)

The acts of Spencer are sufficient to bind his interest in the land. (2 Cal. 489; 3 Id. 302; 4 Id. 97; 4 Barr, 194; 1 Bay. 239; 1 Johns. Ch. R. 354; 2 Johns. 589; 1 Story's Eq. Sec. 385; 2 Smith's Leading Cases, 537, 561, and Cases cited.) Spencer, however, does not controvert the rights of plaintiffs.

Defendants had notice of Ball's equitable title, through his possession. (Bird v. Dennison, 7 Cal. 297; Stafford v. Lick, Id. 479; Ellis v. Jeans, 7 Cal. 409; Bryan v. Ramirez, 8 Cal. 461.)

Sprague & McMurtry, for Respondent, argued, that Ball was a mere tenant of Spencer, without title, legal or equitable.

TERRY, C. J. delivered the opinion of the Court — BALDWIN, J. concurring.

The record in this case shows that defendant, Ball, had an equitable interest in the premises which was subject to the liens of plaintiffs, and the contracts between Ball and plaintiffs having been made, and the work under such contracts being actually progressing at the time of the execution of Respondent's mortgages, the liens of the mechanics for labor performed and material furnished pursuant to such contracts, must, as to Ball's interest, be preferred to the mortgages, under the authority of Soule v. Dawes, (7 Cal. 576,) where it is held that: "By our statute, the lien of mechanics may be recorded within sixty days after the completion of the building, and by relation, the lien attaches from the date of the commencement of the work. All persons who deal with the property during the progress of the work, are charged with notice of the claim of the Contractor."

Judgment reversed and cause remanded.

THE authority of the Board of Commissioners, under the Act of May 1st, 1855, relative to a sale of the State's interest in the water line front of the city of San Francisco, as defined by the Act of March 26th, 1851, is limited to the property within the boundaries defined by the Act; and a sale by them of lots not within those boundaries is a nullity, and cannot constitute cloud of title. Hence an injunction against such sale will not lie.

the owner and in possession; that the defendants, as a Board of Commissioners in behalf of the State, had advertised, and were about to sell, said lot; that such sale would involve plaintiff in numerous lawsuits with his tenants, and with the purchasers, who might be many, by a subdivision of the lot; that the sale by defendants would be unlawful, would greatly damage and irreparably injure plaintiff, and cast a cloud on his title.

Court below granted the injunction, and defendants appeal.

Thos. H. Williams, Attorney-General, for Appellant, cited: (4 Cal. 247; 8 Cal. 461, and cases cited; 9 Cal. 204; 14 Johns. 57; 12 Wend. 224; Wood's Dig. 519 to 525 inclusive; 4 Cal. 397.)

Wm. J. Shaw, for Respondent.

The locus in quo is not within the boundaries of the Act of March 26th, 1851, defining the water line front of the city of San Francisco, and the defendants had no power to sell under the Act of May 1st, 1855.

Such sale being unlawful may be restrained. (Story's Agency, Secs. 320, 321, Notes, 307, 307a; 1 Wilson's Rep. 328; 1 Bosanquet & Puller, 410; Story's Eq. Jurisp. Sec. 955a.)

TERRY, C. J. delivered the opinion of the Court — BALDWIN, J. concurring.

Defendants were by the Act of May 1st, 1855, authorized to dispose of the interest of the State in the property within the water line front of the city of San Francisco, as defined by the "Act to provide for the disposition of certain property of the State of California," passed March 26, 1851. Their authority was limited to the property within the boundaries defined by the Act, and it is clearly shown that the lots in question are not included within those boundaries. Any disposition of them by the defendants would be a mere nullity, and could vest no right in a purchaser, which would constitute a cloud upon plaintiff's title.

Plaintiff could receive no injury from such sale, and was not entitled to an injunction.

APPEAL from the Fifth District.

To the facts in the opinion add, that, by contract under seal, dated September, 1854, Dennis leased to plaintiff a tract of land for one year, under the stipulation in the lease, that plaintiff was to put in the crop of grain, and, after the expenses of sowing, harvesting and threshing were paid, to give Dennis one-half, as rent. Plaintiff took possession, hired men, furnished provisions, and put in the crop of wheat, barley, and oats. Personally, however, he lived some eighteen miles from the land, and was there only once or twice a week. Dennis worked and slept on the ranch most of the time, plaintiff paying him the usual wages of fifty dollars per month. He slept under a tree, not in the house. When harvesting began, about June 1st, 1855, plaintiff came and lived on the ranch, going home each Saturday night. On the 31st day of May, 1855, Dennis, by a contract under seal, sold to plaintiff all his interest in the crop then growing. Thirteen hundred and sixty bushels of grain were harvested by plaintiff and put in the adobe house on the ranch. On the 6th day of October, 1855, the defendant, as Sheriff, levied on this grain in the adobe, under a writ of attachment against the property of Dennis. On the trial defendant offered to prove declarations made by Dennis as to the sale by him to plaintiff of his half interest in the crop. The declarations offered, were made five months after the sale, to the Sheriff's Keeper at the time of hauling the grain away, and were to the effect that he, Dennis, owned half the grain; that the Sheriff should not take it away without weighing it, so that he, Dennis, could know how much was his, and that, accordingly, the Sheriff divided the grain by taking a sack and leaving a sack. Defendant also offered these declarations to rebut the testimony of plaintiff's witnesses as to putting in the crop, and possession by plaintiff. The precise question put by defendant to witness was, "Why did he forbid you from taking it away? what reason did he give for his conduct?" The question was objected to; the Court sustained the objection, defendant excepting. Plaintiff had judgment and defendant appeals.

Visher v. Webster.

Baine & Bouldin, for Appellant, to the point, that the Court erred in refusing the instruction asked by defendant, that after a sale of personal property, the possession of the vendee must be exclusive and continued, cited: (2 Kent's Com. 517; 1 John. Ch. R. 483; 7 Paige R. 165; 2 John. Ch. R. 46; 4 Cal. R. 289.)

The Court erred in excluding Wheeler's evidence, at the point of our exception in relation to it, concerning the claim of Dennis to this grain, when the same was being removed under the authority of the Sheriff. This was an act of dominion on the part of Dennis which was a part of the res gesta. The grain was in sacks, on the ranch, undivided, and Dennis' assertion of ownership is an act of dominion, and not declarations made after a sale.

But this evidence was proper in another point of view. "Evidence may be admissible in one point of view and not in another." (1 Phillips' Ev. 199, 171, 200.) And this was competent to rebut the evidence tending to prove the plaintiff's exclusive possession.

D. W. Perley, for Respondent.

The declarations of a vendor made after the sale, cannot be given in evidence to defeat the title derived from him in a suit to which he is a stranger. (Martin v. Kelly, 1 Stewart, 198; Landecker v. Houghtaling, 7 Cal. 391; Visher v. Webster, Id.)

L. Sanders, Jr. also for Respondent.

BALDWIN, J. delivered the opinion of the Court — FIELD, J. concurring.

Trespass against the Sheriff for seizing plaintiff's grain.

Defendant justified by process against one Dennis, and a claim that this was his property, or subject as his to the writ. The question was, whether there was fraud in a sale of this grain by Dennis to the plaintiff, and this question depended upon conflicting proofs.

1. The assignment of error which assails the refusal of the Court to grant a new trial, therefore, is not sustained.

2. There was a previous trial. Verdict and judgment for the plaintiff were had, which judgment was reversed in this Court. The Court below refused the motion of defendant to exclude the costs of this first trial from the bill of costs. We see no error in this refusal. No authority has been cited to show that it was the duty of the Court to allow the motion; and we think the law and the practice are the other way.

3. Some instructions given by the Court on the trial were lost or mislaid before the motion for a new trial was heard; and upon this ground the defendant moved to suspend the hearing of the motion until they should be found, and also to grant a new trial on account of the loss. The Court refused the motion.

The Judge must settle the statement. He is presumed to know what instructions he gave the jury. The best evidence is, undoubtedly, the written charge; but, if that is out of the way, other evidence, or his own memory, may be resorted to to enable him to make known the instruction. But we cannot receive evidence otherwise than through his statement or the record; and, if we could, the Appellant has not furnished it.

4. It is assigned as error that the Court refused to charge the jury that, after a sale of personal property by a vendor, the possession of the vendee must be exclusive and continued as against the vendor: and if the vendor remained in possession, in conjunction and in common with the vendee, then the sale is absolutely void. We do not so understand the law. The sale is good as between the parties, whether possession be delivered or not; and only void as to creditors and subsequent purchasers. A Court is not bound to give an instruction upon its face erroneous, though the error might not be sufficient to reverse the judgment if the charge were given. The error may be excused in some cases, on the ground that no injury was done; but the Court is never bound to charge bad law. Nor can we say that so broad a proposition had not a tendency to mislead the jury. Moreover, it is not at all certain that the rule invoked applies to a case like this. Here, by the terms of the contract of 1854, Visher was to have possession of the crop, reimburse himself for expenses, etc. the remainder to be divided. By the last contract, of 31st May, 1855, Dennis sold all his right, title, and interest, by deed, in the crop then growing, to plaintiff; and it seems Visher, if he did not have it before, took all the possession of the crop, of which it was susceptible, even supposing that this grain, then growing, was a mere chattel. Unless some fraud appeared in this first contract, we do not well see how or when Dennis ever had any possession of this grain. Nor do we see that any proof of possession of the grain itself, by Dennis, was made. The mere fact that he was on the premises, or in the occupancy of the house, shows no such possession in the face of a clear showing, by the deeds, that he had no right as against Visher.

Visher v. Webster.

5. The next error assigned is in excluding proof of Dennis' declaration in respect to the title of the grain, or his half interest in it. These declarations were made after his sale. They could not, therefore, affect the title he had parted with. Nor were they a part of the res gesta, for no such clear and unequivocal possession was shown as to admit them on this ground. Nor was it proper to rebut the testimony of Lombard and Putnam Visher, for this testimony could only rebut their statements by showing some interest or course of dealing with the property. This could be proved by his acts — and was — it could not by his mere admissions.

HORN v. THE VOLCANO WATER COMPANY et al. DEFENDANTS, AND RAWLE, SHAFFER et al. INTERVENORS.

- A COPY of the note sued on being attached to, and made part of, the complaint, the answer, not verified, admits the genuineness and due execution of the note, and entitles the plaintiff to judgment.
- In suit on a note and mortgage, where creditors of the defendant intervened, alleging the note and mortgage to be fraudulent as against them, the intervenors cannot prevent a judgment for plaintiff against defendant. The most they can claim, is protection against the enforcement of the judgment to their prejudice.
- The interest which entitles a person to intervene in a suit between other parties, must be in the matter in litigation, and of such a direct and immediate character that the intervenor will either gain or lose by the direct legal operation and effect of the judgment.
- It must be that created by a claim to the demand, or some part thereof, in suit, or a claim to, or lien upon, the property, or some part thereof, which is the subject of litigation.
- A simple contract creditor of a common debtor cannot intervene in a foreclosure suit.
- But judgment creditors, being, as such, subsequent incumbrancers, may intervene. And a Court may order them to be made parties, probably by an amendment of the complaint as the better course, or on petition of intervention.
- Subsequent creditors cannot complain, that the note and mortgage of a common debtor were executed without consideration.
- As against subsequent creditors a conveyance, even if voluntary, is not void, unless fraudulent in fact—that is, made with a view to future debts; though the evidence of an intent to defraud existing creditors is deemed sufficient prima facie evidence of fraud against subsequent creditors.

APPEAL from the Fifth District.

Plaintiff brought suit against the Volcano Water Company on a note and mortgage executed by the Trustees of the company. The other defendants were the holders of a note and mortgage executed by said company, of even date with the plaintiffs, and with the agreement that the two mortgages should be paid pro rata.

The company filed a general denial in answer. Some of the other defendants answered, but it is not material to notice the answers. Certain creditors of the company intervened, alleging fraud in the execution of the note and mortgage to plaintiff, and that they were void as against the company and its creditors. Plaintiff gave in evidence his note and mortgage, and, with the admission that the same were properly executed and recorded, and the premises correctly described in the complaint, rested. The only further facts necessary are contained in the opinion of the Court. The Court below gave judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals.

W. W. Cope, for Appellant, argued: 1. That the decision of the Court below was not in writing, and that the case of Walker v. Sedgwick, (5 Cal. 192,) holding the statute to be inapplicable to chancery cases, is not law. (Sands v. Church, 2 Selden, 356; Davis v. Mayor of New York, cited in Voorhies' Code, 378.)

---

2. Plaintiff was entitled to judgment against the company on the pleadings. A copy of the note was a part of the complaint, and the answer was not verified.

The position of the other defendants was not antagonistic to the plaintiff, and presented no obstacle to his recovery. They could not avail themselves of the defense interposed by the intervenors. Even if their allegation as to the fraud in the note and mortgage were true, it could not affect the case as between the plaintiff and defendants. The instruments were not absolutely void, but only so as against creditors and purchasers impeaching them. (Henriques v. Howe, 2 Edw. Ch. R. 120; 18 Johns. 515; 5 Cow. 547.)

3. The petitions of intervention do not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, or entitle intervenors to any relief as against the note and mortgage of plaintiff; because:

1st. The petition of Rawle shows that he is only a simple contract creditor of the Water Company, and it does not appear that payment of any portion of his demands is secured either by a lien or mortgage. (Stow et al. v. Manning, 2 Scam. 530; Manchester et al. v. McKee, 4 Gil. 511; Crippen v. Hudson, 3 Ker. 161.)

2d. The petition of Shaffer and others, shows that they are judgment creditors of the company, and that their judgments are liens upon the property mortgaged to the plaintiff; but it does not appear that an execution was ever issued on either of such judgments; or that the property is sufficient to satisfy the claims of all parties; or that there is not other property from which the intervenors could obtain satisfaction of their judgments; or that the plaintiffs' mortgage interferes in any manner with the enforcement of such judgments; or that an effort to enforce the same has been, or is now being, made.

The statute provides that, "any person shall be entitled to intervene in an action who has an interest in the matter in litigation, in the success of either of the parties to the action, or an interest against both." (Wood's Digest, 176.) What is an "interest," within the meaning of this statute, is not quite clear. In legal parlance this word is always used to denote property in lands or chattels. (2 Burr. Law Dic. 628.) In this sense it certainly does not include a lien. "A lien is not in strictness either a jus in re or a jus ad rem; that is, it is not a property in the thing, nor does it constitute a right of action for the thing." (2 Burr. Law Dic. 684; 1 Story's Eq. Sec. 506; 2 Story's R. 144, 145.) In construing the statute this word should be deemed to have been used in its strict legal sense. (Sedg. Con. and Stat. Law, 261, 262). The remedy by intervention is unknown to the common law, and should not be extended to cases which are not clearly within the spirit and meaning of the statutes. (Sedg. Con. and Stat. Law, 313, 314.)

Horn v. The Volcano Water Company et al.

The provisions of the Civil Code of Louisiana, in reference to interventions, are very similar to our statute. (Greiner's Prac. 147, 148.) It has been decided in that State, that a stranger to the suit cannot intervene for the purpose of aiding the defendants. (Norris' Heirs v. Ogden, 11 Mar. R. 445.)

In the case of Gasquet et al. v. Johnson et al. (1 La. R. 425,) where several persons had attached the same property, the Court held that a subsequent attaching creditor could not intervene for the purpose of defeating the action of a person having a prior attachment. In regard to the interest entitling a person to intervene in an action, the Court said: "This we suppose must be a direct interest by which the intervening party is to obtain immediate gain, or suffer loss by the judgment which may be rendered between the original parties."

But admitting that the intervenors had an interest, within the meaning of the statute, sufficient to entitle them to intervene, still their petition does not state facts enough to constitute any ground for relief. The rule is firmly established in English and American jurisprudence that the right of a creditor to appeal to a Court of Equity for relief against the fraudulent acts and transfers of his debtor depends upon the fact of his having exhausted his legal remedies without being able to obtain satisfaction of his judgment. (Manchester et al. v. McKee, before cited; Beck v. Burdett, 1 Paige Ch. Rep. 308; Wiggins v. Armstrong, 2 John. Ch. Rep. 144; Brown et al. v. McDonald, 1 Hill's Ch. Rep. 297; McKinley v. Coombs, 1 Mon. Rep. 106; Allen v. Camp, Id. 331; Halberts v. Grant, 4 Id. 580.)

But even if it were not requisite that the intervenors should have pursued their legal remedies to the extent indicated in these cases, they should clearly and conclusively have shown in their petition that they could not obtain satisfaction of their judgments without the assistance of a Court of Equity. This they have utterly failed to do. They say that they are judgment creditors, having liens upon the property mortgaged to the plaintiff, and that the plaintiff's mortgage is a fraud upon their rights. This is their entire case. The extent or value of the mortgaged property is not shown, nor is it shown that there is not other property from which they could obtain satisfaction of their judgments. The allegation of the insolvency of the company is not an allegation that the company has no property, but that it has not sufficient property to pay all its debts. (2 Burr. Law Dic. 623.) The authorities upon these points are clear and conclusive. (Coop. Eq. Pl. 149; Screven v. Bostick, 2 McCord's Ch. R. 410; Harrison v. Battle, Dev. Eq. 537; Semple v. Fletcher, 3 Mar. Rep. N. S. 382; Wiggins v. Armstrong, and several other cases before referred to.)

I have already shown that the fact of a conveyance being fraudulent as to creditors does not render it absolutely void. Our statute provides that such a conveyance shall be void as against the persons hindered, delayed or defrauded, by it. (Wood's Digest, 107.) As to every other person it is valid. When, therefore, any creditor, or other person, shall resort to a Court of Equity for relief against such a conveyance, he must show that he is within the protection of the statute. Have the intervenors done that in this case? Have they stated a single fact tending to show that the plaintiff's mortgage stands in the way of the enforcement of their judgments? In the case of Dewey v. Latson, (6 Cal. Rep. 609,) the point was explicitly decided that a creditor cannot question the fraudulent acts of his debtor unless such acts are prejudicial to his interests.

It is not shown in the petition of Shaffer and others that the petitioners were creditors of the company at the time of the execution of the note and mortgage to the plaintiff, or that the company was then indebted to any other person, or had not sufficient property to pay all its debts, or that such note and mortgage were given with intent to defraud subsequent creditors.

(Hovenden on Frauds, 2 vol. 74, 75, quoting Stat. 13th Eliz. Ch. 5; 1 Story's Eq. Section 356, Chancellor Kent; Reade v. Livingston, 3 Johns. Ch. Rep. 481; Sexton v. Wheaton, 8 Wheat. U. S. Rep. 229.)

It has been decided in England that a creditor who seeks to avoid a voluntary conveyance made by his debtor must allege in his bill that he was a creditor at the time of the execution of such conveyance. (Ede v. Knowles, 2 Younge & Coll. N. R. 172, 178.)

In the case at bar the intervenors allege in their petition "that at the time of the giving of said note and mortgage the company had before the execution of the same already become indebted to a much greater amount than the amount of the capital stock paid in." This is the only statement in the petition having any reference to the pecuniary condition of the company at the time of the execution of the note and mortgage to the plaintiff. This statement certainly does not amount to an allegation that the company was then indebted in any amount whatever, but is strictly compatible with an entire freedom from indebtedness on the part of the company. It is possible that the company had contracted debts to a large amount, and it is equally possible that these debts had been paid off. It is also possible that the company was largely indebted, but was at the same time in the possession and ownership of property sufficient to pay ten or twenty times the amount. The insufficiency of this allegation is too obvious to require further comment.

The last objection to the validity of this note and mortgage to which allusion is at all necessary is, that at the time they were given, the indebtedness of the company exceeded the amount of its capital stock actually paid in. The allegations of the petitions of intervention are not sufficiently specific to support this objection; but if they were, the conclusion arrived at does not follow. The statute was intended to operate only as between the corporation and its Trustees, as a check upon the latter and a security to the former against their reckless and improvident action. (Wood's Digest, 121, Section 14.) This is the only reasonable construction of which the statute is susceptible. If the debts of a corporation, contracted when its indebtedness already exceeds the amount of its capital stock paid in, are void and cannot be enforced, the provision in reference to the personal responsibility of the Trustees is idle and useless. The case of Foster et al. v. The Oxford, Worcester, and Northampton Railway Company (14 Eng. Law and Eq. Rep. 306) is in point.

But there is another view of the case, which is equally fatal to this objection. Sedgwick in his work on Statutory and Constitutional Law, (on p. 90,) says: "It must be borne in mind, that the invalidity of contracts made in violation of statutes, is subject to the equitable exception, that although a corporation in making a contract acts in disagreement with its charter, when it is a simple question of capacity or authority to contract, arising either on a question of regularity of organization or of power conferred by the charter, a party who has had the benefit of the agreement cannot be permitted, in an action founded on it, to question its validity." In this case, the company, having received the benefit of its contract with the plaintiff, cannot question the validity of such contract, and the intervenors are in this respect in no better condition than the company, unless they can assail the contract on the ground of fraud.

1. The Court below did not err in withholding a written finding of the facts. (Walker v. Sedgwick, 5 Cal. R. 192.) Even where the Court has submitted issues of fact to a jury, it is not bound by this finding. It is, at most, advisory. (Gray v. Eaton, 5 Cal. R. 448; Dominguez v. Dominguez, 7 Id. 424; Still v. Saunders, 8 Id. 281.) A suit to foreclose a mortgage is peculiarly an equity proceeding. (Ballow v. Rogers, Admr. 9 Cal. 125.)

2. It is a sufficient answer to the second point submitted by the counsel, that the whole actual controversy was and is between the Appellant and the intervenors.

3. The intervenors do state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action; but if not, the objection now comes too late. It should, in some form, have been raised in the Court below, and ought not to be raised for the first time in this Court. The proposition for the Appellant is, in substance, that the intervenor, Rawle, is but a simple contract creditor of the corporation, and that while the other intervenors show themselves to be judgment creditors having a lien, they fail to show that they have exhausted their legal remedy, or that they do not show that they might obtain satisfaction without the aid of equity.

---

But the authorities cited are in our favor, so far as analogous, and the others do not aid Appellant. (Wiggins & Boreum v. Armstrong & Marshall, 2 John. Ch. R. 144; Brown et als. v. McDonald, 1 Hill's Ch. R. 297; Story's Eq. Jur. Sec. 506; Gasquet et al. v. Johnson et al. 1 La. 432.)

The present, however, is not a case of the character presented in most of the cases cited by the counsel.

Here is an action already in Chancery, which, if successful, must wholly defeat the claim of the intervenors; for the corporation is insolvent.

The note and mortgage in suit are alleged to be fraudulent, and the plaintiffs and defendants are averred to be in collusion to defraud the intervenors.

But whether we are right or wrong in all this, our statute gives the remedy which we have sought, and that whether we are judgment creditors having a lien, or simple contract creditors. (Prac. Act, Sec. 659.)

This provision should be liberally construed, for it is not within the reason of the rules cited. It is purely remedial, and as such to be construed beneficially, so as to suppress the mischief and advance the remedy. (Sedgwick on Stat. Constr. 359.)

The Statute of 13 Eliz. has nothing to do with this case. It has been often held that the statute only declared and definitely ascertained the common law, and that the latter was always competent for every purpose within the purview of the former. This is a question of actual fraud, and whether present or prospective, is wholly unimportant. (4 Bac. Abr. 401; 2 Kent's Com. 440.)

This Court has already directly recognized this right of intervention. (Brooks v. Hager, 5 Cal. R. 281; County of Yuba v. Adams & Co. 7 Id. 35; Dixey v. Pollack, 8 Id. 570.)

FIELD, J., delivered the opinion of the Court — BALDWIN, J. and TERRY, C. J. concurring.

It was error to render judgment for the defendants. A copy of the note in suit is attached to the complaint, and the answer of the company is simply a general denial, without verification; and thus, by force of the statute, the genuineness and due execution of the note by the company, are to be regarded as admitted. The claims asserted by the other defendants are not inconsistent with a recovery by the plaintiff. In the judgment their rights could have been fully protected. Upon the pleadings, therefore, as between the original parties to the action, the plaintiff was entitled to judgment. Admitting that the matter set up by the intervenors constituted a fraud, and was fully established, we do not perceive how it could affect the right of the plaintiff to a judgment as against the company. The most that the intervenors could claim, was protection against the enforcement of the judgment to the prejudice of their rights; and this could have been effected by its postponement to their claims in the disposition of the proceeds arising from the sale of the mortgaged premises. As between the parties, the note and mortgage were valid; they were void, if at all, only as against creditors and subsequent purchasers. (Henriquez v. Hone, 2 Edw. Ch. Rep. 120; Ander-son v. Roberts, 18 John. 514.)

Horn v. The Volcano Water Company et al.

But, without resting the case upon this, we pass to a consideration of the merits of the intervention: The petition of the creditor, Rawle, does not disclose any right on his part to intervene; it shows that he was a simple contract creditor, holding obligations against the company—but it does not show that any portion of them were secured by any lien upon the mortgaged premises. His intervention is only an attempt of one creditor to prevent another creditor obtaining judgment against the common debtor—a proceeding which can find no support, either in principle or authority. The interest mentioned in the statute, which entitles a person to intervene in a suit between other parties, must be in the matter in litigation, and of such a direct and immediate character that the intervenor will either gain or lose by the direct legal operation and effect of the judgment. The provisions of our statute are taken substantially from the code of procedure of Louisiana, which declares, that, “in order to be entitled to intervene, it is enough to have an interest in the success of either of the parties to the suit;” and the Supreme Court of that State, in passing upon the term interest, thus used, held this language: “This, we suppose, must be a direct interest, by which the intervening party is to obtain immediate gain, or suffer loss, by the judgment which may be rendered between the original parties; otherwise, the strange anomaly would be introduced into our jurisprudence of suffering an accumulation of suits in all instances where doubts might be entertained, or enter into the imagination of subsequent plaintiffs, that a defendant against whom a previous action was under prosecution might not have property sufficient to discharge all his debts. For, as the first judgment obtained might give a preference to the person who should obtain it, all subsequent suitors, down to the last, would have an indirect interest in defeating the action of the first." (Gasquet et al. v. Johnson et al. 1 Louis. Rep. 431.) To authorize an intervention, therefore, the interest must be that created by a claim to the demand, or some part thereof, in suit, or a claim to, or lien upon, the property, or some part thereof, which is the subject of litigation. No such claim or lien is asserted in the petition of Rawle, and his right to intervene must, in consequence, fail. (Brown & Sons v. Saul et al. 4 Martin, N. S. 434.)

Horn v. The Volcano Water Company et al.

The petition of Shaffer and others, stands upon a different footing. It shows that they were judgment creditors, having liens, by their several judgments, upon the mortgaged premises at the time of the institution of the present suit. As such, they were subsequent incumbrancers and necessary parties to a complete adjustment of all interests in the mortgaged premises, though not indispensable parties to a decree determining the rights of the other parties as between themselves. For such adjustment, the Court would have been justified in ordering them to be brought in, either upon their own petition, as in the present case, or by an amendment to the complaint. (Sargent v. Wilson, 5 Cal. 504; Moss v. Warner, 10 Cal. 296; Montgomery v. Tutt, 11 Cal. 307.)

It would probably be the better course for the Court to direct, in a case like the present, an amendment to the complaint. No question, however, as to the form in which these parties assert their right is made, and we could not regard the point, if it were made, as essential to the determination of the priorities of the several liens. Looking, then, to the petition of these judgment creditors, and treating it as an answer to the complaint, and the parties as asserting a priority in the liens of their several judgments over the lien of the mortgage, we find its allegations insufficient, if established, to justify a decree postponing the mortgage to the judgments. These judgments were all rendered long after the execution of the note and mortgage;— with one exception, more than a year afterwards. It is not averred that these intervenors were creditors of the company when the note and mortgage were executed, or that the company was then indebted to any other person, or that the note and mortgage were given with intent to defraud subsequent creditors. It only avers that they were not executed by the Trustees by any authority from the company, or to pay or secure any of its debts, or for any consideration received by it; but were given to pay, or to secure the payment of, a debt of certain stockholders of the company, contracted to meet the assessments levied upon their shares. If these averments were true, the subsequent creditors are not in a position to complain. It rests only with the company to question the authority of the Trustees, or the validity of the note and mortgage for want of sufficient consideration. Subsequent creditors have nothing to do with them. The Statute of 13th of Eliz. (Ch. 5,) is the foundation of the acts on the subject of conveyances to hinder, delay, or defraud, creditors in the several states, and has been substantially incorporated into our law. (Act concerning Fraudulent Conveyances and Contracts, Sec. 20.) "This statute," says Hovenden, "declares all gifts, conveyances, and alienations, of real or personal estate, whereby creditors may be delayed or defrauded, void as against such creditors; but judicial interpretation has determined that creditors at the time of the transaction are, alone, intended by the statute. Thus, a settlement made after marriage, and therefore considered voluntary, will be maintained against subsequent creditors, provided the settler was not indebted at the time he made it. This general rule must, however, be qualified, so as to exclude cases of positive fraud. It is not necessary that a man should be actually indebted, at the time he enters into a voluntary settlement, to make it fraudulent; if he do so with a view to his being indebted at a future time, it is equally a fraud, and ought to be set aside." (2 Vol. 74.)

Horn v. The Volcano Water Company et al.

---

As against subsequent creditors, then, a conveyance, even if

Horn v. The Volcano Water Company et al.

voluntary, is not void, unless fraudulent in fact; that is, unless made with the view to future debts, though evidence of an intent to defraud existing creditors is deemed sufficient prima facie evidence of fraud against subsequent creditors. (Sexton v. Wheaton, 8 Wheat. 229; Bennet v. Bedford Bank, 11 Mass. 421; Benton v. Jones, 8 Conn. 186; Carlisle v. Rich, 8 N. Hamp. 44; Miller v. Thompson, 3 Porter, 196; Bogard v. Gardley, 4 Smedes & M. 302; Wadsworth v. Havens, 3 Wend. 411; Elliott v. Horn, 10 Ala. 348; Edwards v. Coleman, 2 Bibb, 204; Smith v. Lowell, 6 N. H. 67; Parkman v. Welch, 19 Pick. 231.)

The only statement in the petition of the creditors in reference to any indebtedness of the company is that before the execution of the note and mortgage the company had become indebted to a much greater amount than the amount of the capital stock paid in. This statement may be strictly true, and yet the fact exist that the company was not at the time indebted in any amount whatever. The indebtedness may have been contracted, and have been entirely canceled, or the company may have been in possession of property greatly exceeding its existing obligations, and with which such obligations were afterwards entirely satisfied.

The views which we have expressed dispose of the case upon the pleadings and petitions of intervention, and render it unnecessary to pass in review the questions raised upon the testimony. The judgment must be reversed, and the Court below directed to enter a judgment against the company for the amount due on the note described in the complaint, and to decree a sale of the mortgaged premises, and the application of the proceeds of the sale: first, to the payment of such judgment and the amount due the other defendants, such payment to be made to the parties pro rata; and, second, to the payment of the several judgments of the intervenors, Shaffer and others, in the order in which they became liens upon the mortgaged premises; and to dismiss the petition of the intervenor, Rawla.

Ordered accordingly.

Sanderson & Newell, for Respondent.

The finding is sufficient and conclusive. (7 Cal. 38; McEwen v. Johnson, Id. 258.) But where plaintiff obtains judgment, no finding is necessary; otherwise, when judgment is for defendant.

TERRY, C. J. delivered the opinion of the Court — BALDWIN, J. concurring.

No motion for a new trial having been made in this case, the finding of facts by the Court below is conclusive, and as this finding fully sustains the judgment, it is affirmed.

NELSON & DOBLE v. HIGHLAND.

It is no ground of demurrer to a complaint, that the christian name of one of the plaintiffs does not appear.

APPEAL from the First District.

Complaint avers that "Thomas Nelson and — Doble, whose christian name is unknown, partners doing business under the firm name, and style, of Nelson & Doble," etc.

Demurrer, on the ground that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, and that there is a defect of parties plaintiff in this — that the christian name of plaintiff, Doble, is not given.

Demurrer sustained; plaintiffs refuse to amend; judgment final, dismissing the complaint; plaintiffs appeal.

George Cadwalader, for Appellant.

The demurrer should have been overruled, because the plaintiffs were really the firm of Nelson & Doble. The balance of the averment may be rejected as surplusage. (17 Pick. 87; 14 Pick. 87; 14 Pick. 156; 12 Mass. 434.)

Demurrer was not the remedy. A motion to render the complaint more certain, or a plea in abatement would have been proper. (Barnes v. Perine, 9 Barb. 202.)

A mistake in the name of plaintiff is not ground of nonsuit. (Brashear v. Stothard, 4 Bibb, 265; 1 Monroe, 175; Bacon Ab. Title "Mianomer.")

P. L. Edwards, for Respondent.

1. The demurrer of the Respondent was rightfully sustained. Plaintiffs are bound to know their own names, and to sue by them. (See Revis v. Lamme & Brother, 2 Mo. 168.)

2. The Appellants having refused to amend, and rested on their complaint and the demurrer, cannot now complain that the Court rendered final judgment.

BALDWIN, J. delivered the opinion of the Court — TERRY, C. J. concurring.

We do not think it was a good ground of demurrer that the christian name of one of the plaintiffs does not appear in the record. We cannot judicially know that one of the plaintiffs had either a christian or heathen name, or that it is necessarily untrue that he has forgotten it if he had.

Judgment reversed and cause remanded.

McHENDRY v. REILLY AND WIFE.

LAND on which a vendor's lien exists for the purchase money, may become a homestead, but the homestead right is subordinate to the lien. And after this right has attached, the husband cannot, without the assent of the wife, charge the land by an agreement to pay interest in addition to the purchase money.

APPEAL from the Twelfth District.

L. Sanders, Jr. for Appellant.

Wm. W. Crane, Jr. for Respondent.

BALDWIN, J. delivered the opinion of the Court — TERRY, C. J. concurring.

Bill filed to enforce a vendor's lien for balance due of purchase money. For this balance (some three hundred dollars) defendant gave his due-bill in 1854, payable four months after date, with three per cent. interest per month. It seems no interest was due on this balance until the giving of the note. The premises had become the homestead of the defendant before the giving of this note. The decree of the Court was for a sale of the land, for some seven hundred dollars and upwards, being for this balance and the agreed interest.

We do not understand that land on which purchase money is due may not become impressed with the character of a homestead; but only that the homestead right is subordinate to the lien, when such lien exists, for the purchase money. But having acquired this character, it was not competent for the husband to charge the land further by agreement of this sort, without the wife's assent, as provided by statute, any more than to bind it by an entirely new contract. For this error the decree is reversed, with leave, however, as the point does not seem to have been taken below, and may be varied by other proofs, to both the parties, to try the case de novo if desired.

SCALES et al. v. SCOTT et al.

IN a suit to set aside a judgment confessed by a party to defraud his creditors, it is not necessary that plaintiff should be either a judgment or execution creditor. A lien acquired by attachment suffices.

Heyneman v. Dannenberg, (6 Cal. 376,) affirmed.

A slight mistake in the computation of interest, the date being given, is no evidence of fraud.

Where judgment is confessed on a note, a portion of the consideration being advanced from time to time after the date of the note, which drew interest on the whole amount from date, a portion of the interest is fraudulent, and the entire note is void against creditors.

McKenty v. Gladwin, Hugg & Co. (10 Cal. 227,) affirmed.

APPEAL from the Third District.

Wm. Blanding, for Appellant.

The bill should have been dismissed, because it shows that the plaintiffs were neither judgment nor execution creditors. (Wiggins v. Armstrong, 2 John. Ch. R. 144; Brinkerhoff v. Brown, 4 John. Id. 671; McDermot v. Strong, 4 John. Id. 687; Newstadt v. Joel, 2 Duer, 530; Rubens v. Joel, 3 Kern. 483; Crippen v. Hudson, Ib. 161; McIlwain v. Willis, 9 Wend. 548.)

Scales et al. v. Scott et al.

The case of Heyneman v. Dannenberg differs from this in the circumstance, that actual fraud was shown there.

The fact that plaintiff was an attaching creditor of Scott does not aid. The principle is not that a party has a lien merely, but that he has exhausted his remedy at law. (Russell v. Clarke's Ex'rs, 7 Cranch, 89; Crippen v. Hudson, 8 Kern. 161.) In Thornburg v. Hand, (7 Cal. 554,) the principle is admitted, but an exception made where a party has a lien. Now, a lien of attachment is not a lien in the proper sense. (Practice Act, Sec. 120; Ex parte Foster, 2 Story, 181; Fisher v. Vose, 3 Rob. La. 457.) Besides, under Section 132, Practice Act, plaintiffs could not resort to the property seized in this case, it having been already levied on. Hence, there was no lien.

The fact, it is said, apparent from the answer, that the various amounts loaned have been united into one note, with interest from date, instead of bearing interest only from the dates of the several loans, is proof of fraud. But suppose the various loans, bearing a certain rate of interest, are consolidated into one note, dated as of the first loan, and by a calculation, known as the equation of payments, the rate of interest is so adjusted that a lesser rate charged on the aggregated loans from the earliest date just equals a higher rate charged on the several loans from their respective dates. What fraud would there be in this? This is an ordinary occurrence among merchants, making mutual advances in settling their accounts.

Wm. T. Wallace, for Respondents, cited Heyneman v. Dannenberg, (6 Cal. 376,) as to their right to maintain the suit, and upon the point that the judgment in favor of Scott was for too much, even conceding it to have been bona fide in fact, Tasffe v. Josephson, (7 Cal. 352;) 12 Pick. 388; 3 Met. 44; (10 Cal. 227.)

Plaintiff was entitled to a decree on the admission in the answer that the note for which judgment was confessed drew interest from date, although it was given for money loaned at different times, some of them being subsequent to the date of the note.

TERRY, C. J. delivered the opinion of the Court — BALDWIN, J. concurring.

This is a proceeding by an attaching creditor to set aside a judgment confessed by Scott in favor of Place, on the ground of fraud.

Judgment was confessed on the 12th of August, 1858, by Scott, in favor of Place. Upon this judgment execution was issued, and levied upon certain property. Subsequently, plaintiffs sued out an attachment against Scott, which was levied upon the same property, in the hands of the Sheriff, and plaintiffs then instituted this proceeding. The Court below gave judgment, postponing Place's judgment to plaintiffs, and defendant appeals.

The errors assigned are:

1. The bill should have been dismissed, because it shows that plaintiffs were neither judgment nor execution creditors of Scott.
2. That there was no evidence of fraud.

The first point is sufficiently answered by the opinion in the case of Heyneman v. Dannenberg, (6 Cal. 376,) in which the question is discussed with some care.

Upon the question of fraud, the principal evidence is found in the answer of defendants; for we are disposed to give no weight to the fact that a slight mistake was made in the computation of interest, included in the judgment. The data for the computation are given, and the miscalculation is clearly the result of mistake, and not a design to defraud.

The judgment purports to be for the amount of two promissory notes — one for three thousand dollars, dated 1st of March, 1858; the other for two thousand five hundred dollars, dated June 5th, 1858 — each bearing two per cent, interest per month. The consideration of the notes is stated to have been money loaned, at the respective dates of the notes. In the answer of defendants, filed in this case, it is stated that the consideration of the first note was money loaned, at its date, and that the consideration of the second was money loaned at the time of its date, "and at various times subsequently." What portion of the sum advanced subsequently does not appear.

The confession of judgment includes interest upon the whole amount of two thousand five hundred dollars, from the date of the note; when it is clear, from the sworn answer of defendants, that interest on a portion only was due from that time. This fact must have been known to the parties at the time judgment was confessed.

 McCarty v. Christie et al.

---

In the case of McKenty v. Gladwin, Hugg & Co., 10 Cal. 227, we held, "if any portion of the consideration of a note be fraudulent, the entire note is void, as against creditors. It must also be conceded that the interest included in the note sued upon in this case, is as much a part of the sum for which the note was given as the principal sum itself. The interest would enter into and swell the amount of the judgment to be rendered upon the note. It is clear that if there was no consideration for a part of the principal sum for which the note was given, the whole note would be void. And we cannot see why the same rule would not justly apply to the interest. If a party, by ante-dating a note, and making it draw interest from date, secures to himself a certain sum of money not justly due to him for any past or present consideration, he takes that much from the other creditors; and they are just as much injured as if that amount had been included as part of the principal sum itself. The result is the same, though the mode of accomplishing it be different."

These remarks are directly applicable to the cause under consideration.

Judgment affirmed.

McCARTY v. CHRISTIE et al.

A note for five hundred dollars by an insolvent, to the order of Alfred McCarty, is insufficiently described where the schedule simply states, "Alfred McCarty, borrowed money, April, 1855, $500;" and a discharge in such case is no bar to a suit on the note.

The payment by a judgment debtor of the judgment, after a Sheriff's sale, extinguishes the lien; and the fact that he takes a transfer of the certificate and the Sheriff's deed, instead of a certificate of redemption, cannot divest the lien of a subsequent judgment.

APPEAL from the Eleventh District.

Suit on a note and mortgage executed jointly by defendants, Christie and Mitchell. The note was to the order of plaintiff, and dated April 3, 1855. On the 8th day of May, 1854, defendants had executed a note and mortgage on the same property to one Gallagher to secure the payment of $700. A judgment on this note and mortgage to Gallagher was had in the District Court of the Eleventh Judicial District, on the 19th of November, 1855. The property was sold under said judgment on the 25th of December, 1855; Gallagher was the purchaser, and the certificate was issued by the Sheriff to him. The defendant, A. J. Christie, about the expiration of the time of redemption, purchased Gallagher's title to the property, took an assignment of the certificate of sale, and received a deed from the Sheriff upon the expiration of the six months. In May, 1855, defendant, Christie, married, and since that time resided on the property and occupied it as a homestead. In December, 1855, the defendant, Christie, as an insolvent, was discharged from his debts, the note sued on being on his schedule under the following description, to wit: "Alfred McCarty borrowed money, April, 1855; $500." Defendant, Christie, answered, admitting the note sued on, but setting up his discharge in insolvency, his claim of homestead, and asking that his wife be made a party. Judgment for plaintiff on the note, and that the property mortgaged be sold. Defendant appealed.

---

Sanderson & Newell, for Appellant.

The record presents the question: Did the title of Gallagher (purchased by Christie) inure to the benefit of the present plaintiff by virtue of his mortgage on the premises? If it did, the decree upon this point is correct. If it did not, the decree is erroneous. We hold that the title did not inure to the benefit of plaintiff, and in support of that position, cite the case of Clark v. Baker et al. (Oct. Term, 1858.)

The proceedings in insolvency were regular, and the note is sufficiently described.

Thomas H. Hewes, for Respondent, to the point, that the discharge of Christie was no bar to the action, cited McAllister v. Strode, (7 Cal. 428;) Judson v. Atwill, (9 Cal. 477.) But conceding the discharge to have been regular, the lien by mortgage was not affected by it. (Cummings v. Brady, Oct. Term, 1858.)

The purchase by defendant, Christie, of Gallagher's interest in the property, simply extinguished the lien of his judgment. After the sale under this judgment, and before the Sheriff's deed, the title still remained in Christie. (McMillan v. Richards, 9 Cal. 365; Cummings v. Coe, 10 Id. 529.) And the effect of Christie's purchase was to buy a demand against himself. In short, he paid off the prior mortgage, and left plaintiff's lien intact.

---

TERRY, C. J. delivered the opinion of the Court — BALDWIN, J. concurring.

There is no error in the judgment. The insolvent proceedings constituted no bar to plaintiff's claim, for the reason, that defendants' schedule contained no sufficient description of plaintiff's demand.

The payment of Gallagher's judgment operated to extinguish the prior lien, and the fact that the judgment debtor took a transfer of the certificate of sale and a Sheriff's deed, instead of a certificate of redemption, could not operate to divest plaintiff's lien.

Judgment affirmed.

GOODE v. SMITH AND WIFE.

IN acknowledgments to deeds, substantial conformity with the statute is sufficient.

The words "undue influence" being omitted in the acknowledgment of a wife, does not render it invalid.

A Justice of the Peace can take the acknowledgment of the wife to a deed of the homestead.

If a party permits his antagonist to prove a fact by secondary evidence, he cannot afterwards object that it was not proved by the best.

In chancery cases the Court below may disregard the verdict of a jury.

In chancery cases the Appellate Court will not notice minor errors, if on the whole record the decree be right.

APPEAL from the Eleventh District.

To the case stated by the Court, add, that the defendants set up in their answer that the property was their homestead at the time of the execution of the instrument sued on, and that it was obtained from them under threats of a criminal prosecution. Defendants appeal.

Horace Smith, for Appellants.

The deed is void because executed under duress and fear excited by threats of a criminal prosecution. (Forshay v. Ferguson, 5 Hill, 154; Story's Eq. Jur. Sec. 239.) Upon the other points discussed by counsel, the Court do not pass.

---

Goode v. Smith and Wife.

---

E. B. Crocker, for Respondent, argued that the acknowledgment of the wife to the deed was sufficient, though the words "undue influence" were omitted; and that a Justice of the Peace was authorized to take the acknowledgment of the wife to a deed of the homestead. This being joint, and not separate property, does not come within the case in 9 Cal. 591. (See Wood's Dig. 100, Sec. 4; p. 102, Sec. 21.)

A homestead cannot be claimed out of lands held in joint tenancy, or by tenancy in common. (5 Cal. 244; 6 Id. 165.)

As to duress, the jury found against defendants. They appeal.

BALDWIN, J. delivered the opinion of the Court — TERRY, C. J. concurring.

Bill filed, alleging that in 1853, plaintiff bought of Smith and Brown a tract of land, known as the "Kentucky Ranch," for three thousand two hundred dollars, which sum vendees received and divided; that, at the time of the purchase, Smith and Brown represented that there were no incumbrances on the land; but plaintiff, in 1855, discovered the premises had been mortgaged by S. and B. to one Kidd for one thousand eight hundred dollars, to secure a note due at sixty days, with interest at five per cent. per month from date, (23d April, 1853;) that this debt was for money borrowed of Kidd, which S. and B. used in the purchase of another ranch. That, on the 10th April, 1855, it was agreed, in consideration of the premises, between the plaintiff and Smith, that if plaintiff would pay or satisfy this demand of Kidd's, or get an assignment of it, the amount paid or expended for the purpose, (eight hundred dollars,) should be repaid to plaintiff by Smith by the 10th October afterwards; and that this last ranch — called the "Randolph Ranch" — should be held by plaintiff as security for the sum. An absolute deed was made to the plaintiff by Smith and wife for the Randolph Ranch, and an instrument of defeasance executed by the plaintiff. The bill is brought to foreclose the mortgage thus made.

Brown was not made a party to the proceeding, nor was it necessary.

The defendants answered, denying the allegations of the bill. A jury was empaneled, and rendered a verdict for the plaintiff.

Goode v. Smith and Wife.

---

The Court decreed in favor of the plaintiff upon the verdict and evidence.

The deed to the Randolph Ranch was executed by Smith and wife. It was acknowledged before a Justice of the Peace. The deed was objected to on the ground of defective acknowledgment on the part of the wife. The acknowledgment is as follows:

"STATE OF CALIFORNIA, }
Placer County. }

On this 10th day of April, A. D. 1855, before me, a Justice of the Peace for said county, personally appeared P. H. Smith and Elizabeth Smith, his wife, to me personally known to be the individuals named in and who executed the foregoing instrument of writing, who acknowledged to me that they executed the same freely and voluntarily, and for the uses and purposes therein mentioned, and the said Elizabeth Smith being examined by me separate and apart from her husband, P. H. Smith, and without his hearing, acknowledged to me that she executed the same freely and voluntarily, and for the uses and purposes therein mentioned, without fear or compulsion, and that she did not wish to retract the same, well knowing the contents thereof, after due explanation by me made.

D. V. MASON, J. P.
For Township No. 2, Placer County, Cal."

The Court held that the acknowledgment — the property being a homestead — was not sufficient as to the wife, but the deed was admitted as against the husband. The jury, however, found that the property was owned jointly by Smith and Brown; and the Court, therefore, held that no homestead rights attached.

1. We think that the acknowledgment was sufficient as to the husband and wife. It is true, that it does not follow the words of the statute, but this is not necessary. Substantial conformity is enough. The certificate shows a privy examination of the wife — that the deed was freely and voluntarily executed, without threats, fear, or compulsion.

It is true, it does not state that it was executed without undue influence; but it is difficult to see how a deed, freely and voluntarily executed, without fear, threats, or compulsion, could be executed under undue influence, or, indeed, any extraneous influence at all.

Goode v. Smith and Wife.

2. There is nothing in the point that a Justice of the Peace cannot take an acknowledgment of a feme covert to a deed conveying a homestead, even if the objection be good when applied to a conveyance of separate estate. The statute, (Wood's Dig., 100, Sec. 4,) empowers Justices of the Peace to take acknowledgments; and Section 21, (page 102,) empowers any officer "authorized by this Act to take the proof or acknowledgment of any conveyance whereby any real estate is conveyed or may be affected, and such officer may take and certify the acknowledgment of a married woman to any such conveyance of real estate." We think the statute was intended to be uniform, and can see no reason why a Justice of the Peace should not be allowed to take an acknowledgment of a feme covert as well as a Notary. If compelled, by the express words of the Act in reference to the conveyances of the wife's separate estate, to hold to the contrary, we think we are neither compelled or permitted so to hold in regard to a deed of the homestead.

3. The deed having been admitted, the Court could attach to it all its legal weight; and it showed a valid contract on good consideration. The ground upon which the Court put its decision might well be maintained. It is true, the evidence of the witness who swore that the property was owned jointly by Smith and Brown, may not be the best mode of proving this fact; but no objection seems to have been taken to this kind of proof when offered, and if a party permits his antagonist to prove a fact by secondary evidence, we know of no rule which allows him afterwards to object that it was not proved by the best.

4. The jury found there was no duress; and if they had found to the contrary, this being a Chancery case, the Court would have been well justified in holding otherwise. The evidence shows that Smith and Brown did represent the Kentucky Ranch to be free from incumbrances; it was not. Smith and Brown were under the highest moral obligation to make good their representations. There is no proof that Smith was coerced into making this deed by any threat of criminal prosecution, even if there was sufficient proof that the plaintiff threatened to prosecute, and that this threat was communicated. It is quite as charitable to suppose that Smith acted from a sense of moral obligation, as that he acted from a sense of fear. We are not disposed to interfere with the finding of the jury, and the judgment of the Court in this respect.

Bryant v. Watriss et al.

The other assignments we do not consider it necessary to notice. On the whole case, we think the plaintiff entitled to recover, and if minor errors intervened, as this is a Chancery cause, we would not notice them, if, on the whole record, the decree was right.

Judgment affirmed.

BRYANT v. WATRISS et al.

In a suit against the maker of a note, or the acceptor of a bill, the indorser is a competent witness for either party.

APPEAL from the Twelfth District.

The facts appear in the opinion of the Court.

Stanly & Hayes, for Appellant.

The witness, Ira P. Rankin, the payee and indorser of the note sued on, was incompetent, by reason of his interest. (Bashins v. Wilson, 6 Conn. 471; Pingree v. Warren et al. 6 Greenleaf, 457; Steinmetz v. Currie, 1 Dallas, 270; Barnes v. Ball et al. 1 Mass. 73; Cowles v. Harts, Johnson et al. 3 Conn. 516; Hurick v. Whitney et al. 15 John. 240; Duncan v. Pindel, 4 Bibb, 331; 19 Wend. 561; 2 Watts, 121; Soule v. Dawes, 6 Cal. 475; Schilling v. McClann, 6 Greenleaf, 368, side page; Richardson et al. v. Bartley et al. 2 B. Monroe, 333.)

Balie Peyton, for Respondent.

In a suit by the holder against the maker, the payee and indorser is a competent witness for the holder, because his interest is exactly balanced. (1 Greenl. Ev. Secs. 399, 400.)

FIELD, J. delivered the opinion of the Court — BALDWIN, J. concurring.

This is an action upon a promissory note, in which the maker

Bryant v. Watrous et al.

and indorsers are joined as defendants under the fifteenth section of the Practice Act; and the only question presented by the appeal is, whether the first indorser was a competent witness for the plaintiff. No service appears to have been made upon the indorsers, and the judgment was taken only against the maker.

There is a want of consistency in the adjudged cases as to the competency of parties to bills and notes, as witnesses in suits between other parties to the same paper. In England the authorities favor the admission of parties, their competency being determined by the doctrine of equal liability. Thus, "in an action by indorsee against drawer or acceptor," says Bayley in his treatise on Bills and Notes, "an indorser is, in general, a competent witness either for plaintiff or defendant; for plaintiff, because, though the plaintiff's succeeding in the action may prevent him from calling for payment from the indorser, it is not certain that it will; and whatever part of the bill or note the indorser is compelled to pay, he may recover again from the drawer or acceptor; and he is competent for defendant, because if plaintiff fails against drawer or acceptor, he is driven either to sue the indorser or to abandon his claim." The same doctrine which allows an indorser of a bill of exchange to be a witness against the acceptor admits the indorser of a promissory note as a witness against the maker. The acceptor of a bill and the maker of a note stand in the same relation to the indorser in respect to primary liability. There are decisions in the American Courts sustaining the opposite doctrine, though the cases are not uniform. Cowen & Hill, in their notes to Phillips, (Part 1, Note 99,) after citing a great number, observe that from them "it appears that the Courts are not consistent in their decisions as to the competency of a party to a bill or note. As a general rule he is, in England, a competent witness, for he is equally liable, let the suit terminate as it will, and for nothing beyond the face of the paper; not for costs, unless the party for whom he is called become a party for his accommodation, or he has otherwise made himself liable by some special undertaking. The American cases mostly come short of that, especially as to the competency of a drawer or indorser, for a subsequent holder. We are inclined to believe, however, that there is a tendency to the adoption of the English rule." (See, also, Baretto v. Snowden, 5 Wend. 181; Hall v. Hale, 8 Conn. 337.)

Baker v. Baker.

The English rule appears to rest upon principle, and to place the admissibility of the parties to a bill or note upon tenable grounds. And the whole tendency of the decisions is to relax rather than to extend the rule of exclusion. The interest of the witness to exclude must be such that he will gain or lose by the direct legal operation and effect of the judgment, or the record of the judgment must be evidence for or against him in some other action. Neither of these events can happen in the case at bar. A recovery against the maker cannot affect the liability of the indorser. It is payment of the note alone which can discharge him. If the judgment is not made upon execution the indorser may be sued; and if he is compelled to pay the amount he has his recourse against the maker. The judgment between the holder and maker cannot be evidence between the holder and indorser, or, in a subsequent suit, between the indorser and maker. Neither of the conditions by which the competency of the indorser can be tested could possibly happen in the case at bar. He can neither gain or lose directly by the judgment against the maker, nor can its record be evidence for or against him. We are, therefore, of opinion that he was a competent witness.

Judgment affirmed.

BAKER v. BAKER.

THE 8th section of the Act of 1851, concerning divorces, which provides, that "no divorce shall be granted in any action by default of the defendant, nor on the admission or statement of either party," does not prohibit the introduction of confessions in evidence, but simply prevents granting a decree on them alone.

THIS was the rule of the common and English Ecclesiastical law, and our statute is merely affirmatory of that rule.

THE object of the rule requiring proof, in corroboration of defendant's confessions, is to guard against collusion; and when the entire testimony, confessions, and circumstances, repel all suspicion of collusion, and leave no doubt of the truth of the confessions, the Court should act upon them.

WHERE a statute is in affirmance of the common law, it is to be construed as was the rule by that law.

IN a verified answer an evasion of the controlling fact in issue, is a strong circumstance against the defendant.

A child born in lawful wedlock, is presumed to be the child of the husband. The marriage is an acknowledgment by the husband that the child is his; but, to be effective, there must be knowledge at the time of the fact admitted. Hence, where a man marries a woman with child, the law presumes the child is his; but this presumption is based upon the assumed fact that he knew, at the time of his marriage, the situation of the woman. Marriage by our law is a civil contract, and may be avoided for material and substantive fraud in its procurement; and ante-nuptial pregnancy by a stranger is a fraud going to the very substance of the contract, vitiates it ab initio, and authorizes a divorce.

---

Baker v. Baker.

---

A woman to be marriageable must, at the time, be able to bear children to her husband; and a representation to this effect is implied in the very nature of the contract.

APPEAL from the Twelfth District.

Action for divorce a vinculo matrimonii, on the ground of fraud. The facts appear in the opinion of the Court.

McDougall & Sharp, for Appellant.

I. The confessions of the defendant were admissible.

Section 8 of the Act of 1851, as to proof in cases of divorce, is simply in affirmance of the common law, and must be construed according to that law. (Harlest's Case, 3 Coke, 13; 2 Vol. 13; Stowell v. Lord Zouch, 1 Plowd. 364, a; Moore v. Hussey, Hobart, 97; Bacon Abr. Statutes, I. 4, Vol. 9, 245; 1 P. Wms. 252; 2 Just. 148, 301; 1 Saund. 240; 10 Mod. 245; Foster, 94; 11 Mod. 150; Bacon Stat. I. 5, 246; Plowd. 205; Stradling v. Morgan, Lit. R. 212; 11 Mod. 161; 1 How. 491; 1 John. 105; Burgess v. Burgess, 4 Eng. Eccl. 532, 546.)

The reason for excluding confessions in cases of divorce, is the danger of collusion. This reason cannot apply when it affirmatively appears there can be no collusion. (Smith's Com. 637; Bishop on Divorce, Secs. 305, 309, 310; Billings v. Billings, 11 Pick. 461; Matchen v. Matchen, 6 Barr, 337; Sawyer v. Sawyer, Walker's Ch. R. 52; Tewksberry v. Tewksberry, 4 How. Miss. 111; Conant v. Conant, 10 Cal. 254.)

II. The fact that the child was begotten by a stranger is sufficiently established.

The defendant confesses the fact clearly and distinctly, and in addition to the confessions, we have the following circumstances:

1. The child was generated out of wedlock, and before the contract of marriage between plaintiff and defendant.
2. The child has a putative father other than plaintiff.
3. The putative father was on terms of intimacy with defendant at and during the time when the child should have been generated.

Baker v. Baker.

---

4. The defendant, and the family of defendant, have recognized, or at least acquiesced in the fact, that the child was the offspring of the putative father.

5. The defendant, under circumstances which do not admit of the idea of collusion, admits the child the offspring of the putative father.

6. The plaintiff and defendant lived together from the time of the contract of marriage, until the time the obnoxious fact presented itself, in harmony. Immediately upon its presentation, upon the first notice of the wrong, plaintiff did all in his power, or in the power of any man, to vindicate himself—to discharge himself from the burden of a child foreign to his blood, and the burden of a wife false to her obligation. He repudiated child and wife.

7. The plaintiff not only repudiated, but separated from the defendant immediately upon notice of the fact.

8. The repudiation and separation were recognized as for good cause, both by the defendant and her family.

9. The answer of defendant, which is not a mere "admission or statement," but which, from its being under oath, has the dignity of evidence, is itself a fact. While, under our statute and the general rule of law, it could not by itself justify a conclusion, it has the character and force of a most significant circumstance. It is itself a confession distinct and independent in such a form, and made under such circumstances, as not only repels all idea of collusion, but all foundation for the suggestion that the first confession was made under questionable circumstances; and if the doctrine in Vance v. Vance. (8 Greenleaf, 132) is recognized as sound, would by itself justify a decree against defendant.

The force of these circumstances is sought to be overcome by the legal presumption that a child born in lawful wedlock is the child of the husband. We admit this presumption in its place, but deny its applicability to the present case. The rule is derived from the English law, but not from that law as applicable to divorces. The effect of ante-nuptial incontinence has been a frequent subject of discussion in the English Ecclesiastical Courts, but the effect of, or the presumption incident to, ante-nuptial pregnancy, seems open to be settled according to the rules of right reason. (For the English rule, as recognized by American authorities, see 1 Black. Com. 457.) The presumption at most is the legitimacy of the child. (See, also, Wells v. Stout, 9 Cal. 499; Mathews Presumptive Evidence, 24, 25.) The question in Stetgall v. Stetgall, (2 Brock. 265,) cited by defense, was one of legitimacy. As to the authorities cited to show the inadmissibility of defendant's confessions. The cases of Baxter v. Baxter, (1 Mass. 346,) and Holland v. Holland, (2 Id. 154,) are perfectly consistent with the ruling in Billings v. Billings, (11 Pick. 461,) and Vance v. Vance, (8 Greenleaf,) and clearly sustains the same doctrine. The same is true of Betts v. Betts, (1 John. Ch. 197); Van Veghten v. Van Veghten, (4 John. Ch. 501); and Barry v. Barry, (Hopkins Ch. 118.) Every one of the cases cited recognizes the admissibility of the confessions and their sufficiency when supported by circumstances which repel all idea of collusion.

Baker v. Baker.

---

The defendant having been with child by a stranger at the time of the contract of marriage, and having concealed her condition from the plaintiff, was such concealment a fraud, and may the plaintiff for this cause have the contract canceled? (Comp. Laws, 371.) Divorce may be granted "when the consent of either party was obtained by force or fraud, upon the application of either party."

Our statute intends to place the marriage contract upon the same grounds with other civil contracts, and to justify its avoidance for material fraud in the making or procurement of the contract. (Reeves' Domestic Relations; Irving's Civ. Law, 102; 2d Burns' Eccl. Law, 500a; Page on Divorce, 161, 162; Morris v. Morris, Wright's Rep. 630; Ritter v. Ritter, 5 Black. 81; Scott v. Shufeldt, 5 Paige, 43; Montgomery v. Montgomery, 3 Barb. Ch. 132.)

Stanly & Hays, for Respondent.

1. The testimony as to the so-called confessions of the defendant was inadmissible, as they could not be the basis of a divorce.

The rule of the common law never prevailed in this State, for Section 8 of the Act concerning divorces, passed in 1851, (see Comp. Laws, 372,) which section was re-enacted in 1857,

Baker v. Baker.

---

(see Laws of 1857, 240,) provides that, "No divorce shall be granted in any action by the default of the defendant, nor on the admission or statement of either party, but in all cases the Court shall require proof of the facts alleged, as the grounds for a divorce." (Conant v. Conant, 10 Cal. 254; 2 Kent, 67; Hansley v. Hansley, 10 Ired. 510; Hansel v. Hansel, Wright's Ohio, 212; Brainard v. Brainard, Id. 354.)

The authorities cited by the counsel for the plaintiff on the subject of confessions, come from States and countries where the common law rule prevails, and they all, with one exception, reject confessions unless corroborated. (Baxter v. Baxter, 1 Mass. 346; Betts v. Betts, 1 Johns. Ch. Rep. 198; Doe v. Roe, 1 Johns. Cases, 25; Holland v. Holland, 2 Mass. 153; Washburn v. Washburn, 5 N. Hamp. 195; Clutch v. Clutch, Saxton's N. J. 474; Devenbagh v. Devenbagh, 5 Paige's Ch. 555; Matchin v. Matchin, 6 Barr, Penn. 337; Montgomery v. Montgomery, 3 Barb. Ch. 134; Hansel v. Hansel, Wright's Ohio, 212; Brainard v. Brainard, Wright's Ohio, 354; Müller v. Müller, 1 Green's Ch. N. J. 143.)

2. The "admission or statement" of the defendant, is not a confession in law; or, in other words, it was made under such circumstances as not to entitle it to any credit.

A statement, to constitute a confession, must be made voluntarily. (1 Greenleaf's Ev. Secs. 219, 229, p. 208, Note 1; 1 Green's Ch. R. 139; Bouvier's Law Dict. word "Confession.") Here the confessions were not voluntary.

3. The testimony, even if the confessions were admissible and competent, does not establish that the defendant was pregnant by a stranger, at the time of her intermarriage with the plaintiff.

The only evidence offered by the plaintiff to establish that she was pregnant by a stranger, was an admission made through fear.

The law presumes that the child born of the defendant, after her marriage, was the offspring of the plaintiff. Moss v. Moss, 2 Ired. 60; Stegall et al. v. Stegall, 2 Brock. 261.)

The record shows that he acquiesced in the child being his for several days after its birth, that he did not attempt to repudiate it until Wm. Arrington called on him at the Oriental Hotel.

In The State v. Herman, (13 Ired. 502,) it was held that a "child born in wedlock, though born within a month or a day after marriage, is legitimate, by presumption of law." (See, also, the authorities cited in Notes 1 and 2, 2 Greenl. Ev. Sec. 150; Scroggins v. Scroggins, 3 Dev. 535, 547; The King v. Luffe, 8 East, 191.)

Baker v. Baker.

In this case, it is shown that the plaintiff's courtship extended over a period of some seven or eight months previous to the marriage; that they had been engaged for that length of time before marriage; that he was frequently with her alone, while she was not alone with any other person than himself; that they lived happily together until two or three days after the birth of the child.

In Montgomery v. Montgomery, (3 Barb. Ch. 135,) which was an action to obtain a divorce, the Court said, "in the absence of any proof to the contrary, the legal presumption is, that the child, of which the defendant was subsequently delivered, was the child of the complainant, although the testimony shows it must have been begotten before the marriage." (See Baxter v. Baxter, 1 Mass. 346; Holland v. Holland, 2 Mass. 154.)

4. If the defendant was with child by a stranger, at the time of her intermarriage with the plaintiff, the mere failure to disclose that fact, there being "no false representations," nor "active measures to deceive," was not a fraud, within the meaning of our statute concerning divorces. Nor would it be a ground of divorce at common law. (Bishop on Divorce, Sec. 106; Baden v. Baden, 3 Dev. 548.)

"If a woman pretends to be a virgin, while she is not, or even while she is a common prostitute, a marriage contracted on the faith of the representation is nevertheless good." (Bishop, Sec. 105.)

This is the settled law of Scotland, and is also the doctrine of the English Courts. (Note 1, to Sec. 105, Id. and cases there cited, Sec. 101, et seq.) As to meaning of "fraudulent contract," as applied to Marriage and Divorce, see Benton v. Benton, (1 Day, 111.)

FIELD, J. delivered the opinion of the Court — BALDWIN, J. concurring.

On the 22d of September, 1857, the parties to this action intermarried, and until the tenth of the following February they lived together as husband and wife. On this last day, four months and nineteen days from the date of the marriage, the defendant gave birth to a fully developed child. The plaintiff insists that this child was begotten by a stranger; that the defendant knew, or had sufficient reason to believe that she was with the child at the date of her marriage, and concealed the fact from him; that he was ignorant of her condition, and believed her at the time to be chaste and virtuous; that he continued thus ignorant until the birth of the child, and that upon this event happening, he repudiated the defendant and her child, and as soon as her health would permit, returned her with the child to her family and relatives. Upon these facts, as established, the plaintiff seeks a divorce a vinculo matrimonii, on the ground of fraud. On the hearing before the Referee, the confessions of the defendant as to the father of the child were admitted in evidence, against the objection of her counsel; and much of the argument at the bar was directed to the propriety of their admission. In considering the case, three questions present themselves for determination. These relate: 1st. To the admissibility of the testimony as to the confessions. 2d. To the sufficiency of the testimony if admitted, taken in connection with corroborating circumstances, to establish the fact alleged that the child was begotten by a stranger; and, 3d. To the sufficiency of the cause assigned, if established, viz: the condition of the defendant at the date of her marriage and her concealment thereof, the plaintiff being innocent and ignorant, for a divorce under our statute.

---

Baker v. Baker.

---

The objection of the defendant's counsel to the introduction of the confessions rests chiefly upon the eighth section of the Act of 1851 concerning divorces, which provides that "no divorce shall be granted in any action by default of the defendant, nor on the admission or statement of either party; but in all cases the Court shall require proof of the facts alleged as the grounds for a divorce. A similar provision, in identical language, is contained in the Supplemental Act of April, 1857. The statute, as appears, does not in terms prohibit the introduction of confessions; but only provides that the decree shall not be granted on them. In this respect it is only affirmatory of the well established rule of the common and of the English Ecclesiastical law, which has been recognized from the earliest period, both in England and the several States of the Union. The object of the rule is to prevent collusion between the parties. Without some limitation of this kind it would be in the power of the parties to obtain a divorce in all cases. The public is interested in the marriage relation and the maintenance of its integrity, as it is the foundation of the social system, and the law wisely requires proof of the facts alleged as the ground for its dissolution.

The agreement of the parties will not answer, as then the marriage relation would be one only of temporary convenience; the default in the action will not answer, as this would only be another form for carrying out their previous agreement; confessions alone will not answer, because they may be the result of collusion, and be untrue, in fact. But the public can have no interest in suppressing the truth; and, as a means of its ascertainment, the confessions of parties against their interests have always been regarded as evidence of the most important character. And when all presumptions of collusion are repelled, and, from circumstances, it appears reasonably certain that the confession made is true, the ground of the rule of exclusion in cases of divorce is obviated, and there can be no reason for refusing consideration to the confession. "Thus, it has been held," observes Dr. Lushington, in Harris v. Harris, (2 Hagg. Ecc. R. 409,) "that confession, when perfectly free from all taint of collusion, when confirmed by circumstances and conduct * * ranks among the highest species of evidence. It has been so held on different occasions. It was most truly stated by Lord Stowell in the case of Mortimer v. Mortimer, 'that the Court was inclined to view confession, when not affected by collusion, as evidence of the greatest importance,' and the grounds upon which the Court laid down this principle are too obvious to need any explanation."

In Matchin v. Matchin, (6 Barr, 337,) Gibson, C. J. said: "It is a rule of policy, however, not to found a sentence of divorce on confession alone; yet, where it is full, confidential, reluctant, free from suspicion of collusion, and corroborated by circumstances, it is ranked with the safest proofs."

In Sawyer v. Sawyer, (Walker Ch. 52,) Manning, Chancellor, said: "In cases of adultery, the right to a divorce consists in the proof of a single fact; and if the confessions of the party were to be received as sufficient proof, there would be a danger of collusion. It is to guard against this that other proof is required in corroboration of the defendant's confessions. The same rule must apply to confessions as evidence in all other cases of divorce from the bonds of matrimony, with this limitation: that, where there is less danger of collusion, or it could not be practiced so easily, the corroborating facts or circumstances need not be of so decisive a character. The object of the rule is to guard against collusion—not to obstruct the administration of justice. Where the circumstances of the case are such as to repel all suspicion of collusion, and leave in the mind of the Court no doubt of the truth of the confessions, it should act accordingly."

---

Baker v. Baker.

---

The rule of the statute, as we have already observed, is that of the common, as well as of the ecclesiastical, law. That no decree or sentence can be founded upon the sole evidence of the confessions of the defendant out of Court, "is clearly," says Bishop, (Sec. 305,) "the rule of the ancient, as well as the modern common law. For, in Collet's case, it being suggested to the Court of King's Bench that parties who had lived together sixteen years, were proceeding in the Spiritual Court collusively, on the false allegation of incest, to dissolve a marriage for the purpose of bastardizing their children—'they both appear and confess the matter, upon which a sentence of divorce was to pass'—it was held that prohibition would lie."

The statute of this State, being in affirmance of the common law, is to be construed as was the rule by that law. This is a received doctrine of construction in such cases. Thus in Miles v. Williams, (1 Peere Wms. 252,) the Court said: "The best rule of construing Acts of Parliament is by the common law, and by the course which that observed in like cases of its own before the Act;" and, in Arthur v. Bokenham, (11 Mod. 150,) the Common Pleas said: "The general rule in exposition of all Acts of Parliament is this—that, in all doubtful matters, and where the expression is in general terms, they are to receive such a construction as may be agreeable to the rules of the common law, in cases of that nature; for statutes are not presumed to make any alteration in the common law, further or otherwise than the Act does expressly declare; therefore, in all general matters, the law presumes the Act did not intend to make any alteration; for, if the Parliament had had that design, they would have expressed it in the Act." (See Bacon's Abridg. 9 Vol. 244, Rules to be observed in the construction of a Statute, 4; and Viner's Abridg. 19 Vol. 512, Construction of Statutes, 12, and authorities there cited.)

Having in view, then, the doctrine of the law as it existed previous to the adoption of the statute, and the reason of it, and regarding the statute as merely declaratory of that doctrine, we are necessarily led to the conclusion that it was never intended to exclude entirely the introduction of confessions, but only, as the statute in terms purports, that upon them the decree shall not be granted; and that to them, when freed from the presumptions of collusion, and sustained by circumstances, the Court may justly look as evidence of greater or less weight, according to the special character of the case. The question, as justly stated by the counsel for the Appellant, is this: "Would the entire testimony, confessions, and circumstances, lead the guarded discretion of a reasonable and just man to the conclusion."

The circumstances under which the confession was made by the defendant exclude all presumptions of collusion. It was made with reluctance — Under great distress of mind, from sense of shame, and the humiliation of her position — to her own brother — and fully exonerates the plaintiff, and names the seducer of her virtue, and the time and place of her seduction. Previous to this the plaintiff had, on repeated occasions, informed the brother, that he should return the defendant to his house, and it would appear that some words of anger had passed between them on the subject; the brother attributing, at first, to the plaintiff the dishonor of his sister, and distrusting his declarations to the contrary. Upon hearing the confession he became satisfied, and immediately arranged with the plaintiff for the removal of the defendant from her residence, in the hotel, to his house, but, upon conversation with defendant, she herself concluded it best not to go until the following morning, it being at the time late at night. On the following morning, in pursuance of the arrangement of the previous night, she was removed to the house of her brother. From this time, all association between the parties appears to have ended.

The pretense that the confession was made through fear, does not merit consideration. That it was made, as we have stated, under great distress of mind, is true; but no retraction of it, or denial of its truth, on her removal the following day, or subsequently, appears ever to have been made. The brother, who was acting under the most painful circumstances, and was deeply affected by them, and who had previously refused to allow the removal of the defendant to his house, upon the belief that she had been the victim of the plaintiff's solicitations, accepted the confession as true, and acted upon it. The brother and mother were examined as witnesses in the cause, and not a word impeaching the truth of the confession is stated to have ever been uttered by the defendant, nor do they themselves attempt to impeach it. That it was without collusion is evident, and that it is true, hardly admits of a doubt. The conduct of the plaintiff corroborates it. Previous to the birth of the child, the parties had lived in affectionate harmony. Immediately upon this event, the plaintiff did all that a just and upright man could do to vindicate himself—to relieve himself from the burden of a dishonored wife, and her child of bastard blood. He repudiated them both—and so soon as the health of the defendant would permit, after consultation with her physician and her brother, restored her to her family. Had the parties had illicit intercourse previous to marriage, the possibility of issue must have often occurred to them, and it is highly improbable that so sudden a revulsion of feeling to his wife would have happened upon its appearance. The instinct of paternity—one of the strongest in our nature—would have strengthened rather than weakened the previous attachment to his wife upon the birth of the child.

The conduct of the defendant corroborates the confession. We have already referred to the want of any subsequent retraction or denial of its truth. The answer to the present suit, filed about six weeks subsequently, is itself an admission, and constitutes a circumstance worthy of consideration. It is under oath, and in answer to the charge in the complaint, that she was with child at the date of the marriage, by a stranger, it avers that if she was then with child she had no knowledge of it, and it was the result of an act to which she never consented, and had no knowledge of it at the time of its commission, nor until after her marriage with the plaintiff, and that the same was committed while she was in a state of unconsciousness. There is no direct averment that the plaintiff was the father of such child, or any direct denial that it was begotten by a stranger. The controlling fact in issue is evaded in the answer, and this evasion, in a solemn judicial proceeding, is a most significant circumstance.

Baker v. Baker.

The conduct of the relatives of the defendant corroborates the confession. They have recognized it as justifying the repudiation and separation. These several circumstances, taken in connection with the conceded fact, that the child was begotten out of wedlock, furnish, in their collective force, sufficient corroboration of the confession to justify the conclusion that the child was the offspring of a stranger. In the cases cited by Bishop, the corroborating circumstances held sufficient, were less satisfactory than the circumstances in the case at bar.

In Harrison v. Harrison, (4 Moore P. C. 96,) the suit was for nullity of marriage on the allegation of the husband's impotence, and in giving judgment in the Court of Privy Council for the divorce, confirmatory of the decision of the Consistory Court, and of the Court of Archers, Lord Brougham said: "It has been insisted by the counsel for the Appellant, that the confession of non-consummation is not sufficient to satisfy the one hundred and fifth canon, and that there must be some extrinsic proof and for that purpose proof by inspection is said to be essential. Their lordships give no opinion on this construction of the canon; for if adminicular proof is requisite, they think the circumstance of the Appellant's having taken a legal opinion of the validity of the marriage, which he admits in his answer, coupled with the confession of non-consummation, and the refusal, in the first instance, to undergo inspection, is sufficient extrinsic proof; and being satisfied that there is no collusion between the parties, they affirm the decree of nullity." "In Noverre v. Noverre, (1 Robert, 428,) the evidence, aside from the defendant wife's confession, went no further than to show extreme, but no indecent familiarities with the alleged paramour, together with ample opportunities. In Tucker v. Tucker, (11 Jur. 893,) there were no acts of familiarity proved, but there was the reception of a letter from the paramour to the wife, which she had not read and could not know the contents of, and a meeting, not at all shown to be criminal, between her and him, after she was turned off by her husband; yet this was held amply sufficient to sustain the confessions." (Cited from a note to Sec. 310 in Bishop.)

Baker v. Baker.

Against the conclusion from the evidence of the confession, and the corroborating circumstances, the counsel of the Respondent urges the presumption of paternity in the plaintiff from the fact of marriage. There is no doubt that such is the presumption of the law. A child born in lawful wedlock is presumed to be the child of the husband. This has been held in numerous cases. (See Stigall et al. v. Stigall, 2 Brock. 261; The State v. Herman, 13 Ired. 502; The King v. Luffe, 8 East, 191.) The marriage is regarded as an acknowledgment by the husband that the child is his, but as in all cases of acknowledgment, to be effective, there must be knowledge at the time of the fact admitted. The case of The King v. Luffe, (8 East, 210,) cited by the Respondent, arose upon a question of bastardy, but in the opinion of Mr. Justice Lawrence, the reason of the presumption in cases of ante-nuptial pregnancy, is stated. "By the civil law," says the Justice, "if the parents married any time before the birth of the child, it was legitimate; and our law so far adopts the same rule, that if a man marry a woman who is with child, it raises a presumption that it is his own. Lord Rolle gives some such reason for the rule, and it seems to be founded in good sense; for where a man marries a woman whom he knows to be in this situation, he may be considered as acknowledging, by a most solemn act, that the child is his." The knowledge of the situation of the party constitutes the ground of the presumption.

In Wright, Administrator v. Hicks, (15 Ga. 160,) the doctrine of presumptive paternity in a case of ante-nuptial pregnancy was considered, and the decision of the Court bears directly upon the question before us. In that case the wife was with child at the time of the marriage, and immediately upon her pregnancy being discovered, the husband returned her to her family. In the settlement of the estate, the question of the child's right of inheritance arose. Mr. Justice Lumpkin delivered the opinion of the Court, and after referring to the able and thorough discussion had in the case, on a previous occasion, said: "The importance, as well as the novelty of the question, led us to devote to it as large a portion of our time as we could possibly spare

Baker v. Baker.

---

We cannot assume that he detected her pregnancy, and if he had reason to suspect it, that he must have done so at so early a period after marriage as to have referred it to ante-nuptial incontinence. To one, who we must believe from the evidence, possessed a strong affection for his wife, the suspicion of a want of chastity would never arise. Affection will give every excuse for appearances, except that of dishonor. As against the weight of the evidence from the confession and corroborating circumstances, the suggestion is without force.

The remaining question relates to the sufficiency of the cause assigned as a ground of divorce. Our statute provides that a divorce may be granted "when the consent of either of the parties to the marriage was obtained by force or fraud, upon the application of the injured party." (Act of April, 1853.) Marriage is considered by our law as a civil contract, to which the consent of the parties is essential, (Act concerning Marriages, Sec. 1,) and is subject to avoidance for material and substantive fraud in its procurement. Reeve, in his treatise on the domestic relations, says on this subject: "A man by the foulest fraud, gets possession of the property of his neighbor. A contract thus basely obtained is not only void, but, in many instances, the obtaining of it is a felony. The common sense of mankind must revolt at the idea that, when a man, by the same abominable fraud, has obtained the person of an amiable woman and her property, the law should protect such contract, and give it the same efficacy as if fairly procured. The truth is, that a contract which is obtained by fraud, is, in point of law, no contract. The fraud blots out of existence whatever semblance of a contract there might have been. A marriage procured without a contract, can never be deemed valid. There is no more reason for sanctioning a marriage procured by fraud than one procured by force and violence. The consent is as totally wanting, in view of the law, in the former as in the latter case. The true point of light in which this ought to be viewed, I apprehend, is, that the marriage was void, ab initio; but it is necessary to have a divorce by the Court, since the marriage has been celebrated, that all concerned may be apprised that such marriage has no effect. Upon the same principle that chancery decrees contracts, unfairly obtained, void, all the apprehension that is created in the minds of conscientious men, of the illegality of separating husband and wife, is dissipated." (Cited from Bishop on Marriage and Divorce, Sec. 104, Note 1.)

Baker v. Baker.

---

It cannot be pretended that the condition of the defendant was not a most material circumstance to the consent required for the validity of the contract. Its concealment operated as a fraud upon the plaintiff of the gravest character. His contract was with and for her; it referred to no other person, much less included a child of bastard blood. A child imposes burdens and possesses rights. It would necessarily become a charge upon the defendant, and through her upon the plaintiff. It would become presumptive heir of his estate, and entitled under our law, as against his testamentary disposition, to an interest in his property acquired after marriage, to the deprivation of any legitimate offspring. The assumption of such burdens, and the yielding of such rights, cannot be inferred in the absence of proof of actual knowledge of her condition on his part. Again, the first purpose of matrimony, by the laws of nature and society, is procreation. A woman, to be marriageable, must, at the time, be able to bear children to her husband, and a representation to this effect is implied in the very nature of the contract. A woman who has been pregnant over four months by a stranger, is not at the time in a condition to bear children to her husband, and the representation in this instance was false and fraudulent. The second purpose of matrimony is the promotion of the happiness of the parties by the society of each other, and to its existence, with a man of honor, the purity of the wife is essential. Its absence under such circumstances as necessarily to attract attention must not only tend directly to the destruction of his happiness, but to entail humiliation and degradation upon himself and family. We can conceive no torture more terrible to a right-minded and upright man than an union with a woman whose person has been defiled by a stranger, and the living witness of whose defilement he is legally compelled to recognize as his own offspring, as the bearer of his name and the heir of his estate, and that, too, with the silent, if not expressed, contempt of the community. By no principle of law or justice can any man be held to this humiliating and degrading position, except upon clear proof that he has voluntarily and deliberately subjected himself to it.

Baker v. Baker.

In Morris v. Morris, (Wright's Rep. 630,) there was pregnancy and concealment, but there were no affirmative acts on the part of the wife to conceal her situation, except in the wearing a full Quaker dress at the ceremony of the marriage, which took place in the dusk of the evening, without lights. From the 4th of July to the marriage, on the 17th of October following, the husband was unremitting in his attentions to her. No representations were proved, and "the husband and wife lived together, without his suspicions being awakened, until the wife was taken in labor pains, and presented her wondering spouse a full-grown child, before the expiration of the honeymoon, after which they separated." A divorce was decreed, and the child given to the mother.

In Ritter v. Ritter, (5 Black. 84,) the defendant was pregnant by a stranger at the date of the marriage. The petitioner discovered her situation the night of the marriage, of which he had no previous knowledge or suspicion. Upon discovering the pregnancy, he abandoned her. It does not appear that the defendant herself made any efforts to conceal her situation, though it was alleged that the true father fraudulently and clandestinely assisted in effecting the marriage. The Circuit Court refused the divorce and dismissed the bill, but the Supreme Court reversed the decision, using in its opinion this language:

"However little we may feel disposed, in general, to disturb the decisions of the Circuit Courts, respecting divorces for causes not specified by the statute, we cannot contemplate the case presented by the record without coming to the conclusion that, in refusing the divorce, the Court, did not exercise its discretion in a sound and legal manner, having due regard to the rights of the injured party, and the purity of public morals."

The principal case upon which the respondent relies, is that of Scroggins v. Scroggins, (3 Dev. 535). The opinion delivered in that case contains general observations which, if admitted as law, would sustain the defense; but the special ground upon which the decision rests does not militate against the views we have expressed. The point decided is, that where the husband at the marriage knows that his intended wife is lewd, he is not entitled to a divorce upon the subsequent birth of a child begotten previously. There was no statute in North Carolina similar to ours, authorizing a divorce when the consent to the marriage had been obtained by fraud. The statute of that State authorized a divorce only in two cases — impotency at the time of the marriage and still continuing, and separation by one party from the other and living in a state of adultery. For other cases, the Superior Courts were empowered to divorce whenever they were satisfied of the justice of the application. In the case in question the wife gave birth to a mulatto child about five months after the marriage, and upon that event the husband left her. But the Court says:

Baker v. Baker.

---

“He does not venture to swear that he believed her chaste at the time of the marriage. It must be taken that he did not; if he had, it would have been the first thing thought of, to aggravate his case. Suppose that we are to presume that he means to admit a criminal conversation between themselves — and that is the most favorable to him — what claims has he to relief, upon the ground of grosser incontinence, than that in which he had participated?” And, again:

“His disgrace is voluntarily incurred, and he has no elevation of sentiment or feeling above it. We think him criminally accessory to his own dishonor, in marrying a woman whom he knew to be lewd; or, by continuing his cohabitation, after he must have known it, up to the happening of an event by which the world acquired the same knowledge. He now asks to be freed from his bonds, because the infamy of his wife has become notorious, though he could reconcile himself, in secret, to the crime which makes her infamous. Such a prayer must be rejected, and the judgment of the Superior Court affirmed.”

The Judge who delivered the opinion appears, from his general observations, to have considered that concealment of pregnancy was not such a fraud as would vitiate the marriage contract; and the ground upon which he rested his conclusion was the supposed difficulty of limiting the principle contended for. “If it embrace,” he says, “a case of pregnancy, it will next claim that of incontinence; it will be said the husband was well acquainted with the female, and never suspected her, and has been deceived; then, that he was a stranger to her, smitten at first sight, and drawn, on the sudden, into a marriage with a prostitute; that he was young and inexperienced, hurried on by impetuous passion, or that he was in his dotage, and advantage taken of the lusts of his imagination, which were stronger than his understanding. From uncleanness, it may descend to the minor faults of temper, idleness, sluttishness, extravagance, coldness, or even to fortune inadequate to representations, or perhaps, expectations."

Baker v. Baker.

We do not perceive the difficulty which the learned Judge appears, from the passage cited, to have experienced, in limiting the application of the principle. There is a marked distinction between the ante-nuptial incontinence and the vices and faults he enumerates, and ante-nuptial pregnancy by a stranger. The former do not impose upon the husband the burden of another's child, while the latter does; they do not give him an heir by a stranger; they do not necessarily render the wife, at the time of marriage, incapable of bearing children to her husband, while the latter does; they may be concealed, and much of the humiliation attendant upon the birth of the child, and the consequent change in the relations of the parties to the community be avoided. The former are deemed insufficient for a divorce, on grave grounds of public policy, which can have no existence with reference to the latter. To use the language of the counsel of the Appellant, the line of whose argument we have mainly followed in this question, "no good purpose can be subserved by charging upon a man, as his own, a child of bastard blood, or by coercing a legal union between an upright man and a corrupted woman, where there can be no union, in fact, and where the mandate of the law would be a vain record, except so far as it would be an instrument of undeserved and perpetual torture."

We are of opinion that the fraud alleged in the present case goes to the substance of the marriage contract, and vitiates it ab initio; and, as a consequence, that the judgment of the Court below must be reversed, and that Court directed to enter a decree annulling the marriage contract between the parties.

Ordered accordingly.

SMITH v. BRANNAN et als.

- A JURY being waived, it is immaterial whether an action under Section 254 of the Practice Act, is an equitable or a legal proceeding.
- An executory agreement between a landlord and tenant, that, after the title to the premises is settled, by a suit to be prosecuted by the former against third persons, the tenant may purchase, does not destroy the relation of landlord and tenant.
- To maintain a suit to quiet title, by a party in possession, it is enough that he claims under a deed which creates an equitable estate, or even a right of possession.
- A deed, recorded January 30th, 1850, by a person acting as Recorder, by virtue of an election by the people, without authority of law, is not properly recorded.
- To make the copy of an unrecorded deed evidence, the loss of the original being shown, the testimony of the subscribing witnesses to the deed, if such there be, should be had, at least to the fact of the execution of the paper, unless they are shown to be without the jurisdiction of the Court.
- To admit evidence of notice of a prior unrecorded deed, to defeat a subsequent deed, there must first be proof of the prior deed. There can be no notice where there is no title.
- Whether the conditions of a deed are complied with or not, is matter between the grantor and grantee, with which third persons have nothing to do.
- The fact that the record is erroneous in stating that the parties waived a jury, cannot be shown by an affidavit of the Judge who tried the cause.
- It would seem that a party cannot try his cause before a Judge without objection, and, after losing it, complain that the case was not tried by a jury.

APPEAL from the Tenth District.

The complaint avers title and possession in plaintiff, the title being derived from John A. Sutter, who claims under a Mexican grant; that the defendants wrongfully claim an estate and interest in the above described real property, adverse to this plaintiff and his title thereto, and found the same, as the plaintiff is informed and believes to be true, upon a certain pretended conveyance which they allege was executed by the said John A. Sutter, on the twenty-seventh day of July, A. D. 1849, to, etc. which said last-named conveyance has never been recorded, and does not now appear of record in the records of Sutter County; and this plaintiff further avers that he purchased in good faith, and for a valuable consideration, and without notice of the estate or interest claimed and set up by the said defendants to the same, and without notice of the execution of the said pretended conveyance, etc.; that said pretended conveyance was without consideration, and upon conditions never performed by the grantees, and was null and void; that defendants' claim to an interest in the property clouds the title of plaintiff and depreciates the value of his estate and interest therein. Complainant prayed that the claim and interest of defendants in the property be "de-terminated and ended," that their claim be barred; that the conveyance from Sutter to them be decreed null and void, and they forever enjoined from asserting any right or claim to the premises. Brannan, alone, answered, denying generally, these allegations, and setting up title from Sutter, as aforesaid.

---

The conditions of the deed from Sutter to Robinson and others in July, 1850, were: 1st. That the grantees should sustain the labor and expense of litigating the right of the grantor to the premises. 2d. Pay to him (Sutter) one-sixth of the proceeds as parcels of the land were sold from time to time; and, 3d. Convey to the wife of Sutter Hock Farm.

In the two deeds from Robinson, McDougall, Mesick & Gillespie, to McCorkle, the condition is, that the sum of six thousand dollars in one case, and ten dollars per acre in the other, shall be paid by the grantee to the grantors so soon as they "shall become clearly possessed of a good and perfect title to the premises hereby conveyed, and shall execute and deliver a good and sufficient deed in fee-simple thereto, free of all incumbrances to the said grantee or his legal representatives." A perfect title was stipulated to mean final confirmation of the Sutter grant.

The statement on new trial and on appeal, as also the findings of the Court, stated "that the cause was tried by the Court, a jury having been waived by the parties."

In the transcript appears an affidavit by the Judge who tried the case that this statement, that the parties waived a jury, is erroneous and was a mistake of his own, and that he promised to strike it out.

Winans, for Appellant.

I. The complaint does not set forth facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action.

It is a bill in equity seeking to remove an alleged cloud from plaintiff's title, created by a deed held by the defendants for the premises in controversy, and asking cancellation of such deed. This is the whole ground of equitable jurisdiction set forth in the bill, yet it charges that defendants' deed, which is averred to be a cloud on plaintiff's title and sought to be canceled, was given to defendants fraudulently, without consideration, was never recorded, and that plaintiff obtained title to the premises by deed, legally, in good faith, and without notice or knowledge of defendants' deed. If this be so, plaintiff's bill must fail, for there is no cloud on his title to remove. It is true that he refers to Section 254 of the Practice Act, and contends that thereunder he can maintain his bill to determine defendants' adverse claim. But we insist that he cannot. 1st. Because plaintiff's complaint was not framed under said section and does not seek to determine defendants' adverse estate, but on the contrary is an equitable bill, praying cancellation of defendants' deed, on the ground that it is a cloud on defendants' title; and, 2d. Because said Section 254, while giving a party in possession the right to have an adverse claim decided by action, leaves the character of such action to be determined by the circumstances of the case.

---

Plaintiff assumes that Section 254 gives only equitable jurisdiction, and cites the case of Merced Mining Company v. Fremont, (7 Cal. 319,) where equitable jurisdiction was asserted, plaintiff having possession.

In that case, equitable jurisdiction was properly asserted, because plaintiff sought for, was entitled to, and obtained, an injunction. On the contrary, the case of Salmon v. Hoffman, (2 Cal. 128,) was a common law action, brought by a party in possession.

The Court of Chancery has no jurisdiction where the party has an adequate remedy at law. (Bitchie v. Dorland, 6 Cal. 33; O'Connor v. Corbett, 3 Cal. 370; Bird v. Hollabard, 2 Root, 35; Poage v. Wilson, 2 Leigh, 490; Batchelder v. Elliott, 1 Hen. & M. 10; Carroway v. Wallace, 2 Ala. 542; Walker v. Smith, 8 Yerger, 239; Hall v. Davis, 5 J. J. Marsh. 290; Combes v. Warren, 17 Maine, 404, et passim; 2 Cal. 469; 6 Id. 273; 8 Id. 384; 4 Id. 6.)

Furthermore, defendants' deed having no indorsement of registry upon it, and plaintiff having had no notice thereof, and it being, therefore, void as against plaintiff, and so appearing to be on its face, its illegality is cognizable at common law, and equity cannot interfere. (See Simpson v. Lord Howden, 3 Mylne & Craig, 103, 104, and cases there cited; Gray v. Mathias, 5 Vesey, Jr. 294; Coleman v. Sorrel, 1 Vesey, Jr. 50.) Defendants' deed is no cloud upon his title. (Statute of Conveyances, Art.

363, Wood's Digest, 103.) See, also, Wiggins v. Mayor, "A proceeding which upon its face is not only illegal, but absolutely void, does not constitute a cloud upon the title to real estate against which a Court of Equity will relieve." (9 Paige, 17, and Note 1, 23, 24, where the whole doctrine is clearly set forth; Hickman v. Cook, 3 Humph. 640; Carrol v. Safford, 3 Howard, 441.) Daniel v. Morrison's Ex'r (6 Dana, 186,) where the Court says (Robertson, Chief Justice): "The Trustee having a legal right to the property, there was no ground for going into a Court of Equity, and therefore the Court had no jurisdiction." (Van Doren v. Mayor, 9 Paige, 388.) See, also, Carrington v. Otis, (4 Grattan, 235-255,) — a very important case.

II. The evidence is insufficient to establish a cause of action. It shows no title in plaintiff. To sustain jurisdiction in equity, on a bill to quiet title, there must be clear evidence of title. (Trustees of Louisville v. Gray, 1 Littell, 147, 148; Norton v. Beaver, 5 Hammond, 178; Bank of the United States v. Shults, 2 Ohio, 495; Tenham v. Herbert, 2 Atkyna, 483.)

III. The two deeds from Robinson, McDougall, Mesick, and Gillespie, as grantors, to plaintiff's grantor, McCorkle, were conveyances on condition precedent, and did not take effect in presenti. Under them McCorkle could and did acquire no title.

1. Because the condition has never been complied with or performed.

2. Because under the Sutter deed to them, which was duly recorded, and of which, therefore, McCorkle had notice, they had no right to make a conditional conveyance.

Precedent conditions must be literally performed, and even a Court of Chancery, will never vest an estate, when by reason of a condition precedent, it will not vest in law. It cannot relieve from the consequences of a condition precedent unperformed. (4 Kent's Commentaries, 125; Popham v. Ramfield, 1 Vernon, 83; Harvey v. Aston, 1 Atkins, 361; Reynish v. Martin, 3 Atkins, 330; Scott v. Tyler, 2d Brown's Chancery, 431; Stackpole v. Beaumont, 3 Vesey, 89; Wells v. Smith, 2 Edward's Chancery, 84.)

IV. There was no possession in plaintiff sufficient to sustain the action. The only evidence of possession is a written so-

---

Smith v. Brannan et al.

---

knowledge, made by one Stevens, of tenancy to plaintiff, and a contract executed by plaintiff to him of even date therewith. These documents exhibit an equitable combination and arrangement between Stevens and plaintiff, to enable the latter to bring this action in an equitable, rather than a legal forum; and do not constitute such possession as is requisite in a suit to quiet title. (Trustees of Louisville v. Gray, 1 Littell, 148; Bitchie v. Dorland, 6 Cal. 36-38.)

Reardan, for Respondent.

I. This is an action under Section 254 of the Practice Act, and is warranted by Merced Mining Company v. Fremont, (7 Cal. 317.) But, if regarded as a bill in equity to remove cloud of title, it is good on the facts of the case.

The plaintiff alleges title and possession, and that defendants are making claim to the premises. The defendant, Brannan, denies plaintiff's possession, but admits that he is making claim to the property, and sets out his title, "and avers that his said title was duly recorded prior to the date of the pretended title of the said complainant."

This plea indirectly, if not directly, admits the plaintiff's title, which it seeks to avoid.

The possession of Smith having been fully proven, and the fact of defendants making claim being admitted, the only question remaining to be determined is, has the defendant shown "title from John A. Sutter, on July 27th, 1849," and that "such title was duly recorded prior to the date of the title of the complainant."

So that the question as to whether or not the evidence is sufficient to establish title in plaintiff, does not arise in this case.

The grant from McDougall and others to McCorkle was absolute and unconditional, and the title vested in McCorkle upon delivery of the deed. That which is sought to be construed into a condition precedent, is nothing more nor less than a covenant for further assurance. (1 Coke R. 617; 1 Leving, 155; 3 Tomlin, 255.)

II. The evidence shows possession in the plaintiff, through his tenant, Stevens. The defendant did not prove the execution of any deed from Sutter to him. (6 Cal. 112.) His deed was neither acknowledged nor recorded, and the copy was properly rejected, because neither the execution nor the loss of the original was shown. (1 Greenl. Ev. 664, 655; 2 Cal. 30, 31.)

Smith v. Brannan et al.

---

Again: Mesick, the grantor of plaintiff, being a subsequent purchaser in good faith from Sutter, without notice of defendant's deed, had an indefeasible estate, and his title passed to plaintiff free. (Lacy v. Wilson, 4 Munf. 313.)

J. A. McDougall, for Respondent, argued: 1st. That the action was good under the 254th Section of the Practice Act. 2d. Brannan, though averring title, shows none, and hence can raise but the single question of the sufficiency of plaintiff's own case.

As to plaintiff's testimony being insufficient to justify a decree, because no title is shown in Sutter, the answer is, that both parties claim title under him as a common grantor.

The deed from Sutter to Robinson and others is not conditional, but contains covenants to the grantee. (Lord Cromwell's Case, 1 Coke Rep. by Thomas, 617; Clapham v. Moyle, 1 Levins, 155.) At all events, the conditions (if such they are) are conditions subsequent, involving, perhaps, questions between grantor and grantee.

As to the right of Sutter's grantees to make a conditional conveyance, the full answer is, that Sutter granted the legal estate, and that McCorkle was regularly invested with it. With the several covenants contained in the several grants, the estate has nothing to do. A question is made as to the technical right of Smith to institute the suit, he not being in possession, except by his tenant, and there being an agreement between the tenant and himself providing for the future disposition of the property.

We say, that with this arrangement between Stevens and Smith, Brannan has nothing to do. In this case he has not and cannot have any — the most remote interest. If a man contracts to be a tenant, nothing short of a prohibitory law can ignore his status. If a man contracts for the rights of a landlord, nothing short of the force of express law can impair his rights. The old maxim, that consent may overcome the law, would govern in all cases of this kind. A man may agree to be either landlord or tenant, as it is in violation of neither positive law or policy.

Smith v. Brannan et al.

The notice of Brannan's title was ruled out.

We say, there was no foundation for the testimony. There was no proof of any title, legal or equitable, in Brannan. Before the point of notice can be raised, something must be established of which one should have notice. That such a thing as a grant under which Brannan claimed ever existed, was not shown to the Court. The execution of any such instrument was neither proved nor attempted.

The copy of the deed, as set up by Brannan, appears page 48. There is no proof whatever as to it. The copy was made by a person without color of office. His copy was no record; and whether or not it was the copy of a genuine original, does not appear.

BALDWIN, J. delivered the opinion of the Court — TERRY, C. J. concurring.

Suit brought to quiet title to two hundred acres of land.

The plaintiff avers himself to be in possession, and charges that the defendants claim title to the premises.

Brannan answered, setting up title from Sutter, older in date than the title through which plaintiff claims — the source of both titles being the same.

The Court tried the case — a jury being waived.

The plaintiff deduced a regular chain of title from Sutter — the common grantor — to himself, and proved himself in possession, through one Stevens, his tenant. Brannan failed to show title of any sort.

The Practice Act, (Section 254,) provides that "an action may be brought by any person in possession, by himself or his tenant, of real property, against any person who claims an estate or interest therein adverse to him, for the purpose of determining such adverse claim, estate, or interest."

It matters not whether the action under this section was intended to be an equitable or legal proceeding, as a jury was waived.

As Brannan offered no legal proof of title, it is hard to see what errors, to his prejudice, could have intervened, after the plaintiff had shown title prima facie in himself, possession by his tenant, and a claim by the defendant.

Smith v. Brannan et al.

---

Many technical points are made; but the great pressure of business will not enable us to notice them all in this opinion, as they are mostly technical exceptions, involving no new principles.

We will glance at some of the most prominent:

1. The fact that an executory agreement was made between the plaintiff and the tenant, that after the title was settled, the tenant might purchase — but that the plaintiff should go on and prosecute the suit for such settlement — did not destroy the relation of landlord and tenant between them.

2. The deeds from Robinson, McDougall, Mesick, and Gillespie, to McCorkle, were not on condition precedent. There is no definition of a condition precedent which embraces a paper containing words of sale in presenti, and then providing for the payment of the purchase money on subsequent condition. The vesting of the title is not made to depend upon any future acts or facts. The provision in the conveyance for a future deed does not affect this view. There was a bargain and sale, or an agreement of bargain and sale, on a good consideration, and the covenant for further assurance does not alter the nature of the transaction. It is enough, perhaps, to maintain this action, that the deed created an equitable estate, or even a right of possession, which it certainly did.

But these deeds are clearly not deeds on condition precedent. The grantor bargains and sells all his right, title, and interest, in the premises to the grantee; the deed then provides for the payment of the purchase money — the payment is conditional on the confirmation of the title by the Federal authorities, and then a deed is to be executed; the parties probably supposing a deed necessary after a patent to vest the title passed by the Government. This last deed is only a further assurance, but there is nothing in the deed to show that no title was to vest until after payment. On the contrary, the language is express that the property, or the grantor's right, title, and interest, had been sold.

This deed is widely different from that in Mesick and Brannan; for there, no words of grant applied to the premises in dispute, but only a covenant to convey the grantor's property, or that title should vest, on punctual payment of the purchase money; and if not so paid, the deed to be void.

3. The deed from Sutter to Brannan was not properly recorded. It is scarcely pretended that it was—the officer having no authority for that purpose. Nor was the deed proven. It seems, from the copy produced, that there were subscribing witnesses to the deed. They were not called. The original itself was not produced. Brannan testifies to its loss; but if his testimony was sufficient to let in secondary evidence for the contents—which is by no means clear—the record fails to show any legal evidence of the contents of the deed. The subscribing witnesses were not shown to be without the jurisdiction of the Court, and their testimony should have been had at least to the fact of the execution of the paper. The paper being the only evidence of the title of the defendant, was, therefore, properly excluded. This left the defendant without any proof of the case made by his answer. Under this state of facts, it is unnecessary to consider any question of notice. There should be no notice when there was no title. The defendant was bound to show a prior deed and notice, in order to defeat the subsequent deed. The notice itself amounted to nothing without proof of title.

4. Several points are made as to the authority of Robinson and others, grantees of Sutter, under the deed of July, 1850, to convey the lands granted. But this question cannot arise in this controversy. Whether the conditions of the deed were or were not complied with, is a matter between Sutter and the grantees, and the defendant had no concern with it. If Sutter does not complain of the disposition made of the legal title by his grantees, third persons cannot.

5. There appears an affidavit of the late Judge of the Tenth District, to the fact that the record is erroneous in stating that the parties waived a jury. We cannot amend a record by an affidavit. But if we disregard this point it by no means follows that a party can go on and try his case before a Judge without objection, and after he has lost it complain that the case was not tried by a jury.

We do not, however, think the Appellant's point well taken, that this is not a good bill in equity. We think it clear that it is.

Many points are taken by the ingenious counsel which it is not deemed necessary to notice; for these main questions being decided, the other points become immaterial, for, on the whole case presented, the decree, resting on a few simple propositions, viz: title and possession in plaintiff, and claim without title by defendants, must be affirmed. Minor errors in the rulings of the Court, and the admission or rejection of evidence when the whole case is before the Court, and we can see that no error that ought to change the result intervenes, are not noticed by us. There is no substantial error in the form of the decree declaring the deed of the defendant void as against plaintiff; for the more strictly proper language, viz: pretended title or claim set up, would have the same effect in establishing the plaintiff's and denying the defendant's pretensions.

The decree of the Court below is affirmed.

(See Curtis, Administrator v. Sutter, January Term, 1860.)

PIERCE v. ROBINSON, ADM'R OF THE ESTATE OF FRIERSON, DECEASED.

A MORTGAGEE of land in possession must account for rents and profits; and after payment of the debt for which the mortgage was given, he becomes, by operation of law, Trustee of the surplus for the mortgagor.

Where it was agreed between the mortgagor and mortgagee that the land and its proceeds were to be held, not only as security for the debt due the latter, but for debts due third persons, laborers on the land for instance: Held, that such agreement was an appropriation of said surplus for the benefit of said third persons, not revocable when they have acted on the faith of it, and the mortgagee is a Trustee of the same for said third persons.

Such an agreement operates as an equitable assignment of the surplus so soon as any exists, which does not pass to the Administrator of the mortgagee as general assets for the benefit of creditors at large, but is subject, in his hands, to the same trust which attached to it before the decease of the testator.

Equity upholds assignments, not only of choses in action, but of contingent interests and expectations, and of things which have no present actual existence, but rest in possibility, provided they are fairly made, and are not against public policy; and an agreement for such interests will take effect as such assignment when the subjects to which they refer have ceased to rest in possibility and have ripened into reality.

Parol evidence is admissible in equity to show that a deed, absolute on its face, was intended as a mortgage.

Such evidence is not restricted to cases of fraud, accident, or mistake, in the creation of the instrument.

Evidence of the circumstances under which the deed was made and of the relations existing between the parties is admitted, not to contradict or vary the deed, but to establish an equity superior to its terms.

The rule which refuses the admission of parol evidence to contradict or vary written instruments is directed to the language employed by the parties, and does not exclude an inquiry into the objects and purposes of the parties in executing the instruments.

 Fraud in the use of an instrument is as much a ground for the interposition of equity as fraud in its creation.
Lec v. Ebone, (8 Cal. 424,) overruled, so far as it rejects parol evidence.

APPEAL from the Sixth District.

The case is stated in the opinion of the Court. Defendant had judgment. Plaintiff appeals.

Winans, for Appellant.

I. The evidence establishes the creation of an express trust for the payment of plaintiff's debt out of a particular fund, received and held by Frierson, as Trustee, for such purpose. That particular fund is shown to be now held by defendant, as Frierson's Administrator. Plaintiff has a lien thereon for his debt.

II. The facts found by the Court below are correct, so far as they extend, but omit the material and controlling fact that the property conveyed to Frierson was per se a trust fund for the security and payment of the debt to plaintiff.

III. Even if the property had been placed in Frierson's hands merely as a security to him for assuming the payment of plaintiff's debts, the doctrine is well settled that where a fund is placed in the hands of a surety to indemnify him for assuming a debt of his principal, the creditor, whose debt he undertakes to pay, has a lien for his debt upon such fund. (Maure v. Harrison, 1 Equity Cases Abr.; Ex Parte Perfect, Montague's Bankrupt Reports, 25; Ex Parte Waring, 19 Vesey, 345; Wright v. Morley, 11 Id. 22; Parsons v. Briddock, 2 Vernon, 608; Ourtis v. Tyler, 9 Paige, 435; Ohio Life Insurance Company v. Ledyard, 8 Ala. 866; United States v. Sturges, 1 Paine, 525.)

IV. Property held in trust does not pass to the representatives of the Trustee; but as long as it can be traced and distinguished it inures to the benefit of cestui que trust. And where an assignment, though absolute upon its face, was intended by the parties to be a security to a party who dies intestate for assuming another's debt, the creditor in an action against the Administrator can enforce his lien against such security. (Moss v. Murgatroyd, 1 Johnson's Chancery Rep. 119-129. See, also,

Pierce v. Robinson.

Nelson v. Blight, 1 Johnson's Cases, 205; Clark v. Morgan, 3 Paige, 373; Malcolm v. Scott, 3 Hare, 46; Eng. Ch. Rep. vol. 25, p. 45, and American cases there cited; Kipp v. The Bank of New York, 10 Johns. 62; Hendricks v. Robinson, 2 Johnson's Ch. 283, F. See, also Hoyt v. Story, 3 Barbour, 262; Ten Eyck v. Holmes, 3 Sandford's Ch. 428; Tannersley v. Anderson, 4 Desau. 44; Rogers v. Hossack's Executors, 18 Wendell, 334; Burn v. Carvalho, 4 Mylne & Craig, 690; Ten Eyck v. Holmes, 3 Sandford's Ch. 429.)

V. The exception of defendant to the oral evidence of the witnesses on the ground that parol testimony was inadmissible to vary the written contract of the parties, was not well taken; and the evidence, that the deed and bill of sale, though absolute in terms, were given in trust or as a mortgage for the plaintiff's benefit, was properly admitted.

I. Parol evidence is admissible in equity to show that a deed or assignment, absolute upon its face, was intended as a mortgage or trust deed.

2. Even if such doctrine were not correct as a general proposition, yet still it is clearly so under the circumstances of this case. (Moses v. Murgatroyd, 1 Johnson's Ch. 228; Slee v. Manhattan Co. 1 Paige, 53; Whiting v. Heslop, 4 Cal. 327.)

Clark & Gass, for Respondent.

The first point presented by this record is, whether parol evidence was admissible to vary a written instrument, there being no allegation of fraud, accident, or mistake, in its execution, or in the use attempted to be made of it.

The Court held that parol evidence was not admissible without such allegation. But if parol evidence was admissible, still upon the case as made out, the judgment of the Court below was correct.

The Court finds that Frierson was not in any sense the surety of Hutchinson & Green. The draft accepted by him made the debt his own, and H. & G. were discharged from it. Plaintiff cannot, therefore, avail himself of the doctrine that the creditor is entitled to the benefit of the securities placed by the principal debtor in the hands of his surety. The relation of principal and surety does not exist in the case, and even if it did, the true doctrine upon that subject, when applied to the facts of the case could not avail the plaintiffs. The true doctrine is laid down in Ex Parte Waring, (19 Vesey Ch. Rep. 345.)

Pierce v. Robinson.

The case of Moses v. Murgatroyd differs materially from the case at bar, in this: that there, Ogden appeared and claimed that the coffee should be so applied, while here, Hutchinson & Green have settled with the Administrator, and received back into their possession the property against which the lien is attempted to be enforced. Even if Frierson held this property in trust, he made the contract in his own name, and is individually liable. See Conner v. Clark, (12 Cal. 168.)

To permit plaintiff to have a lien for the payment in full of his debt, would be a fraud upon the other creditors of the estate, and more particularly upon that portion of them, whose debts were contracted during the same period.

FIELD, J. delivered the opinion of the Court—BALDWIN, J. concurring.

In March, 1854, Hutchinson & Greene were the owners of a farm in Yolo County, and having become indebted in a large amount to Frierson, for advances of money to enable them to carry on their farming operations, executed to him a conveyance thereof, which though absolute in form, was intended only as security for the payment of their indebtedness. In September following, having become further indebted to Frierson, for advances, and being in debt to their laborers, they executed to him a conveyance of the personal property upon the farm, consisting principally of stock and farming utensils, and, at the same time, delivered possession of both farm and personal property. The second conveyance was made, and the possession of the property under both conveyances delivered, upon the express agreement that such property, and the proceeds of the real property, were to be held, not only as additional security for the indebtedness of the grantors to Frierson, but for their indebtedness to the laborers who had been employed on the farm, and the future wages of laborers which the grantee might himself subsequently employ thereon; and that for the existing indebtedness of the laborers, the grantee would accept the drafts of the grantors. The plaintiff was one of the laborers, for the payment of whose wages the agreement provided, and for the amount due to him a draft was drawn in his favor and accepted by Frierson. For the payment of the draft, and for his future labor, the plaintiff was unwilling to trust to the individual responsibility of Frierson, and thereupon Frierson, and the grantors, assured him that he was amply secured by the property; that it was held expressly for the security of the laborers, as well as for that of Frierson. Upon these assurances the plaintiff became satisfied, and subsequently acted upon their faith. Frierson died in February, 1855, and the defendant became the Administrator of his estate. The claim of the plaintiff was duly presented and allowed, and neither its amount or justice is questioned; but its payment out of the proceeds of the farm, in preference to the general creditors of the intestate, is contested. The proceeds arising from the sale of the crops of the farm are admitted to have been sufficient to satisfy the debt of Hutchinson & Greene to the intestate, and to cover the demand of the plaintiff. The former has been settled, and the property reconveyed to the grantors, under the sanction of the Probate Court; and the money for the latter remains in the hands of the defendant, to abide the determination of the present suit. The claims of the other laborers have been satisfied.

---

If the first conveyance is to be treated as a mortgage, then Frierson was liable after possession taken to account for the proceeds of the farm, and was chargeable for their net amount in the settlement of the debt for the security of which the conveyance was executed, and any surplus remaining was subject to the disposition of the mortgagors. (2 Story's Equity Juris. Sec. 1016.) For such surplus he was Trustee of the mortgagors, the trust arising from the very nature of the security by operation of law, and by the subsequent agreement of the parties the same became appropriated for the benefit of the laborers, including the plaintiff. Frierson thenceforth was Trustee of the surplus for them. It was not his property, to be disposed of as he might elect. Without the agreement, it would have been the property of the mortgagors, and held subject to their order; but, by the agreement, it became subject to the payment of the demands of the laborers, and, to that extent was theirs. The agreement was something more than a mere personal covenant of Hutchinson

Pierce v. Robinson.

---

& Greene, which they might at any time disregard, and make other disposition of the surplus. It was an actual appropriation, which they could not revoke, and which Frierson could not surrender, even upon the payment of his own debt, as upon his representations, as well as those of Hutchinson & Greene, that it was made and should be held for the benefit of the laborers, the plaintiff acted. In Yates v. Groves, (1 Vesey, Jr. 280,) Lord Thurlow held, that an order to pay a debt out of a particular fund belonging to the debtor, constituted an equitable assignment of the fund pro tanto, and gave a specific lien to the creditor; and in Ex Parte South, (3 Swans. 393,) Lord Eldon said: "It has been decided in bankruptcy, that if a creditor gives an order on his debtor to pay a sum in discharge of his debt, and that order is shown to the debtor, it binds him. On the other hand, this doctrine has been brought into doubt by some decisions in the Courts of Law, which require that the party receiving the order should, in some way, enter into a contract. That has been the course of their decisions, but is certainly not the doctrine of this Court."

If the orders to which Thurlow and Eldon refer, would constitute an equitable assignment of the particular fund pro tanto against which they are drawn, equally so must the agreement in the present case—upon the faith of which, and the representations of the parties, the plaintiff relied—took the acceptance of one of them, and relinquished his claim upon the other. The agreement, under the circumstances of the case, must be deemed to have operated as an equitable assignment of the surplus, so soon as any existed, for the benefit of the laborers. Frierson, as Assignee, thereupon held the same as Trustee for their benefit. As trust property, the proceeds could not pass to the Administrator as general assets for the benefit of the creditors at large, but were subject in his hands to the same trust which attached to them before the decease of the intestate. (Kip v. Bank of New York, 10 John. 63.)

The principles upon which the plaintiff bases his right to the appropriation of the specific property have been repeatedly asserted and affirmed in the most maturely considered cases. In Moses et al. v. Murgatroyd et al. (1 John Chan. 128,) Chancellor Kent held that the holders of certain promissory notes were entitled to the proceeds of a cargo assigned by the maker to the indorser as security against his indorsements; that the property was held by the indorser in trust for the payment of the notes, and the proceeds in the hands of his Administrator were not assets for the general creditors of the intestate, but were subject to the same trust, and specifically liable to appropriation to the payment of the notes. In that case it does not appear that the holders had any knowledge of the assignment to the indorser, when the notes were taken, but before their maturity the maker became insolvent, and the indorser, on being charged by due notice of protest, assured the holders that the notes should be paid out of the property assigned as soon as the ship containing the cargo arrived; and relying upon this assurance, the holders forbore to sue. The assignment was absolute on its face, and the Chancellor, after concluding that it was intended as security, said: "This being the case, the plaintiffs, as holders of the notes, are entitled to the benefit of this collateral security, given by their principal debtor to his surety; and the case of Maure v. Harrison, (1 Eq. Ab. 93, K. 5 Mich. 1692,) is directly to this point. These collateral securities are in fact, trusts created for the better protection of the debt; and it is the duty of this Court to see that they fulfill the design. And whether the plaintiffs were apprised, at the time, of the creation of this security, is not material. The trust was created for their benefit, or for the better security of the debt, and when it came to their knowledge, they were entitled to affirm the trust, and to enforce its performance. This was the principle assumed in the case of Neilson v. Blight (1 John. Cas. 205)."

Pierce v. Robinson.

---

In Burn v. Cavalho, (4 Mylne & Craig, 690,) Lord Cottenham decided that directions by a debtor upon his agents to apply property in their hands belonging to him, to the discharge of his liabilities to a creditor, in pursuance of an agreement to that effect, gave the creditor a right in equity to have the property thus applied, notwithstanding the debtor had become bankrupt before the directions had reached the agents, and a commission had issued. To the same effect is the decision in Clark v. Mauran, (3 Paige, 373.) In that case the debtor had sent orders to his agents in Caracooa to sell out his goods remaining in their hands, and to ship the balance of his funds in doubloons to the defendant. Soon after this, the debtor, in answer to an application for payment, informed the defendant of the orders forwarded to his agents, and requested him to place the funds, when received, to his credit on account. The doubloons were shipped and consigned to the defendant, and the bill of lading given to the Captain of the vessel; but, before their arrival, the debtor failed and made a general assignment for the benefit of creditors; and the question presented was, whether the assignee or the defendant was entitled to them. The Chancellor held that the shipment made by the debtor and the delivery of the bill of lading to the Captain, constituted an appropriation of the property to the defendant upon which he had a specific lien, not affected by the general assignment of the debtor; remarking in his opinion, that as the letter, informing the defendant of the order for the consignment of the property, was written in answer to an application from him for payment, it was to be presumed that he acted upon it, and neglected to press his demands to the extent he would otherwise have done.

---

The authorities cited, establish clearly the equitable right of the plaintiff to the proceeds in the hands of the Administrator for the payment of his demand. The fact that the proceeds were not in existence at the time of the agreement, does not affect the question. The agreement took effect as an assignment in equity so soon as any surplus existed. The right of the plaintiff to the appropriation of the funds then attached. The case of Field v. Mayor of New York, (2 Selden, 179,) sustains the doctrine that equity will uphold assignments — not only of choses in action, but of contingent interests and expectations, and of things which have no present actual existence, but rest in possibility, provided they are fairly made, and are not against public policy; and an agreement for such interests will take effect as such assignment when the subjects to which they refer have ceased to rest in possibility, and have ripened into reality. (See Leading Cases in Equity, vol. 2, Hare & Wallace's Notes.)

I have thus far treated the first conveyance as a mortgage. If not such, the inquiry as to the proceeds of the farm was useless. If the conveyance were absolute, transferring the title in fee-simple, as on its face it purports to be, the proceeds were the property of the grantee, not subject, in any particular, to the disposition of the grantors. Whether, then, the conveyance is to be regarded as a mortgage is material to the claim asserted by the plaintiff, and whether it can be so regarded depends upon the admissibility of parol evidence to show the purpose of the conveyance. I leave out of consideration the proceedings of the Probate Court, taken on the petition of the Administrator, in relation to the claims of Hutchinson & Greene, as it is objected that the settlement there made was by way of compromise, and that no admission can be properly inferred from them against the general creditors of the estate for whose benefit the defense is made. I pass over, also, the answer, which is not under oath, as it is asserted that the case was tried upon agreement that the answer should be taken as a full and specific denial of each allegation of the complaint. I place the question whether the conveyance is to be deemed a mortgage, entirely upon the admissibility of parol evidence to establish the fact. The evidence in the record, if admitted, clearly establishes it. The question as to the admissibility of such evidence came before this Court in Lee v. Evans, (8 Cal. 424,) and it was there held that it was inadmissible except in cases of fraud, accident, or mistake, in the creation of the instrument, and the doctrine there asserted was affirmed by Mr. Justice Burnett in Low v. Henry (9 Cal. 538). At the time I took my seat on the bench, there were several cases pending before the Court in which I had appeared as counsel, and, of course, I was precluded from participating in their decision or expressing any dissent therefrom. Lee v. Evans and Low v. Henry were among the number. Both of these cases were decided in favor of the parties I represented, but upon other grounds than those arising from the admissibility of parol evidence.

In Johnson v. Sherman, decided at the July Term, 1858, the same question was again presented, and I took the occasion to give, in a separate opinion, the reasons of my dissent from the doctrine announced in Lee v. Evans. A rehearing having been granted, and a change on the bench having since taken place, and Mr. Justice Baldwin concurring with me, I avail myself of this opportunity to re-affirm the views I then expressed, using substantially the language of my dissenting opinion in Johnson v. Sherman, trusting thereby to place the doctrine of this Court in harmony with the received doctrine of Courts of Equity, on this subject, everywhere else.

Pierce v. Robinson.

---

I consider parol evidence admissible in equity, to show that a deed absolute upon its face was intended as a mortgage, and that the restriction of the evidence to cases of fraud, accident, or mistake, in the creation of the instrument, is unsound in principle and unsupported by authority.

The entire doctrine of equity, in respect to mortgages, has its origin in considerations independent of the terms in which the instruments are drawn. In form, a mortgage in fee is a conveyance of a conditional estate, which, by the strict rules of the common law, became absolute upon breach of its conditions. But, from an early period in the history of English jurisprudence, Courts of Equity interposed to prevent a forfeiture of the estate and gave to the mortgagor a right to redeem, upon payment within a reasonable time, of the principal sum secured, interest and costs. As the right to thus recover the estate forfeited arose not from the terms of the instrument, but from a consideration of the real character of the transaction, as one of security and not of purchase, it could be enforced only in equity, and was hence termed an equity of redemption. And when the right to redeem had been once established, to prevent its evasion, the rule was laid down and has ever since been inflexibly adhered to, that the right is inseparably connected with the mortgage, and cannot be abandoned or waived by any stipulations entered into between the parties at the time, whether inserted in the instrument or not. (Vernon v. Bethell, 2 Eden, 113; Butler's Note to Coke on Litt. 2046; 4 Kent, 142-144; Story's Equity, Sec. 1019).

As the equity upon which the Courts act arises from the real character of the transaction, it is of no consequence in what manner this character is established, whether by deed or other writing, or by parol. Whether the instrument, it not being apparent on its face, is to be regarded as a mortgage, depends upon the circumstances under which it was made, and the relations subsisting between the parties. Evidence of these circumstances and relations is admitted, not for the purpose of contradicting or varying the deed, but to establish an equity superior to its terms. It is against the policy of the law to allow irredeemable mortgages, just as it is against the policy of the law to allow the creation of inalienable estates. Under no circumstances will equity permit this end to be effected, either by express stipulation, or the absolute form of the instrument. The rule which refuses the admission of parol evidence to contradict or vary written instruments, is directed to the language employed by the parties. That language cannot be qualified, but must be left to speak for itself. The rule does not exclude an inquiry into the objects and purposes of the parties in executing the instruments. It may be shown, for instance, that a deed was made to defraud creditors, or a release given to render a witness competent. The purposes and objects of the parties are considered by a Court of Chancery, and constitute a large ground of its jurisdiction, which will be exercised to restrain or to effectuate them, as may best promote justice. Thus, a deed executed for a fraudulent purpose will be set aside; and as it is the settled policy of equity, admitting of no departure, never to permit a security to be converted by any contemporaneous agreement into a sale, the purposes of the parties in giving and taking an absolute conveyance will be inquired into; and when the rights of third persons have not intervened, a Court of Chancery will control the use of the instrument intended as security in the hands of the grantee, so as to effectuate its object. Unless parol evidence can be admitted, the policy of the law will be constantly evaded. Debtors, under the force of pressing necessities, will submit to almost any exactions for loans of a trifling amount, compared with the value of the property, and the equity of redemption will elude the grasp of the Court, and rest in the simple good faith of the creditor. A mortgage, as I have observed, is, in form, a conveyance of a conditional estate, and the assertion of a right to redeem from a forfeiture, involves the same departure from the terms of the instrument, as in the case of an absolute conveyance executed as security. The conveyance upon condition, by its terms, purports to vest the entire estate upon the breach of the condition, just as the absolute conveyance does in the first instance. The equity arises and is asserted, in both cases, upon exactly the same principles, and is enforced without reference to the agreement of the parties, but from the nature of the transaction to which the right attaches, from the policy of the law, as an inseparable incident.

---

---

---

In Lee v. Evans, the majority of the Court appear to have overlooked, in their anxiety to preserve the integrity of conveyances from attacks of parol, the distinction between evidence of facts raising an equity which will control the operation of the instrument in the hands of the grantee, and evidence to contradict or vary the legal effect of its terms, and yet that distinction is the foundation of the entire equitable doctrine of mortgages.

Fraud, accident, and mistake, are special grounds of equity jurisdiction, and may be shown by any satisfactory evidence, written or verbal, with reference not merely to mortgages, but to all written instruments. From their nature they must generally be established by parol evidence. And the evidence is admissible, not for the purpose of contradicting or varying the terms of the instrument—not to make its language mean one thing, when it speaks another, but to show a state of facts dehors the instrument, raising an equity, which a Court of Chancery will enforce by annulling or reforming the instrument, or limiting its operation, or enjoining its use. And the doctrine is both novel and startling which restricts, in matters of fraud, its jurisdiction over the operation of written instruments, to those cases where the fraud has been committed in their creation. If maintained, it will sweep away its heretofore admitted jurisdiction in an infinite variety of cases, of almost daily occurrence, where the fraud alleged consists in the use of instruments, entered into upon mutual confidence between the parties. Fraud in their use is as much a ground for the interposition of equity, as fraud in their creation. There is no distinction in the principle upon which the jurisdiction is asserted in the two cases. In both there is the same abuse of confidence, and from both the same injury results.

In Hultz v. Wright, the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania said: "As to fraud, it is not supposed to be necessary to have proof express that a writing has been obtained fraudulently, in order to admit parol evidence against it on that score; but parol evidence may be admitted to resist the fraudulent use of a writing in the obtaining of which no fraud can be made to appear." (16 Seargt. & Rawle, 346.) And in Oliver v. Oliver, (4 Rawle, 144,) the same Court said: "When the fairness of the transaction is impeached, it is immaterial whether the party intended a fraud at the time of the contract, or whether the fraud consists in the fraudulent use of the instrument. * * * It is no answer to say that the parol evidence is in opposition to the deed; for where there is fraud, or the party attempts to make a fraudulent use of an instrument, contrary to his contract, parol evidence is admitted to prevent injustice."

Pierce v. Robinson.

---

"A deed," says Kent, "absolute upon the face of it, and though registered as a deed, will be valid and effectual as a mortgage as between the parties, if it was intended by them to be merely a security for a debt. And this would be the case, though the defeasance was by agreement resting in parol, for parol evidence is admissible in equity, to show that an absolute deed was intended as a mortgage, and that the defeasance has been omitted, or destroyed by fraud, surprise, or mistake." (4 Com. 143.) And Mr. Justice Story, after quoting this passage, adds: "It is the same if it be omitted by design, upon mutual confidence between the parties, for the violation of such an agreement would be a fraud of the most flagrant kind, originating in an open breach of trust against conscience and justice. I do not comment upon this subject at large, because it seems to me wholly unnecessary, in the present state of the law, to do more than enunciate the principles which govern cases of this nature, and which are as well established as any which govern any branch of our jurisprudence." (Taylor v. Luther, 2 Sumner, 233.)

And if authority is to govern, the concluding observations of Mr. Justice Story are correct beyond all question. For the last one hundred years parol evidence has been held admissible to show that an absolute conveyance was intended as a mortgage. In those tribunals to whose adjudications we are accustomed to look for authoritative expositions of the law, the doctrine is at rest. It prevails in England and in the Supreme Court of the United States; it is held in New York, from which our Statute of Frauds is almost literally copied; it is maintained in the eastern States, except as modified by statutory enactments as to the equity jurisdiction of the Courts; it is the law in Virginia, in the Carolinas, in Alabama, Tennessee, Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, and, I have no doubt, in other States.

In the case of Taylor v. Luther, cited above, there was no allegation of fraud, accident, or mistake, in the creation of the deed, and yet parol evidence was held admissible to show that the instrument was intended as a mortgage, and a decree allowing a redemption was granted.

Pierce v. Robinson.

In Van Buren v. Olmstead, (5 Paige, 10) the allegation of fraud contained in the bill was not sustained, but Chancellor Walworth held that parol evidence could be received to show that the conveyance was intended as security. "It is now well settled," he says, "that parol evidence is admissible to show that a deed, absolute in its terms, was intended by the parties as a mortgage, or security for the payment of money merely."

In Hodges v. The Tennessee Marine and Fire Insurance Co. (4 Selden, 416,) the Court of Appeals of New York held the parol evidence admissible. In that case, there was no pretense of any fraud, accident, or mistake, either in the creation or use of the instrument. "From an early day," said the Court, "the admissibility of such evidence had been established as the law of our Courts, and it is not fitting that the question should now be re-examined." (Strong v. Stewart, 4 J. C. 167; Whittick v. Kane, 1 Paige, 206.)

In Miami Exporting Company v. Bank of the United States, (Wright, 252,) the Supreme Court of Ohio said: "It is now the acknowledged doctrine that parol evidence is admissible against the face of a deed, to show that a mortgage only was intended. And whether a conveyance be a mortgage or not, is determined by its object. If given as a security, it is a mortgage, whatever may be its form. This is so whether the condition of defeasance form a part of the deed, is evidenced by other writing, or exists only in parol. The fact of its being given as security determines its character, not the evidence by which the fact is established."

In Miller v. Thomas et al. (14 Ill. 431,) Caton, J. of the Supreme Court of Illinois, says: "It is by no means necessary, in order to constitute a mortgage, that the deed and defeasance should be contained in the same instrument, or that they should even refer to each other. Their connection may be shown by parol. Indeed, it is not absolutely necessary that the defeasance should be in writing at all. The conveyance may be absolute on its face, and yet it may be shown by parol that it was intended only as a security for the payment of money, when it will be treated in equity as a mortgage. These principles are too familiar to require authorities for their support."

Pierce & Robinson.

In a great number of the adjudged cases in which parol evidence has been held admissible, special circumstances of fraud, accident, or mistake, have existed, and are referred to as distinct grounds for equitable relief. Yet, it is no less well settled that the evidence is admissible in the absence of such circumstances. The jurisdiction of equity is asserted upon the admission of the parties to the character of the transaction, either by pleadings or otherwise, and even against their express denial, upon clear and decisive proof. (Conwell et al. v. Evill, 4 Blackford, 67; Franklin v. Roberts, 2 Iredell's Eq. 564;) and even where a disposition has been manifested to restrict the jurisdiction to cases in which the elements of fraud or undue advantage are mingled, it is held, with few exceptions, sufficient to authorize a decree for relief, that the proof of the fraud consists in the attempt of the grantee to appropriate the conveyance to his own use.

Thus, in Wright v. Bates & Niles, the Supreme Court of Vermont, says: "It is well settled law in this State, that a Court of Chancery will treat an absolute deed of real estate, given to secure the payment of a debt, as a mortgage, as between the immediate parties, especially if the grantor continues to remain in possession, though the defeasance rests wholly in parol. When there is an attempt to set up such an instrument as an absolute conveyance, there is a fraudulent application or use made of it; and this is a proper ground on which chancery may proceed." (13 Vermont, 348.)

In Morris v. Ex'r of Nixon, (1 How. 126,) Mr. Justice Wayne, of the Supreme Court of the United States, says: "The charge against Nixon is substantially a fraudulent attempt to convert that into an absolute sale which was originally meant by himself and the complainant to be a security for a loan. It is in this view of the case that the evidence is admitted, to ascertain the truth of the transaction, though the deed be absolute on its face."

In Strong v. Stewart, (4 Johns. 167,) the deed was absolute on its face, but it was proved against the express denial of the answer of the grantee to have been executed as security for a loan, and not upon a purchase and sale. And Chancellor Kent said: "On the strength of the authorities, and on the proof of the loan, and of the fraud on the part of the defendant in attempting to convert a mortgage into an absolute sale, I shall decree an existing right in the plaintiffs to redeem."

Pierce v. Robinson.

---

The parol evidence is admitted, as I have already observed, not for the purpose of contradicting or varying the written instrument, but to show facts dehors the instrument creating an equity superior to its terms. The same rule prevails in the admission of parol evidence in equity to establish resulting or implied trusts. Where one party purchases an estate with the money of another, and takes the conveyance in his own name, a trust in favor of the latter results by implication of law without any agreement on the part of the nominal grantee. Such trust may be proved by parol evidence even in the absence of fraud, and against the positive denial of the grantee. "Irrespective of any allegation of fraud," says Greenleaf, "it has been settled upon great consideration that parol evidence is admissible to prove that the purchase money for an estate was paid by a third person other than the grantee named in the deed in order to establish a trust in favor of him who paid the money." (Evidence, vol. 1, 365; Boyd v. McLean, 1 Johna. Ch. 582.)

The evidence is received not in contradiction of the deed; on the contrary, the legal effect of its terms is admitted, but to show the source of the consideration. The trust arises from the fact appearing dehors the instrument, that the money advanced by the real, and not the nominal purchaser, constituted the consideration of the purchase, just as the equity in the case of an absolute conveyance arises from the fact appearing, dehors the deed, that it was executed as security for a debt. In neither case is it attempted to vary the language of the conveyances, but to prevent an inequitable advantage being taken from their terms.

In Lee v. Evans, the complaint alleged a loan to the defendant, for a certain period, at a stipulated interest, and the execution of the absolute conveyance as security for the payment of the sum, but contained no averment of fraud, accident, or mistake, in the creation of the instrument, or any attempted fraud in its use. The answer did not specifically deny the allegations of the complaint, but insisted that the conveyance was to operate as a conditional sale, the premises to be reconveyed provided payment of the money, when due, with interest, was made, but otherwise, that the title was to remain perfect in the plaintiff. Upon the want of a specific denial, and the averments of the answer, the transaction was held to be one of loan and not of purchase, and the relief prayed for was decreed. In other words, upon the admission, by the pleadings, of the character of the transaction, the deed was treated as a mortgage.

It is difficult to perceive the consistency of the judgment with the reasoning of the opinion. The admission by the pleadings only established for the purposes of the suit, the truth of the facts stated. Those facts might have been proved with equal certainty by evidence. Written evidence not being by deed or conveyance, is as much in contravention of the language of the statute as oral evidence. The statute reads: "No estate or interest in lands, other than leases for a term not exceeding one year, nor any trust or power over or concerning lands, or in any manner relating thereto, shall hereafter be created, granted, assigned, surrendered, or declared, unless by act or operation of law, or by deed or conveyance in writing, subscribed by the party creating, granting, assigning, surrendering, or declaring the same, or by his lawful agent thereunto authorized by writing." Admissions, whether contained in pleadings or established by competent proof, do not constitute "a deed or conveyance in writing." The answer in Lee v. Evans contained no admission of the execution of any such deed or conveyance, but only of the character of the original transaction as one of loan and not of purchase.

The judgment of the Court in Lee v. Evans, as to the effect of the admissions by the answer, is undoubtedly correct; but it is not warranted by the opinion. It must rest upon the equity which arises from the nature of the transaction, when that transaction is admitted by the parties, and it follows that such equity must arise when the transaction is clearly established by other evidence than admissions.

Since the opinion containing the views here repeated was rendered my attention has been called to the separate opinion of Mr. Justice Burnett, in Arguello v. Edinger, (10 Cal. 160,) in which he again re-affirms the doctrine announced in Lee v. Evans.

In the case of Arguello v. Edinger, the only questions which arose were: 1st, whether, under the statute of frauds, of this State, Courts of Equity possessed any power to decree a specific performance of a verbal contract for the sale of land, in case of part performance; and 2d, if they possessed the power, whether the acts detailed in that case constituted such part performance as to justify its exercise. A discussion of the admissibility in equity of parol evidence, to show that a deed, absolute on its face, was intended as a mortgage, was irrelevant to those questions. The reasoning of the learned Justice on a point thus outside of the case, has not induced any qualification of the views expressed in Johnson v. Sherman, or created a doubt of their entire soundness.

The parol evidence being admissible, and clearly establishing the fact that the conveyance was intended only as security, Hutchinson & Greene were entitled to redeem the property, and to insist upon a reconveyance after its proceeds had satisfied their indebtedness to Frierson, and to make any disposition they thought proper of the surplus.

It only remains to add, that the judgment of the Court below must be reversed, and that Court directed to enter a decree declaring that the plaintiff is entitled to the application of the funds in the hands of the Administrator, which are the proceeds of the produce of the farm, to the payment of his demand, and directing the same to be made.

Ordered accordingly.

WELLS, FARGO & CO. v. ROBINSON, ADMINISTRATOR OF FRIERSON.

If a confidential Agent, trusted by a principal with money used in trade, appropriates the money to the purchase of property for his own use and benefit, and the property can be identified as that so bought, the Agent will be held as Trustee for the owner of the money.

A suit at law to recover judgment against an Administrator for money embezzled by his intestate, pending which, a bill in equity was filed to recover the property bought with the money, and prosecuted to a decree after judgment was taken at law for the amount, evidences no such distinct and deliberate choice to take the general claim on the estate for money, in lieu of the claim on this property, as to bar plaintiff from prosecuting his equitable claim.

The doctrine of election is applicable only when the party is cognizant of all the facts, and then makes a free and deliberate choice.

---

Under our system, a judgment against an Administrator is little, if any, better than an allowance by him, and approval by the Probate Judge. An Administrator being compelled by law to hold, protect, and guard, funds coming into his hands, which he has reason to believe to be assets of the estate, until the right to the funds can be determined, is entitled to his commissions thereon.

APPEAL from the Sixth District.

For facts see opinion.

Clark & Gass, and Winans, for Appellants.

I. Where a plaintiff, on the ground of an implied trust between him and defendant, is entitled to certain bonds, bought by defendant with plaintiff's funds, but proceeds to take a verdict and common law judgment against defendant for the amount of said bonds, the act of going to trial and taking a money judgment at common law, constitutes an election on the part of said plaintiff.

In that case, the remedies at law and in equity being inconsistent, such plaintiff is bound by his election, and cannot, subsequently to the taking of said judgment, enforce in equity his claim to the bonds in specie. (2 Story's Eq. Jur. Sec. 1262; Sawyer v. Wood, 3 Johns. Ch. 416; Mocher v. Reed, 1 Ball & Beatty, 318; Bond v. Hopkins, 1 Schoales & Le Froy, 441; Combs v. Perleton, 2 B. Monroe, 194. See, also, Ex Parte Ward, 1 Atk. 153; Ex Parte Lewes, 1 Id. 154; Ex Parte Warder, 3 Brown, 191; Ex Parte Cator, 3 Id. 216; Seligman v. Kalkman, 8 Cal. 216; Merrick v. Darling, 11 Ohio, 343; Rogers v. Vosburgh, 4 Johns. Ch. 84; Thompson v. Graham, 1 Paige, 452.)

II. The relation existing between plaintiffs and Angus Frierison did not render him their Trustee, quoad the fund in controversy embezzled by him. Nor could the change of that fund from money into gas stock, even if directly traceable, constitute the conversion of a trust fund.

The theory upon which plaintiffs rely is, that wherever the property of a party has been wrongfully misapplied, or converted into another species of property, if its identity can be traced, it will be held in its new form liable to the rights of the original owner. But this doctrine only has application where the relation of Trustee and cestui que trust exists. (Willard's Eq. Juris. 599; Hill on Trustees, 144.)

---

III. It is denied that the money embezzled by Frierson from plaintiffs was converted into the bonds in controversy, nor can its identity be distinctly and separately traced into any new form of property.

It is a fundamental doctrine of the Court of Chancery that, in order to get equity you must do equity. And yet plaintiffs, although they ask equitable relief, in having these bonds construed to have been obtained with their own money, actually show that they were obtained with the money of others, but fall back upon the legal and inequitable technicality that that money became theirs because put into their trays, although it was immediately drawn out again. Certainly, if these bonds are to be security for any moneys, it must be for those of the owners of the thirty thousand dollars deposited with Frierson, not for plaintiffs. (Hertell v. Bogert, 9 Paige, 52; Dilly v. Bernard, 8 Gill & J. 170; Story's Eq. Juris. Secs. 1258, 1259, 1265.)

IV. Janes being the agent of plaintiffs, and also a Director of the Gas Company, in the latter capacity sanctioned the transfer of the stock in controversy to defendant, instead of acting in the former capacity and preventing the same by setting up plaintiffs' rights in the Glenn and Chittenden stock held by defendant. This conduct and the sanction by plaintiffs' agent of the sale of these bonds to defendant was an acquiescence on plaintiffs' part in defendant's right to hold the bonds, and estopped them from setting up an adverse claim to them.

Did plaintiffs elect to take a judgment at law, and abandon their suit in equity?

Before either suit was brought plaintiffs notified defendant of their intention to hold the bonds. Both suits were instituted about the same time, and by them defendant was again notified what plaintiff claimed.

The judgment in the first suit has been called a common law judgment. We submit where there is nothing more than a quasi judgment, no execution can issue. The money cannot be collected by process issued thereon. The effect of the verdict of the Jury was simply to establish the amount of the defalcation by Frierson. (Wood's Digest, p. 405, sec. 140.)

---

The case at bar is unlike any of the cases cited by Appellant, the general doctrine of which we do not deny. Whenever the plaintiff has been held to have elected another remedy, it was because no excuse or reason was assigned for prosecuting the two suits. In this case it was a necessity, the Administrator having rejected our demand. (Coleman v. Cross, 4 B. Monroe, 270).

The same Court (in 9 Dana, 425,) say: "The principle is, that the defendant shall not be unnecessarily vexed or harassed with two suits at the same time for the same cause of action. The bare fact of two suits at the same time is not of itself sufficient always to abate the prior suit, if both may be necessary to attain the ends of justice."

In answer to his second point, we refer the Court to Story on Agency, (Secs. 229-231, and authorities there cited; 4 Kent's Com. 305, 306).

This was a bill in equity, to recover certain bonds and choses in action in the hands of defendant. It appears that in 1854, and for several years afterwards, the plaintiffs were bankers and dealers in exchange, in Sacramento; and that Frierson was their cashier and bookkeeper for a portion of this time, and until his death, in February, 1855; and while so employed, he embezzled and converted to his own use moneys belonging to the plaintiffs to the large amount of one hundred and ninety-five thousand eight hundred and eighty-nine dollars.

After the death of Frierson, Robinson became his Administrator, and plaintiffs in due time after the publication of the statutory notice, presented to defendant their claim for this sum, with an affidavit appended, averring that the estate was indebted to the plaintiffs in this amount; and, also, that fifty thousand dollars of this sum was advanced by Frierson to the Sacramento Gas Company, and that for this amount the plaintiffs claimed a lien upon all the gas stock of the estate, and all bonds of the Gas Company, held by defendant as Administrator. The Administrator rejected the whole claim. In May, 1856, plaintiffs commenced a common law action against defendant for the whole amount of the claim, as a money demand. Pending this suit, viz: on the 1st July, 1856, plaintiffs filed this bill; on the 19th January, 1857, the plaintiffs proceeded to try this common law action, and recovered judgment for the whole sum. Afterwards the plaintiffs prosecuted to a decree in their favor this bill. No part of the judgment has been paid.

On the 18th November, 1854, one Wm. Glen was the owner and holder of two thousand one hundred shares of the capital stock of the Sacramento Gas Company, of the nominal value of two hundred and ten thousand dollars, upon which an assessment of three dollars per share had been paid by Glen. On that day, Glen and Frierson entered into a contract by which the latter was to advance and pay all assessments that might be made on the stock by the company, for eight months next after the making of the contract; and upon all assessments thus paid, Glen was to pay Frierson interest at the rate of two and a half per cent. per month, payable monthly; and in the event that it was not promptly paid, to be compounded. To secure Frierson in these advances, Glen delivered him this stock as collateral security. On the 28th December, 1854, one Chittenden was the owner of five hundred and twenty shares of the capital stock of the company, of the nominal value of fifty-two thousand dollars, upon which he had paid an assessment of three per cent. on the nominal value of the stock; and, on the same day, he and Frierson entered into a contract of like import to the one with Glen, and this last stock was deposited with Frierson as collateral security for such advances as he might make. At the date of these contracts, and to the time of his death, Frierson was President of the Sacramento Gas Company. A settlement was made between the Gas Company and the Administrator of Frierson, on the 1st of September, 1855; by which it appeared that Frierson, after the making of the contracts with Glen and Chittenden, advanced to them, in the way of assessments on the stock, the sum of forty thousand two hundred dollars; and by an agreement, and in the way of a settlement of the accounts of Frierson and the company, the Administrator assigned to the company, Frierson's demand against Glen and Chittenden for advances and in consideration thereof, the company issued to the Administrator the bonds mentioned in the complaint. At the time of this settlement, one James was the Managing Agent of Wells, Fargo & Co. in this State, and was also one of the Directors of the Gas Company, and was present and assisted in the settlement. Between the 1st July, 1854, and Frierson's death, there were deposited with Frierson, by various persons, large sums of money, amounting in all, to thirty thousand dollars, to be invested by him for their use and benefit. Frierson kept a large cash account with Wells, Fargo & Co. and this thirty thousand dollars was deposited with plaintiffs, to Frierson's credit, and so entered on their books.

The Court finds that it was "admitted that during all the time these deposits were being made with Frierson, and by Frierson, with the plaintiffs, there was a balance against him on the books of plaintiffs." "The exhibits introduced show daily balances against him, on plaintiffs' books, between the 8th of November, 1854, and the 18th of February, 1855, of from a few hundred dollars to upwards of thirty thousand dollars. It is shown that for several months, immediately preceding his death, he was in the habit of falsifying the books and making forced balances of the cash accounts. The testimony of the clerks about the house of Wells, Fargo & Co. shows that the money deposited with Frierson by third persons, for investment, was mingled with plaintiffs' money and put into their trays." The Judge proceeds with his finding thus: "Their witnesses, also, state that payments were made by Frierson, on account of the Gas Company and for Glen and Chittenden, out of the moneys taken from plaintiffs' trays, in the banking house. But they were not able to state the amount of these payments. The answer admits that all of the money deposited, as above stated, with Frierson was used by him in paying the assessments on Glen and Chittenden's stock. There is no evidence to show that Frierson, during the time these assessments were being paid by him, which was between the 2d of November, 1854, and the 23d of February, 1855, had any money of his own with which to pay the same, except the proceeds of his wages, unless the deposits, above mentioned, are to be considered his property. It is also shown, that he was engaged in other transactions requiring the use of large amounts of money, and which were sufficient to consume the whole of his wages. From all the evidence in the case, I am satisfied, and so find the facts to be, that all of the assessments paid on the stock of Glen and Chittenden were paid from the funds of the plaintiffs, and from the money deposited with Frierson under the circumstances above stated, and after it had been mingled with the funds of the plaintiffs, and that the plaintiffs were ignorant of the fact of its use, and the manner of using it, until after Frierson's death. But the plaintiffs had all the information as to the amount of money used, and the purposes for which it was used, at the time of the commencement of the suit at law against the Administrator, that they possessed at the institution of this suit."

---

Three questions arise on this statement.

1. Can Wells, Fargo & Co. follow this money, appropriated or invested by their agent, and claim the property or securities into which the money went, as theirs, or subject to their claim, assuming that the proofs sustain the claim in point of fact?

2. If so, have they waived or forfeited their right by the common law suit and judgment; if not —

3. Do the proofs show that their money was so appropriated?

In respect to the first question, it does not distinctly appear by the record what were the powers and duties of this cashier or bookkeeper, Frierson, except so far as may be inferred from the designation given him, nor the exact nature and character of the business of plaintiffs, whether it embraced loans on stocks or other securities, or the purchase of such. But it does sufficiently appear that Frierson had the custody and charge of their money, and that very great confidence was reposed in him. The operations into which he carried the money of his employers were entered into on his private account. The money invested by him was embezzled. The question then is, whether, if a confidential agent trusted by a principal with money used in trade, appropriates the money to the purchase of property for his own use and benefit, and the property can be identified as that so bought, the agent can be held as Trustee for the owner of the money. This proposition is, in effect, held by the Judge below, and is denied by the counsel for the Appellant.

Frierson, in this matter, may be considered in equity as a Trustee of this money, which he was to hold and dispose of for the proper uses and purposes of the firm of Wells, Fargo & Co.

He, of course, had no right to divert the money to other uses. It matters little whether he was intrusted to employ the money in the purchase of gold dust or exchange for his principals, or only to pay it out on the order of those who did, or keep it in his possession, until needed by the firm. In either case, he took the money of Wells, Fargo & Co. intrusted to him in a fiduciary capacity, and loaned it on certain securities, in his own name, and for his own account. The rule is thus stated by Mr. Justice Story: (Eq. Juris. vol. 2, Secs. 1258-1261.) "Upon similar principles, wherever the property of a party has been wrongfully misapplied, or a trust fund has been wrongfully converted into another species of property, if its identity can be traced, it will be held, in its new form, liable to the rights of the original owner, or cestui que trust. The general proposition, which is maintained both at law and in equity upon this subject is, that if property, in its original state and form, is covered with a trust in favor of the principal, no change of that state and form can divest it of such trust, or give the Agent or Trustee converting it, or those who represent him in right, (not being bona fide purchasers for a valuable consideration without notice,) any more valid claim in respect to it, than they respectively had before such a change. An abuse of a trust can confer no rights on the party abusing it, or on those who claim in privity with him. This principle is fully recognized at law in all cases where it is susceptible of being brought out as a ground of action, or of defense, in a suit at law. In Courts of Equity it is adopted, with a universality of application.

Thus, for instance, if A is intrusted by B, with money to purchase a horse for him, and A purchases a carriage with that money, in violation of the trust, B is entitled to the carriage, and may, if he chooses so to do, sue for it at law. So, if A intrusts money with a broker to buy Bank of England stock for him, and he invests the money in American stocks, A is entitled to, and may maintain an action at law for those stocks, in whose-soever hands he finds them, not being a purchaser for a valuable consideration without notice. It matters not in the slightest degree into whatever other form, different from the original, the change may have been made, whether it be that of promissory notes, or of goods, or of stock; for the product of a substitute for the original thing still follows the nature of the thing itself, so long as it can be ascertained to be such. The right ceases only, when the means of ascertainment fail; which, of course, is the case, when the subject matter is turned into money, and mixed and confounded in a general mass of property of the same description.

Cases may readily be put, where this doctrine would be enforced in equity under circumstances in which it could not be applied at law. Thus, for instance, if a Trustee, in violation of his duty, should lay out the trust money in land, and take a conveyance in his own name, the cestui que trust would be without any relief at law. But a Court of Equity would hold the cestui que trust to be the equitable owner of the land, and would decree it to him accordingly; not upon any notion of his having ratified the act, but upon the mere ground of a wrongful conversion, creating, in foro conscientiarum, a trust in his favor."

Thus, it is also held in several cases, that if property has been rightfully sold by an Agent or Trustee, if the proceeds of the sale can be distinctly traced, the property belongs in equity, and often in law, to the principal. Thus, for example, if a factor sells goods consigned to him for sale, and takes notes for the purchase money, those notes, if he fails, will belong to his principal, and not to his assignees or representatives. (1 Atk. 233; 3 Mason, 322; 4 Simon, 438.)

We cannot see that the fact that this money was embezzled makes the rule any the less applicable.

2. It is contended that the plaintiffs have elected to consider the estate of Frierson as their debtor for the amount of this money, including the money advanced to Chittenden and Glen, on this stock; and, therefore, that they cannot recover the stock or the debt due from Chittenden, or the bonds growing out of the transaction. This point rests on the fact, that suit was brought for the money in the common law action, and judgment taken for the full amount. It has been seen that the claim presented to the Administrator was for the bonds as a part of the subject of the embezzlement; and that shortly afterward this bill was filed, setting up this special claim.

This doctrine of election has been a vexed subject of jurisprudence. Judge Story, vol. 2, (Jur.) Sec. 1097, says: "Questions have also arisen in Courts of Equity, as to what acts or circumstances should be deemed an election on the part of the person bound to make it. We say acts or circumstances; for positive acts of acceptance or of renunciation are not indispensable. Presumptions equally strong may arise from long acquiescence, or from other circumstances of a stringent nature. Upon such a subject no general rule can be laid down; but every case must be left to be decided upon its own particular circumstances, rather than upon any definite abstract doctrine. Before any presumption of an election can arise, it is necessary to show that the party acting, or acquiescing, was cognizant of his rights. When this is ascertained affirmatively, it may be further necessary to consider whether the party intended an election; whether the party was competent to make an election; for a feme covert, an infant, or a lunatic, will not be bound by an election; whether he can restore the other persons affected by his claim to the same situation as if the acts had not been performed, or the acquiescence had not existed; and, whether there has been such a lapse of time, as ought to preclude the Court from entering upon such inquiries, upon its general doctrine of not entertaining suits upon stale demands, or after long delays.

Questions have also arisen in Courts of Equity, as to the time when, and the circumstances under which, an election may be required to be made. The general rule is, that the party is not bound to make an election, until all the circumstances are known, and the state, and condition, and value of the funds, are clearly ascertained; for, until so known and ascertained, it is impossible for the party to make a discriminating and deliberate choice, such as ought to bind him to reason and justice. If, therefore, he should make a choice in ignorance of the real state of the funds, or under misconception of the extent of the claims on the fund, elected by him, it will not be conclusive on him. And, on the other hand, he will be entitled, in order to make an election, to maintain a bill in equity for a discovery, and to have all the necessary accounts taken to ascertain the real state of the funds." (See also Kent, C. J. Opinion in Dash v. Van Kleeck, 7 John. 497.)

We think the suit brought at law by the plaintiffs under the circumstances, and the judgment taken — the bill in equity still

---

pending—and the distinct claim set up to this fund and afterwards prosecuted to judgment, evidence of no such distinct and deliberate choice to take the general claim on the estate for money in lieu of the claim on this fund, as to bar the plaintiffs from prosecuting their equitable claim. It would be unreasonable to suppose that they intended to surrender a claim on a specific fund they were then prosecuting for a judgment against the Administrator, which would give them no better right to participate in this fund than the rest of the creditors: that is, that they meant that property bought with their money should be equally distributed among all these creditors. The case would be stronger for the Appellants if a judgment here had the same effect as at common law. But under our system, a judgment is but little if any better than an allowance by the Administrator and approval of the Probate Judge. It fixes a recognized claim on the estate: that is, it furnishes a voucher which protects the Administrator in its payment. But it gives no priority, and carries with it no means of security, or coercive payment by execution. No injury has been done by the judgment. For any credit to which the estate may be entitled under this bill, and the decree, the Administrator may require a rebate from the judgment. Nor is it at all certain that the plaintiffs could know, or did know, until the termination of this suit, whether their money had gone to the investment in question; indeed, it is earnestly insisted, even now, that such was not the fact. In such case, the doctrine of Chancellor—then C. J. Kent, in Dash v. Van Kleeck, is directly applicable. In that case, it was attempted to be set up that a party, suing a Sheriff for an escape, was estopped, because, when the prisoner was retaken, he opposed his discharge, and, therefore, elected to hold him in custody. But it was answered, “that the mere fact of opposing the debtor’s discharge without having, at the time, any knowledge of the previous escape, cannot conclude the plaintiff. He undoubtedly might, with knowledge of the escape, have waived his remedy against the defendant, and have elected to consider his debtor in custody under the succeeding Sheriff; but without such knowledge, the law will not infer any determination of the party prejudicial to his rights. It would be equally absurd and unjust to conclude that the plaintiff had waived his remedy for the escape, when he was ignorant of the fact." "Election," says Dyer, (Dyer, 281,) "is the internal, free, and spontaneous separation of one thing from another, existing in the mind and will." In that case, the failure to show this knowledge was held fatal to the point that the election was made.

---

The third and last point is, that the plaintiffs have not shown that their money went into this investment. We do not feel inclined to disturb the finding of the Court below on this question of fact. It may be true that other persons deposited money with Frierson. But if Frierson acted as cashier of Wells, Fargo & Co. in receiving it, we do not see how his Administrator can complain of this being considered the money of the house with which it was deposited. If this money was deposited with Frierson in his individual capacity, and on his individual responsibility, then it is shown he passed it over to his principals as his own, giving them credit on the books for it. We do not see how, under this last view, Wells, Fargo & Co. could be held by the Administrator of Frierson to account for this money, or how he could set up that, possibly, it was this money which was invested by Frierson in these loans. There certainly was much evidence tending to show that the money of plaintiffs was used by Frierson in this investment; and we are not disposed to disturb the finding to that effect of the Judge who heard all the proofs.

As these bonds were taken in lieu of the indebtedness and stock pledged as collateral security, they stood — as the plaintiffs are willing to affirm the arrangement — as the stock; and the plaintiffs are entitled to receive the bonds for the purpose of their security, as if they had been delivered to them by Glen and Chittenden.

We do not think it necessary to notice other points, as these views are conclusive of the case on the merits.

Decree affirmed.

On a petition for rehearing, the following opinion was delivered by BALDWIN, J.—TERRY, C. J., concurring.

We deny the petition for a rehearing. Robinson, the Administrator, having taken the credits which came to his hands as Administrator, and which he had reason to believe to be assets of the estate, and with the assent of the agent of Wells, Fargo &

Saunders v. Haynes.

Co. turned them into these bonds, is entitled to his commissions allowed by law in such cases—just as if these credits had been in the form of promissory notes payable to Frierson, and the Administrator had collected the money and deposited it. The law forced him to hold, protect, and guard, the fund until the right to it was determined, and it is just and legal for him to charge for his services what the law allows him to charge for collecting and disbursing other assets. The judgment of this Court will be modified accordingly.

CHAS. R. SAUNDERS v. J. P. HAYNES.

THE Act giving jurisdiction over the subject of contested elections to the Judge of the County Court, is constitutional, and District Judges are embraced within it.

This is one of the "special cases," of which the Constitution provides, that the County Judge may take cognizance when authorized by the Legislature. The fact that the candidate receiving the highest number of votes at an election by the people, is ineligible, does not give the office to the next highest on the list.

In a proceeding to contest the election of defendant as District Judge, the ineligibility of the candidate receiving the highest number of votes, the defendant being next on the list, is no defense—because this matter, if true, could not protect the incumbent from the consequences of an unauthorized possession of the office.

Quære: Whether the place or employment of Inspector of Customs is a lucrative office, under the United States, within the Constitution of this State.

APPEAL from the County Court of Klamath County.

This was a proceeding to contest the election of defendant as Judge of the District Court, for the Eighth District. It was brought before the County Judge of Klamath County, one of the counties of that district.

The nature of the proceeding is stated by the Court. Defendant demurred to the complaint, for want of jurisdiction in the County Court. The demurrer was overruled, and an answer filed denying knowledge of any misconduct in the officers of election, averring that Turner received illegal votes; and further, that at the time of the election he was ineligible, because holding a lucrative office under the United States, to-wit: the office of "Inspector of Customs," and that he, the defendant, received the highest number of legal votes.

Relator demurred to so much of the answer as set up the illegal votes for Turner, and his ineligibility because an "Inspetor of Customs." The demurrer was sustained. The decree below was in favor of relator, holding Turner to be entitled to the office. Defendant appealed.

Heydenfeldt, for Appellant.

I. The County Court had no jurisdiction of this action because —

1. The statute only confers the right to hear contested elections to an office to be exercised in and for such county. (Wood's Digest, 380, Art. 2155, Sec. 51.)

2. The Constitution gives to the District Court jurisdiction in all cases in law and equity where the amount in controversy exceeds two hundred dollars.

This Court must judicially take notice of the Act creating the Eighth District, whereby the salary is fixed at five thousand dollars; and, therefore, the contest for this office must be within the jurisdiction of the District Court. (Wammack v. Holloway, 2 Ala. 31.)

Contesting an election is not a "special case," within the meaning of the Constitution; it is only another form of trying the title to the office. The judgment required to be pronounced is, "annulling and setting aside such election," "declaring the other person elected," "the commission is thereby rendered void and the office vacant." (Wood's Digest, 382, Secs. 63, 64, 73; Parsons v. Tuolumne Water Works, 5 Cal. 43; Brock et al. v. Herrich et al. 5 Id. 279.) The proceedings here bear a precise resemblance to those in a case of quo warranto. The whole effect of the statute is to invest in the County Court jurisdiction in cases of quo warranto, allowing those inferior Courts to determine questions affecting property of greater value than was designed by the Constitution to be entrusted to them — and that, too, in cases where Courts of general jurisdiction had always supplied a remedy, and the proceedings in which are well known features in their framework.

Nor can this be called a mere contest about a commission; the statute declares, as a result of the judgment, that "the office shall become vacant." (Wood's Dig. 382, Sec. 73.) It is settled that it is the appointment or election which confers the right, and not the commission, which is only evidence of it. (Jeter v.

Saunders v. Haynes.

The State, 1 McCord, 233; State v. Lyle, Id. 238; Wammack v. Holloway, 2 Ala. 31.) The contest, therefore, is about a substantial right, which is determined by the judgment, and that right is the right to hold and exercise the office, and enjoy its emoluments and power. To leave such a jurisdiction with the County Court, would be contrary to the whole current of decisions of this Court defining and limiting the powers of the various Courts.

II. The next point is, that the Court erred in sustaining the demurrer to so much of the answer as set up the fact that Turner was at the time holding a lucrative office under the Government of the United States, and was, therefore, ineligible. This was demurred to on the ground that it was not responsive to the relation. Now the relation alleges, as the only reason why the defendant was not entitled to the office, that Turner had received a larger vote — if, then, Turner was not eligible, Haynes was elected. The vote for Turner was a blank, and thrown away. The very question came up in Hatcheson v. Tilden & Bowley, (4 Harris & McHenry, 279;) Spear v. Robinson, (29 Me. 542.)

If the allegation set up in the answer of Haynes be true, it is a complete bar to the relation — Turner was not eligible. (People v. Whitman, 10 Cal. 38; Rodman v. Harcourt, 4 B. Monroe, 224.)

Gregory Yale, for the Relator.

Appellant makes two objections to the jurisdiction of the County Court:

1st. That the statute only confers the right to hear contested elections to an office to be exercised in and for such county.

2d. That the Constitution gives to the District Court jurisdiction in all cases in law and equity where the amount in controversy exceeds two hundred dollars.

Both of these points may be considered as settled by the decision of this Court in Whipley v. McKune (12 Cal. 352).

This statute was enacted in 1850, and the mode of contesting an election for the office, as well as the election, has remained unchanged, except by the amendments of the Act of the 27th of April, 1855 (p. 160).

True, the word "county" only is used in Section 51 of the Act of 1850 (Wood's Digest, 580). But the caption of that section is general, and provides for "contesting elections other than for members of the Legislature, Governor, and Lieutenant-Governor." This exception necessarily includes the office of District Judge. He is a county officer quoad hoc; so with respect to all the counties within his district.

Saunders v. Haynes.

---

Section 5 of the Act of 1850 was amended by Section 10 of the Act of the 25th of April, 1851, (Ch. 15,) by extending the time for filing the statement to forty, instead of twenty, days, as the Act of 1850 provided. The word "district" is still retained in the amendment. This, with the caption to Section 51, which is really a part of the law, leaves no doubt that the Legislature intended to authorize the contest of district officers. The Constitution provided for determining contests for the office of Governor, Lieutenant-Governor, and members of the Legislature. This Act was intended to authorize the inquiry as to all other officers. (See Williams v. Walton, 9 Cal. 145.)

It is not admitted that this proceeding is equivalent to an information in the nature of a quo warranto to try title to an office.

The Government is not a party. The statute gives the right to any elector to make the statement contesting the right of any one claiming to have been elected, or of the validity of the whole election. The party claiming the office adversely need not be a party to the proceeding, and he is not estopped by the judgment any more than the Government would be. There need be no relator, or a third party. The statement is direct to the Court, without form, embodying the facts.

The Government is an indispensable party to an information in the nature of a quo warranto. At common law it was a writ of right for the King against the usurper of an office, franchise, or liberty. (3 Blac. 262.) The same rule is applied to the Government of the United States. (Wallace v. Anderson, 5 Wheat. 292.) The writ was dismissed for the want of jurisdiction. Chief Justice Marshall said that "a writ of quo warranto could not be maintained but at the instance of the Government." (See, also, Commonwealth v. Burrell, 7 Barr, 34; Commonwealth v. Lexington, etc. 6 B. Monroe, 399; Practice Act, Sec. 310; State v. Hardie, 1 Iredell Law, 42; 1 Blac. Notes 66, 67.)

The writ of quo warranto falling into disuse gave way to an information by the Attorney-General, in the nature of a quo warranto. (3 Blac. 262.) But there is one fact essential to the exercise of this jurisdiction, not common to this case — the party must not only claim the office, or franchise, but he must be actually exercising its duties or liberties. (The King v. Whitewell, 5 Term Rep. 85; Buller's Nisi Prius, London Ed. 1791, 212.)

This common law rule is preserved in the modern cases. (The Queen v. Slatter, 11 Adolph. & EL 505-508; The Same v. Quayle; Regina v. Armstrong, 34 Law and Eq. 290, 1856.) This case, then, is one of the special cases named in our Constitution. (People v. Scrugham, 20 Barb. 203-205.)

The first reply to the objection based on Turner's ineligibility is, that the answer of Haynes does not state the emoluments of the office held by Turner. The term "lucrative office" is a conclusion of law. It is said that he held the office of Inspector of Customs, but avers no fact as to the emoluments.

But is an Inspector of Customs such an officer as the State Constitution contemplates? All officers under the Federal Government, except in cases where the Constitution itself provides, are to be established by law, (The United States v. Maurice, 2 Brock. 96,) and they must be appointed by the President, unless in cases where Congress by law vests the appointment of inferior officers in Courts of Law, "or the heads of departments."

Chief Justice Marshall says in that case that an office is defined to be "a public charge or employment;" and he who performs the duties of the office is an officer. And although an office is "an employment," it does not follow that every employment is an office.

The Act of the 2d of March, 1799, (1 Stat. at L. 641; Brightly's Dig. p. 319, Sec. 3,) provides the mode of appointing Inspectors, in the section defining the duties of Collectors. They "shall, with the approbation of the principal officer of the treasury department, employ proper persons as Weighers, Gaugers, Measurers, and Inspectors, at the several ports within their districts." By Section 31 of the Act fixing compensation at two dollars per day, authority is given to employ "occasional Inspectors;" and by Section 41, where the compensation is increased fifty per cent. "persons employed as occasional Inspectors," are mentioned.

In the case of The United States v. Wood, (2 Gallison, 361,) Judge Story decides that the office is held at the pleasure of the Saunders v. Haynes.

Collector, and ceases at his death, resignation, or removal. (See also Respublica v. Dallas, 3 Yeates, 314, 315; 17 S. & R. 219.)

This employment being at the mere will of the Collector, and probably an "occasional" employment besides, no information would lie at the instance of the Government for an alleged usurpation of its duties. (State v. Champlin, 2 Bailey, 223.)

It is argued that all votes cast for Turner were so many blanks, and count for Haynes. This is not the law of this State. The Legislature ruled on this question in the Duncombe case at the present session. (See, also, Whitman's case.)

The rule is, that a candidate holding the federal office is not ineligible, but that he cannot hold both the federal and State office; the acceptance of the last is not forbidden, but the effect of the acceptance is to vacate the first. (4 Md.; Rodman v. Harcourt, 4 B. Monroe, 225.)

BALDWIN, J. delivered the opinion of the Court — TERRY, C. J. concurring.

This was a proceeding under the Statute of 1850, (Wood's Dig. 389,) for contesting the election of defendant as Judge of the District Court for the Eighth District. It was brought before the County Judge of Klamath County, one of the counties of that district.

The grounds of the contest are misconduct in the officers conducting the election, whereby the defendant was improperly returned as elected, when one of his competitors received the highest number of legal votes.

1. The first point made by the Appellant is, that the County Judge had no jurisdiction to try a contested election for District Judge; but that his jurisdiction is limited to county officers.

The case of Whipley v. McKune was brought before the County Judge, though but one county composed the Sixth District. In that case, however, no point was made as to the jurisdiction of the Judge.

The statute evidently designed to afford a new and summary remedy in cases of contested elections, applying to all offices filled by popular vote, except those elected by the State at large. The general election law is divided into chapters, each entitled of the subject matter, which titles seem to be parts of the Act.

Saunders v. Haynes.

---

After prescribing the general machinery of elections, follows chapter six, entitled "Contesting elections other than for members of the Legislature, Governor, and Lieutenant-Governor." The first section of this chapter provides, "that any elector of the proper county may contest the right of any person declared duly elected to an office to be exercised in and for said county." This language, it is true, is not as clearly expressive of the legislative intent to include the office of District Judge within its purview as might be wished.

The Judge of the District Court unquestionably exercises his office in and for each county of his district, though it is very true that his jurisdiction is not confined to any one county of his district. The verbiage is peculiar; if the intent were to limit the operation of the Act to county offices, it would have been a simple mode of expression to say that an elector for any county may contest the right of any one declared elected to any county office of the county of the elector's residence. But when, in addition to this, we see a remedy of this same general character provided for all other officers, except State officers, and the title of the chapter—not of the general Act—is as we have stated, and when, further, the words certainly embrace the case of a District Judge, when the county comprises his district—the conclusion would seem to be that the statute meant to embrace the case. Closer examination of the Act confirms this view. The language, "Any elector of the proper county may contest the right, etc., to an office to be exercised in and for such county." The next clause of the same section, which applies to the township offices, uses different language: "Any elector of a township may contest the right of any person declared duly elected to any office in and for such township." Why this distinction in the phraseology, if it were intended to confine the contest to county and township officers? But Section 55 of the Act seems to remove all difficulty, for it provides that no person shall be competent to contest any election unless he is a qualified elector of the district, county, or township, in which the office is to be exercised. The word "district" here, evidently, from the collocation of the words, does not refer to any electoral divisions of a county or a township, but to such a division of the State. And by Section 73, "When the election is annulled and no appeal, the certificate or commission shall be rendered valid."

Saunders v. Haynes.

---

Now, no commissions issue to county officers except to the County Judge, who, of course, could not sit on his own case, and therefore is not within the Act, and hence it would seem that the District Judge was meant to be included, as the only officer to whom this expression would apply. A close examination of the seventy-four sections of this Act fails to show any single expression which indicates that the intent was to embrace only county officers within the statute. On the contrary, general expressions are used, which embrace, without straining, the office in question. It is true that some embarrassments may arise in contesting elections in one county when the result of the entire election depends on the returns or acts done or omitted in other counties; but this same difficulty exists in proceedings by quo warranto. And the fact that the Judge of the District Court is, or may be, a party to this proceeding, may have been an additional reason for embracing the case within this special jurisdiction.

2. It is objected that this Act is unconstitutional. The grounds of this objection are, that by the Constitution, jurisdiction is given to the District Courts in all cases of law and equity where the amount in controversy exceeds two hundred dollars. Conceding, for the argument, that an office like this has an ascertained value as property, yet the argument cannot be maintained. This proceeding is not according to the course of the common law; it gives new rights and remedies. By the common law an election could not be contested by an elector. The Government might, by proceeding of quo warranto, eject an intruder from office; but this it did by virtue of its sovereign power, and by a process analogous to a criminal prosecution.

The Statute of 1850 creates a special proceeding, wholly distinct in form, and substantially different from this common law remedy. It appoints a tribunal for settling these peculiar controversies. This is one of the "special cases" for which the Constitution has provided that the County Judge may take cognizance of by legislative direction. It is an inquisition of office, as much within the jurisdiction of this officer as would be a writ of ad quod damnum, or of lunacy, or insolvent proceedings, or forcible entry and detainer. And the mere fact that a pecuniary interest, over two hundred dollars in value, might be incidentally affected, is no reason why the jurisdiction should be denied.

Saunders v. Haynes.

---

3. The next error assigned is, the sustaining of the demurrer to so much of defendant's answer as sets up this defense: "And for further answer, the defendant says that all of the votes of said election, cast for said Turner, are null and void, for he charges that the said Turner was, at the time of the alleged election, ineligible to the office of District Judge, for that the said Turner, for a long time previous to, and on the said first Wednesday of September, 1858, held, and at the present time holds, the office of Inspector of Customs for the port of Trinidad, in the State of California, and that said office was, at the time of said election, and is, a lucrative office under the Government of the United States, and defendant says he received the highest number of legal votes for the office of Judge," etc.

It will be observed that the point of this defense is, that the votes cast for Turner, supposing he received the highest number, were nullities, because of his assumed ineligibility. But we do not so consider. Although some old cases may be found affirming this doctrine, we think that the better opinion at this day is, that it is not correct.

The celebrated controversy in the British Parliament between Wilkes and Luttrell has given rise to much discussion; and the opinions of jurists and statesmen have been somewhat divided. But the prevailing opinion, English and American, of modern times, seems to be against the precedent established in that case. In the case of Whitman and Melony, (10 Cal. 38) Mr. Justice Field clearly intimates his opinion in favor of the principle that the votes given for an ineligible candidate are not to be counted for the next highest candidate on the poll. In The State of Wisconsin v. Giles, (1 Chandler, 117,) the same doctrine is held; and it is enforced by the Judges of the Supreme Court of Maine, in their opinion, to be found in 38 Maine Rep. 597.

Our legislative precedents seem to be the same way. Upon principle, we think the law should so be ruled. An election is the deliberate choice of a majority or plurality of the electoral body. This is evidenced by the votes of the electors. But if a majority of those voting, by mistake of law or fact, happen to cast their votes upon an ineligible candidate, it by no means follows that the next to him on the poll should receive the office. If this be so, a candidate might be elected who received only a small portion of the votes, and who never could have been elected at all but for this mistake. The votes are not less legal votes because given to a person in whose behalf they cannot be counted; and the person who is the next to him on the list of candidates does not receive a plurality of votes because his competitor was ineligible. The votes cast for the latter, it is true, cannot be counted for him; but that is no reason why they should, in effect, be counted for the former, who, possibly, could never have received them. It is fairer, more just, and more consistent, with the theory of our institutions, to hold the votes so cast as merely ineffectual for the purpose of an election, than to give them the effect of disappointing the popular will, and electing to office a man whose pretensions the people had designed to reject.

This view disposes of the whole matter of the demurrer; for the matter set up was no defense to the petition if it were sufficient to defeat the election of Turner. For it was not necessary to a judgment against the defendant in this proceeding, that Turner should show any claim to the office; it was enough that the defendant had none.

But, in order to terminate this controversy, we have examined the sufficiency of this matter of defense as affecting the right of Turner. The Constitution declares that any person holding a lucrative office under the Federal Government shall be ineligible to a State office. Some question has been made whether this provision is anything more than a provision forbidding the acceptance of the State office when the disqualifying fact exists. (See 4 B. Monroe, 225.) But we assume, as seems to be intimated in Whitman and Melony's case, that the fact creates an incapacity to be elected to the office. The question arises, is this place or employment of Inspector of the Customs a lucrative office under the Government of the United States. An Inspector of Customs, under the Federal law, seems to be an employee of the Collector of the district, appointed by him and removable at his pleasure. (2 Gall. 361.) The Act of Congress of 2d March, 1799, (1 U. S. St. at Large, 641,) defining the duties of Collectors, says they shall, with the approbation of the principal officer of the Treasury Department, employ proper persons as Weighers, Gaugers, Measurers, and Inspectors, at the several ports within their districts. This Act fixes the compensation at two dollars per day; it is now, we believe, three dollars. By Section 41, authority is given to employ "occasional Inspectors."

An analogous provision to ours exists in the Pennsylvania laws. In Commonwealth v. Binns, (17 Sergeant & Rawle, 220,) the whole question is discussed with great learning and ability, and it is there held that a Government Printer was not within the meaning of the Act.

In United States v. Maurice, (2 Brock. R. 96,) Chief Justice Marshall gives the definition of an office: "Federal officers, except in cases where the Constitution itself provides, are to be established by law, and officers must be appointed by the President, unless in cases where Congress, by law, vests the appointment of inferior officers in Courts of Law, or in the heads of departments; and further, that an office is defined to be a public charge or employment, and he who performs the duty of the office is an officer. And although an office is an employment, it does not follow that every employment is an office."

We see no more reason for holding that an Inspector is an officer than a Weigher, Measurer, Clerk, Printer, Drayman, Porter, or other employee, dependent for his wages upon his labor, and for his employment, upon the pleasure of a subordinate officer of the Government.

Judgment affirmed.

On petition for rehearing, the following opinion was delivered by BALDWIN, J.—TERRY, C. J. concurring:

We have given the argument of the Appellant's counsel a reconsideration, as desired. We adhere to the positions in our former opinion: 1st. That the Act giving this jurisdiction over the subject of contested elections to the Judge of the County Court is constitutional, and that Judges of the District Court are embraced within it. 2d. That the fact that the highest candidate is ineligible, does not give the election to the next on the list. 3d. That the special defense set up in the answer—the ineligibility of Turner—was no bar to the proceeding, because this matter, if true, did not protect the incumbent from the comsequences of an unauthorized possession of the office. But it was not necessary to hold, in order to decide the case before us, that the place or employment of Inspector of Customs was not an office under the United States, within the meaning of the Constitution of the State. Neither the Government, nor Judge Turner, the claimant of this judicial office, is before us, and therefore, neither could be bound by the judgment of the County Judge, which only determines that the defendant is not entitled to the office, and furnishes the Executive with prima facie evidence that Judge Turner is. The forcible argument addressed to us by the defendant's counsel suggests sufficient doubts of the correctness of the last proposition of the opinion, to leave the question open and undecided until a case shall be presented directly raising it, and all the facts touching the matter brought out, and an opportunity be afforded for fuller consideration. We, therefore, deny the prayer of the petition for a rehearing, but modify the opinion in the manner suggested.

BURNETT v. WHITESIDES et als.

An injunction ought not to be granted, unless equitable circumstances, beyond the mere allegation of irreparable injury, be shown — as insolvency, impediments to a judgment at law, or to adequate legal relief, or a threatened destruction of the property, or the like.

The entire equity of the bill in this case being denied in the answer, and there being no support of the bill, the injunction was dissolved.

Reardan, Mitchell & Smith, for Respondent.

1. To authorize the issuance of an injunction, there must be such an injury, as from its nature is not susceptible of being adequately compensated for in damages. (3 Daniel's Ch. Prac. and Plead. 1859; Dana v. Valentine, 5 Met. 8; Ingraham v. Dunnell, 5 Id. 118; 2 Story's Eq. Juris. Sec. 925.) 2. Plaintiff's right to the use of the water was undetermined, and an injunction should issue in such a case only when the right to its enjoyment was not disputed. (Gardner v. Trustees of Newburgh, 2 Johns. Ch. 165; Van Bergen v. Van Bergen, 2 Johns. Ch. 272; Middleton v. Franklin, 3 Cal. 238; Hart v. Mayor of Albany, 3 Paige, 213; Corporation of New York v. Mapes, 6 Johns. Ch. 46; Attorney-General v. Hunt, 1 Dev. Eq. 12.) 3. The granting and continuance of an injunction lies in the sound discretion of the Court. (Roberts v. Anderson, 2 Johns. Ch. 202; Hilton v. Earl of Granville, Cr. and Ph. 283; James v. Lamley, 2 Iredell's Eq. 278.) The injunction was properly dissolved because the equities of the bill were denied by the answer. (Morse v. Terrell, 1 Kelly, 7.)

BALDWIN, J. delivered the opinion of the Court — TERRY, C. J. concurring.

This appeal is from an order dissolving an injunction. The injunction was granted to restrain the defendants from diverting the water of a certain stream from the plaintiff's ditch, the plaintiff claiming a prior appropriation and averring irreparable injury. The answer denies the equity of the bill, averring that the ditch of defendant only diverted the water not appropriated by the plaintiff. The fact further appears that the ditch of defendants has been constructed for several years within the knowledge of the plaintiff. The motion was heard on complaint and answer. There is no allegation of the insolvency of defendants.

nor that they will not be able to answer all damages recoverable at law, nor any peculiar grounds shown why a recovery could not be had at law for these damages.

It presents the naked case of a claim of property and for damages made, and this claim denied, and no proof of the claim; and no showing of irreparable damage nor equitable circumstances calling for the interposition of the restraining power of the Court. Prima facie, the party in possession of this water is at least as much entitled to the property as a claimant out of possession; and the answer of the defendants as much proof of the defendants' right as the complaint of the plaintiff is evidence of his right. The granting and dissolving of injunctions is very much a matter of discretion, but this discretion must be regulated by sound and just rules. For a Court of Chancery to interpose in such a case as this, might lead to the very hardships and irreparable injury which is the ground of the claim of plaintiff to its interference. It ought not to interpose, unless under very peculiar circumstances, when long delays have intervened since the alleged injury or cause of it existed; nor ought it to interpose unless some equitable circumstances beyond the general allegation of irreparable injury be shown — such as insolvency, or impediments to a judgment at law, or to adequate legal relief — or a threatened destruction of the property or the like. But it is enough for this case to hold that as the entire equity of the bill is denied in the answer, and there is no support of the bill, the injunction should be dissolved. (Gardner v. Perkins, 9 Cal. 553.)

We understand that to be this case.

. People v. Rogers.

On a rehearing, the following opinion was delivered by BALDWIN, J.—TERRY, C. J. concurring:

In this case a rehearing was granted. An opinion was rendered by Mr. Justice Burnett, and concurred in. We think, on a re-examination, that this opinion is correct on the proposition before the Court; but that it is not necessary to express any opinion as to the necessity of recording mining claims. That question is reserved. With this qualification, we adopt that opinion, and the result of it, as the judgment of the Court.

STATE OF CALIFORNIA v. ROGERS, ADM'RS, ETC.

THE Constitution is not a grant of power or an enabling act to the Legislature. It is a limitation on the general powers of a legislative character, and restrains only so far as the restriction appears, either by express terms or by necessary inference.

The Act of April 10th, 1856, permitting non-resident aliens to inherit real and personal estate, is constitutional.

The Constitution (Art. 1, Sec. 17) gives the bona fide resident alien certain rights, which may be enlarged, but cannot be abridged by the Legislature.

APPEAL from the Fourth District.

The Attorney-General filed in the Fourth District an information, setting forth that David Morgan and Isaac Levick had died seized of certain real estate, situated in the city of San Francisco, without heirs capable of inheriting, and claimed that the estate had escheated to the State.

The Administrator and terre-tenants put in an answer denying the facts stated in the information, and also set forth that there were heirs who, at the time, were non-resident.

Two of the heirs of David Morgan, by their Attorneys in fact, filed a demurrer, on the ground that no cause of action had accrued to the State, inasmuch as five years had not elapsed since they had inherited the same. This demurrer the Court overruled. An answer was then put in, to which a demurrer was interposed, and this was also overruled. From this order the appeal is taken.

Thomas H. Williams, Attorney-General, and B. S. Brooks, for Appellant. I. The right of the State to succeed to all lands or other property for which there are no heirs is not derived from the common law. We do not derive it from the feudal system. (4 Kent Com. 423, et seq.)

People v. Rogers.

"It is clear by the common law that an alien can take lands by purchase, though not by descent, or in other words, he cannot take by the act of the law, but he may by the act of the party. The principle has been settled in the year books, and has been uniformly recognized as sound law from that time." (11 Hen. IV. 26; 12 Hen. IV. 20; Co. Litt. 2 b.; Jac. Law Dic. "Alien;" Fairfax, Devisee v. Hunter's Lessee, 7 Cranch, 603; S. P. Dawson's Lessee v. Godfrey, 4 Cranch, 321; Craig v. Radford, 3 Wheat. 594; Orr v. Hodgson et al. 4 Wheat. 433; 9 Wheat. 354; 11 Wheat. 332; 3 Peters, 126; 6 Peters, 162; Orr v. Hodgson et al. 4 Wheat. 453; Blight's Lessee v. Rochester, 7 Wheat. 535; People v. Conklin, 2 Hill, 71.) If the disability of the alien to inherit depended entirely upon the common law, the disability created by the adoption of the common law would be removed by a subsequent statute introducing a different rule; and such, it is contended, is the effect of the Statute of April 19, 1856. It, therefore, becomes necessary to inquire whether that law is constitutional.

The Constitution, Art. I, Sec. 17, says: "Foreigners who are, or may hereafter become, bona fide residents of this State, shall enjoy the same rights in respect to the possession, enjoyment, and inheritance, of property, as native-born citizens."

The Court in the case of Farrell and Wife v. Enright, (12 Cal. 450,) hold language decisive of the point in question. In that case the intestate died 16th April, 1850. The plaintiff was at that time a non-resident alien. The Court held that the plaintiff could not recover. There the death occurred after the adoption of the common law, and before the passage of the Act of April 19, 1856.

One position assumed by the counsel for the Respondent, is by this decision disposed of — that is, that the Respondents can become bona fide residents within the meaning of the Constitution after the descent cast; and it is settled that the capacity to take or hold, depends upon the status of the claimant at the time of the descent cast.

But in order to get a proper construction of this clause of the Constitution, it is necessary to ascertain what was the status of the alien at the moment of its adoption, and thereby to discover in what status it left the non-resident alien. The decision which I have above quoted, declares: "The clause of the Constitution cited, only removes the disability of alienage to such foreigners as are bona fide residents; it leaves the rights of non-resident foreigners in respect to real property as it exists at the common law." This is the very point in dispute. Whether at the time of the adoption of the Constitution, aliens were disabled to inherit, and the Constitution removed an existing disability, or whether, as the Respondent contends, there was then no such disability, and the clause of the Constitution only imposed upon the Legislature a restraint from creating the disability in the expressed cases, and left the rest to the discretion of the Legislature—or whether it "left the rights of non-resident foreigners, in respect to real property, as it exists at the common law."

People v. Rogers.

Whether the common law was in any respect in operation at the time of the adoption of the Constitution, admits of argument. As a rule of decision as to private rights, it was not in force until the adoption of the common law by the Legislature. But in respect to political rights, it was in force. In all cases where clauses of the Federal or State Constitutions are construed, constant reference is made to the common law to ascertain the status of the subject matter at the time of the adoption of the constitutional provision. "By the rules of construction, heretofore adopted, this clause negatives any supposed rights which non-resident aliens would otherwise have to inherit." "We are of opinion that the Constitution expressly prohibits the plaintiffs from inheritance, and that being thus incapacitated, they cannot maintain an action of ejectment, and that their rights have not been enlarged in this respect, by treaty." (Siemssen v. Bofer, 6 Cal. 250.)

If the clause in question negatives any supposed rights of non-resident aliens to inherit, and expressly prohibits them, according to the rules of construction heretofore adopted by this Court, it is not in the power of the Legislature to remove the negation or prohibition. (Sedgwick on Stat. and Con. L. 493.)

The alien has no rights in regard to the real property within a State except such as are expressly given by the State. His status at the time of the formation of the State is, in this respect,

Now, no commissions issue to county officers except to the County Judge, who, of course, could not sit on his own case, and therefore is not within the Act, and hence it would seem that the District Judge was meant to be included, as the only officer to whom this expression would apply. A close examination of the seventy-four sections of this Act fails to show any single expression which indicates that the intent was to embrace only county officers within the statute. On the contrary, general expressions are used, which embrace, without straining, the office in question. It is true that some embarrassments may arise in contesting elections in one county when the result of the entire election depends on the returns or acts done or omitted in other counties; but this same difficulty exists in proceedings by quo warranto. And the fact that the Judge of the District Court is, or may be, a party to this proceeding, may have been an additional reason for embracing the case within this special jurisdiction.

2. It is objected that this Act is unconstitutional. The grounds of this objection are, that by the Constitution, jurisdiction is given to the District Courts in all cases of law and equity where the amount in controversy exceeds two hundred dollars. Conceding, for the argument, that an office like this has an ascertained value as property, yet the argument cannot be maintained. This proceeding is not according to the course of the common law; it gives new rights and remedies. By the common law an election could not be contested by an elector. The Government might, by proceeding of quo warranto, eject an intruder from office; but this it did by virtue of its sovereign power, and by a process analogous to a criminal prosecution.

3. The next error assigned is, the sustaining of the demurrer to so much of defendant's answer as sets up this defense: "And for further answer, the defendant says that all of the votes of said election, cast for said Turner, are null and void, for he charges that the said Turner was, at the time of the alleged election, ineligible to the office of District Judge, for that the said Turner, for a long time previous to, and on the said first Wednesday of September, 1858, held, and at the present time holds, the office of Inspector of Customs for the port of Trinidad, in the State of California, and that said office was, at the time of said election, and is, a lucrative office under the Government of the United States, and defendant says he received the highest number of legal votes for the office of Judge," etc.

It will be observed that the point of this defense is, that the votes cast for Turner, supposing he received the highest number, were nullities, because of his assumed ineligibility. But we do not so consider. Although some old cases may be found affirming this doctrine, we think that the better opinion at this day is, that it is not correct.

The celebrated controversy in the British Parliament between Wilkes and Luttrell has given rise to much discussion; and the opinions of jurists and statesmen have been somewhat divided. But the prevailing opinion, English and American, of modern times, seems to be against the precedent established in that case. In the case of Whitman and Melony, (10 Cal. 38) Mr. Justice Field clearly intimates his opinion in favor of the principle that the votes given for an ineligible candidate are not to be counted for the next highest candidate on the poll. In The State of Wisconsin v. Giles, (1 Chandler, 117,) the same doctrine is held; and it is enforced by the Judges of the Supreme Court of Maine, in their opinion, to be found in 38 Maine Rep. 597.

Our legislative precedents seem to be the same way. Upon principle, we think the law should so be ruled. An election is the deliberate choice of a majority or plurality of the electoral body. This is evidenced by the votes of the electors. But if a majority of those voting, by mistake of law or fact, happen to cast their votes upon an ineligible candidate, it by no means follows that and the heirs, put in answer denying the facts stated in the information. The Administrator is the representative of the creditors, and he has a lien upon the estate for the payment of the debts due from the estate to the creditors and the expenses of administration. (Beckett et al. v. Selover, 7 Cal. 215.)

BALDWIN, J. delivered the opinion of the Court — TERRY, C. J. concurring.

This is an information of escheat, filed by the Attorney-General, to establish the State's interest in certain real estate to which it is alleged the State has title, in consequence of the alienage of those who would otherwise be entitled.

It is conceded by the Attorney-General, that this claim of the State must fail, if the act of the Legislature of April 19th, 1856, entitled "An Act relative to Escheated Estates," (Stat. of 1856, 137,) be constitutional. That Act provides:

"SECTION 1. Aliens shall hereafter inherit, and hold by inheritance, real and personal estate, in as full a manner as though they were native-born citizens of this or the United States; provided, that no non-resident foreigner, or foreigners, shall hold or enjoy any real estate, situated within the limits of the State of California, five years after the time such non-resident foreigner, or foreigners, shall inherit the same; but in case such non-resident foreigner, or foreigners, do not appear or claim such estate within the period in this section before mentioned, then such estate shall be sold, upon information of the Attorney-General, according to law, and the proceeds deposited in the treasury of said State, for the benefit of such non-resident foreigner, or foreigners, or their legal representatives—to be paid to them by the Treasurer of said State, at any time within five years thereafter, when such non-resident foreigner, or foreigners, or their representatives, shall produce evidence, to the satisfaction of the Treasurer and Controller of State, that such foreigner, or foreigners, are the legal heirs to, and entitled to inherit such estate, which evidence, together with the joint order of the said Treasurer and Controller, shall be placed on file in the office of the Treasurer, and shall be to him a voucher for any payments made by him under the provisions of this Act; and in the event that such non-resident foreigner, or foreigners, do not appear or claim said estate or preceeds, and produce said evidence within said extended term of five years, then said estate or proceeds shall be and become the property of the State, and shall be by the Treasurer of State placed to the credit of the School Fund.

SEC. 2. All Acts and parts of Acts conflicting with the provisions of this Act are hereby repealed."

The constitutional provision, Sec. 17, Art. I, provides: "Foreigners who are, or may hereafter become, bona fide residents of this State, shall enjoy the same rights in respect to the possession, enjoyment, and inheritance, of property as native-born citizens." This provision was construed, recently, by this Court, in the case of Farrell v. Enright, 12 Cal. 450. It was held in that case, that, to entitle the alien to hold real estate, the descent of which was cast prior to the Act of 1856, such alien must be a resident of the State at the time of the descent. But the Act of 1856 was not involved in the decision.

It is contended by the Appellant that the clause of the Constitution is restrictive as well as enabling; that its terms exclude any other rights or privileges to aliens than those given. We think this view erroneous. The Constitution is not a grant of power or an enabling Act to the Legislature. It is a limitation on the general powers of a legislative character, and restrains only so far as the restriction appears, either by express terms or by necessary inference. (4 Cal. 46; 6 Ind. 88.)

The object of this provision was to secure a certain protection to such resident aliens as might be in the State at the time of a descent. But this short sentence was not designed to comprehend all the law in respect to aliens. The Legislature could not, indeed, abridge this privilege, but it was not disabled from extending it or adding other privileges. It might as well be urged that because the Constitution provided that no law should be passed impairing the obligation of contracts, no legislative regulation could be had; or, because a homestead was exempted from forced sale, there could be no exemption of other property. The alien is secured by the Constitution in this one privilege, but he may be secured by the Legislature in as many more as it chooses to give, provided there is no conflict with any constitutional restrictions upon its power; of which this provision is not one.

The Administrator, having possession of the real estate, could well set up this defense. The statute denies any present right to the State to take the property; and it is a good answer to one in possession to show a want of power in him who seeks to disturb it.

WILSON v. CORBIER et als.

No law authorizes a Recorder or Clerk of a county to record a copy of a deed in the Spanish language so as to make it evidence, without further proof. The fact that a party had cattle on the land, or was there for short periods himself, or that he claimed within given limits, is, in the absence of any inclosure or some visible physical signs of the extent of his boundaries or claim, insufficient to show the fact of possession of any particular tract, when others were also in possession.

APPEAL from the Fifteenth District.

Ejectment for a tract of land, being a part of the Jimeno Grant, in Colusa County. Plaintiff, in deraigning title from Jimeno, offered and read in evidence a copy of the grant, with translation attached. Next, he offered a book from the Recorder's office of Colusa County, and asked to read therefrom, what purported to be a copy, in the Spanish language, of a deed from Jimeno to Larkin and Missroon, executed in 1847. To the introduction of which defendants objected, on various grounds, but mainly that the deed, as recorded in said book, purported to be a copy; that there was no proof of the execution of an original, and that the original did not appear to have been properly acknowledged, or proved and certified. Plaintiff then proved that he had made search for the original deed, without success. The Court ruled out the deed, and plaintiff excepted.

The Court below nonsuited the plaintiff, on the ground that he had failed to show any title or any possession by himself or his grantors, either actual or constructive, prior to the possession of defendants. Plaintiff appeals.

Sanders & Edwards, for Appellant.

The law does not impose on the holder of a conveyance, from a Mexican to an American, the necessity of proving the existence of an instrument made in the Mexican language, or its acknowledgment according to the forms of our law. Before the conquest, or organization of the State Government of California, such papers prove themselves, and the circumstance of the record is sufficient evidence of their existence. The circumstance of the instrument being in the Spanish language is no objection; rather a support of our position of its antiquity. Our law authorizes the employment of an Interpreter, or his appointment when required. An ex parte interpretation would be rejected.

Belcher & Belcher, for Respondents.

To support ejectment, title or prior possession must be shown. (Treadwell v. Payne, 5 Cal. 310; Wadsworth v. Fulton, 1 Id. 295.) Prior possession is sufficient to maintain ejectment, but it must be an actual bona fide occupation, a possessio pedis. That the cattle of the claimant, or those through whom he claims, have roamed over and grazed upon portions of a large tract is not sufficient. (Plum v. Seward, 4 Cal. 94; Murphy v. Wallingford, 6 Id. 648; Suñol v. Hepburn, 1 Id. 255.)

BALDWIN, J. delivered the opinion of the Court — TERRY, C. J. concurring.

The plaintiff failed to deraign title. The deed from Jimeno to Larkin and Missroon was not proven. The deed was executed in 1847, and made a record in the office of Colton, Alcalde of Monterey. A copy in the Spanish language appears to be on the records of Colusa County. But we know no law which authorized the Recorder or Clerk of Colusa to record this copy so as to make it evidence, without further proof. This throws on the plaintiff the burden of showing a possessio pedis in himself, or in some predecessor through whom he deduces title. But we see no such evidence in the record. Though some evidence exists of his predecessor, Missroon, being on the premises, yet we see no sufficient proof of any distinct or exclusive possession on his part of any given quantity of land. The fact that he had cattle on the land, or was there for short periods himself, or that he claimed within given limits is, in the absence of any inclosure, or some visible physical signs of the extent of its boundaries or claim insufficient to show the fact of possession of any particular tract, when others were also in possession. We think that this qualified and equivocal possession of Missroon, therefore, did not give him a right to sue for the land, as against these defendants, and that his grantees could not maintain this action upon their deed and his possession.

As the nonsuit determines nothing, the plaintiff may proceed, and, under better proof, if he can procure it, try his case anew.

Judgment affirmed.

GOODWIN et al. v. HAMMOND *et al.

AN answer responsive to and denying the charges in a bill of equity is not evidence for the defendant, though the bill be sustained by one witness only. The Practice Act, as to evidence at least, governs all cases legal or equitable by the same rules.

If an instrument be void for actual fraud ab initio, it is void for every purpose of protection to the fraudulent actor, and will not be allowed to stand as security for advances made.

APPEAL from the Fourth District.

The bill was based upon an attachment levied by plaintiffs, as creditors of defendants, Chittle & Wardner, on the stock in the California Coal Company, transferred by them to defendant, Hammond. Plaintiff had judgment, and defendant, Hammond, who alone answered, appeals.

Yale, for Appellant. 1. Where the answer to a bill in equity denies positively the allegations of the bill, the answer must be disproved by two witnesses, or by one witness and corroborating circumstances. (Practice Act, Secs. 46, 51, 52; Brooks v. Chilton, 6 Cal. 640; Practice Act, Secs. 113, 37, 53; 2 Cal. 593; Id. 378; Practice Act, Sec. 417; 5 Cal. 192; Id. 448; 4 Id. 6, 366; 9 Cranch, 160; 6 Vesey, 40; 2 Id. 244; Greenleaf Ev. Secs. 255, 351; *Story's Eq. The rule derives more force by reference to the Acts relating to the books of mining corporations. (See Sec. 18 of Act April 14th, 1853; Wood's Digest, 122, Art. 497; Act of March 27th, 1857, Sec. 1.) tions detailed. 2. The decree is erroneous in setting aside the transfer in toto. It is good to the extent of the actual consideration paid. (Hardy v. Handy, 11 Wheat. 126.)

Harmon & Labatt, for Respondent, argued that if the rule in chancery were as stated by the Appellant's counsel, it has no application to this case; that the rule only applies when the plaintiff, of his own accord, swears to his bill, or calls upon defendant to answer under oath. (Story's Eq. Juris. Sec. 1528; Searcey v. Pannell, Cooke's R. 110, cited in Note to Field v. Holland, 2 Pet. Cond. 294.) And that the Practice Act, (Sec. 417,) controls the question. (See, also, Story's Eq. Juris. Sec. 1493.) The only way for a party to give evidence is prescribed by that Act, in Section 418. (3 Greenleaf Ev. Sec. 257, and Note 2.) Besides, the rule never did apply to cases of fraud.

As to holding the stock as security for advances, notwithstanding the fraud, see Borland v. Walker (7 Ala. 280); Sands v. Codwise (4 Johns. 536).

BALDWIN, J. delivered the opinion of the Court—TERRY, C. J. concurring.

Bill to set aside as fraudulent two transfers of stock of the California Coal Company, from the defendants, Chittle and Wardner, to defendant Hammond.

The Court below, on express evidence of the existence of the fraud, found for the plaintiff.

Several points are made by the Appellant.

1. That this proof was made by one witness only, and this in contradiction to the defendant's answer, which was responsive to, and negatived the charge in the bill; and that, by the rule of equity pleading, this is not sufficient.

The point is not well taken. We have held recently, in several cases, that the Practice Act governs all cases of pleading, legal and equitable, by the same rules, at least in this respect; and that the answer is not evidence for the defendant.

2. That the decree is against evidence. We have looked into the proof, and think it sustains the decree; at least, that the Judge below had legal evidence before him of the alleged fraud, and we do not see any such error as would justify our interference with his conclusion.

Fee v. Starr and Grimshaw.

3. That the decree is erroneous, in setting aside the transfer in toto, and not allowing the alleged fraudulent vendee to hold the stock as security, to reimburse him for the amounts expended by him in purchase money and assessments.

In some cases of mere constructive frauds, this principle is held by Courts of Equity, and in some instances of actual fraud the like doctrine has been maintained. But these last are rare exceptions to the general rule. Where the fraud is actual and characterizes the transaction ab initio, we think the better rule is, that the deed is void for any purpose of protection to the fraudulent actor. (See Borland v. Walker, 7 Ala. 280; Sands v. Codwise, 4 Johns. 536; where the authorities are collected.)

The decree is affirmed.

APPEAL from the Twelfth District.

Complaint averred as in syllabus. Defendant demurred: 1. That the complaint did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. 2. That several causes of action were improperly united, without being separately stated.

Demurrer overruled, with leave to answer on payment of costs. Defendant excepted, failed to pay the costs, and final judgment was entered for plaintiffs. Defendant appeals.

- In criminal cases the principles of law invoked by the defendant should be stated to the jury in clear and explicit terms. And the error of refusing a proper instruction is not cured by the fact that it was in substance given by the Court.
- If an instruction be refused for the reason that it has already been given, the reason of the refusal should be stated, so as not to mislead the jury.

APPEAL from the Court of Sessions, San Joaquin County.

Indictment for larceny. The instructions which it is stated, in the opinion of the Court, should have been given are so obviously correct, that it is useless to print them.

H. Amyx, for Appellant.

Attorney-General, for Respondent.

TERRY, C. J. delivered the opinion of the Court — BALDWIN, J. concurring.

The first, third, fifth, and sixth, instructions asked by the defendants, were certainly pertinent and proper, and the refusal to give them was error.

The Attorney-General seeks to avoid the consequence of this error by showing that these instructions were given in substance by the Court. But this is not sufficient. It is important to defendants in criminal cases that the principles of law which they invoke in their defense should be stated to the jury in clear and explicit terms, so that they may not be misunderstood. An instruction may be given in substance in language so different from that in which it was asked, as to be very difficult of comprehension, and it is always safer to repeat the instruction, than risk misleading the jury by the refusal of one which is proper and pertinent. At any rate, if an instruction is refused, for the reason that it has already been given, the reason of the refusal should be stated. (People v. Hurley, 8 Cal. 390.)

CLARY v. HOAGLAND.

In this case the application for certiorari showing on its face that the party had an adequate legal remedy by appeal, the writ was denied.

PETITION for a writ of certiorari to the County Court of Yolo County.

In 1851, plaintiff brought forcible entry and detainer in a Justice's Court against defendant. Judgment was rendered for plaintiff for restitution of the premises, which judgment, on appeal, first to the County Court, thence on appeal, to the District Court, was affirmed in November, 1851.

Defendant then appealed to the Supreme Court, where, in October, 1852, the judgments of both the County and District Courts were reversed, and the cause remanded to the District Court for new trial. (2 Cal. 474.) The remittitur was filed in said Court November, 1853.

In February, 1855, plaintiff applied to the Clerk of the County Court for a writ of restitution upon the judgment as originally rendered in that Court. The Clerk refused the writ on the ground of reversal of the judgment by the Supreme Court. Upon application, the County Court ordered a mandamus, commanding the Clerk to issue the writ. This order was reviewed, and reversed by the Supreme Court, upon certiorari in October, 1855. (5 Cal. 476.) And in January and October, 1856, was again reviewed, with the same result. (6 Cal. 685.)

In March, 1854, upon motion of plaintiff, defendant being also represented, the District Court dismissed the case instead of proceeding with a new trial in accordance with the remittitur from the Supreme Court; the ground being, that said District Court, under late decisions, had no jurisdiction of an appeal from the County Court. Plaintiff took no further steps, until, in August, 1857, defendant obtained from the County Clerk an execution for costs, contending that plaintiff had virtually abandoned his suit. Plaintiff then procured an ex parte order from the County Court, preventing the enforcement of the execution, and also an order placing the cause on the calendar for trial.

Clary v. Hoagland.

Petitioner, upon this state of facts, applied to the Supreme Court for a certiorari to review the action of the County Court in placing the cause on the calendar for trial, on the ground of no jurisdiction in the Court, and no remedy by appeal.

Wynans & Zabriskie, for Petitioner.

1. The judgment of the Supreme Court in this case, rendered at the October Term, 1852, remanding the case back to the District Court for trial, was a final judgment, conclusive of the rights of the parties, and became the law of the case, and cannot be changed or modified; and the subsequent act of plaintiff in dismissing the case from said Court was a final determination of the action. (Clary v. Hoagland, 6 Cal. 687; Gunter v. Lafan, 7 Id. 588; Woodcock v. Parker, 35 Maine, 138; Van Dyke v. The People, 22 Ala. 57; Wood v. Wheeler, 7 Texas, 13; Dallan v. Bowman, 16 Miss. 225; Goodwin v. Huntington, 11 Illinois, 646.)

Even conceding that the judgment of the Supreme Court should have remanded the case to the County Court for trial, and that this Court has now the power to amend the same accordingly, still the acts of the plaintiff, in omitting to proceed with the case in the County Court for seven years, in dismissing it from the District Court, and in procuring an order for a writ of restitution in the County Court, was a waiver of his right of new trial in said Court, and a discontinuance of the cause. (Rutherford v. Folger, 1 Spencer, 299; Athlock v. Commonwealth, 73 Monroe, 44; Jackson v. Haveland, 13 Johnson, 229; Guffin v. Osborn, 20 Ala. 594; Puddlefield v. Bancroft, 22 Vt. 529; McGuire v. Hay, 6 Humphreys, 419; 3 Black. Com. 296, 316.)

Tpd Robinson and John Heard, contra — argued that petitioner has full remedy by appeal. (Practice Act, Secs. 336, 456.)

TERRY, C. J. delivered the opinion of the Court — BALDWIN, J. concurring.

Pattison v. Board of Supervisors of Yuba County.

In this case, as the application for a certiorari shows upon its face that the party has an adequate legal remedy, by appeal, from any judgment which may be rendered in the County Court to his prejudice, the petition is denied.

PATTISON v. BOARD OF SUPERVISORS OF YUBA COUNTY, AND THE SAN FRANCISCO AND MARYSVILLE RAILROAD COMPANY.

- QUESTIONS: Whether a tax-payer can interfere by injunction, to restrain the performance of a ministerial duty cast upon public officers by law, merely upon the ground that the effect, at some future time, if certain other things be done, might be to subject his property to taxation?
- To render a law unconstitutional, because opposed to the general policy of the Constitution, that policy must be manifested by the terms of the Constitution, fixing with precision the particular rule, and not as gathered by general inference.
- The 8th Article of the Constitution, prohibiting the State from creating debts over three hundred thousand dollars, or loaning its credit, etc. only applies to the State as a corporation — as a political sovereign, represented by her law-making power; and does not prevent the State authorizing counties or municipal corporations, to create debts, when the debt of the State itself is up to the constitutional limit.
- The State may have political subdivisions — that is, she may permit a portion of her powers of government to be exercised by local Agents. But, politically considered, geographical or political departments are no more the State, or a part of the State, than a man's land or his agent is a part of himself.
- There is no difference in this respect between a municipal corporation and a county. They are both political and geographical divisions of the State. They are both the subjects of its political dominion.
- The Legislature has a right to authorize a local tax for the purpose of internal improvements; it may authorize the local authorities to impose the tax; this authority may be given upon petition or without it, or by, or without, a submission of the proposition to the people, and it is not essential that the improvement should be within, or confined to the locality taxed, and a subscription for stock, to be paid for by taxation, is a valid contract to pay it.
- Under the Act of April 28th, 1857, authorizing the Supervisors of Yuba County to take stock in a railroad company, the stock may be taken in any railroad by which a railway connection shall be formed between Marysville and Benicia, or any point on the Sacramento River, at or near Knight's Ferry. The company in which the stock is taken need not be constituted for the express and only purpose of such connection, provided the effect of the work is to make the connection.

APPEAL from the Tenth District.

The case was tried upon an agreed statement, on demurrer and answer, submitting the two questions discussed in the opinion of the Court, the Court below dismissed the bill. Plaintiff appeals.

Reardan & Smith, for Appellant. I. The Board of Supervisors had no authority to subscribe to the capital stock of the "San Francisco and Marysville Railroad Company," even though the Act of the Legislature was constitutional. The Act under which the Board of Supervisors claim to derive their power to take this stock in the name of the county of Yuba, (Statutes of 1857, 296, Sec. 1,) makes it the duty of the Board to submit to the electors of Yuba County, at a general election, "The proposition for the Board of Supervisors of said county to take and subscribe two hundred thousand dollars to the capital stock of any railroad company, for the purpose of constructing any railroad, by which a railroad connection shall be formed between the city of Marysville and either the city of Benicia, or any point on the Sacramento River, at or near Knight's Ferry, or Sacramento City."

Pattison v. Board of Supervisors of Yuba County.

---

Now, the question is, has the Board of Supervisors subscribed the two hundred thousand dollars to the capital stock of any railroad company contemplated in the Act? We contend that this railroad company has quite a different object from that named in the Act.

The record shows that the San Francisco and Marysville Railroad Company is incorporated for the purpose of constructing a railroad from Marysville to Vallejo, and connecting by steamers with San Francisco. The company is not formed for the purpose of connecting Marysville either with Benicia, or any point on the Sacramento River.

In naming the city of Marysville, Benicia, Knight's Ferry, and Sacramento, the Legislature intended that Marysville, and either one of the other three points specified, should be the termini of the road.

The language of the act itself shows that the railroad company contemplated, was one that should be formed for the purpose of constructing a railroad from Marysville to one of the points designated. The stock is not to be subscribed for the purpose of constructing a railroad, but to a company organized for that purpose. We contend, therefore, that if the railroad extend beyond Knight's Ferry, it should terminate at Benicia.

The Supervisors, deriving their whole power from this statute, have undertaken to bind the county by subscribing the amount to the capital stock of a company whose road does not terminate at either of the three last named points, but at Vallejo, and not running nearer than six miles to Benicia; and not only that, but to a company whose purpose is to run a line of steamers between San Francisco and Vallejo, a distance of about thirty miles. The electors having voted to take stock in a railroad company, now find that they have become interested in navigating the San Francisco and San Pablo bays. The special power to subscribe in a railroad does not include the power to engage in building and running steamers between the terminus of the road and a point thirty miles distant.

Pattison v. Board of Supervisors of Yuba County.

---

II. Can the Legislature authorize a county to subscribe to the capital stock of any railroad or other incorporated company?

We contend that such power is withheld by the true intent of the Constitution, if not by express words. (Constitution, Art. XI, Secs. 10, 5.) Municipal Corporations are creatures of statute. Counties date their existence before any statute of which we have a record. The common law, which has been made the common law of this State, recognizes the existence of counties or shires in the Constitution of those assemblages of Barons and knights which first admitted Burgesses to a participation in their deliberations. The Constitution of this State recognizes its counties in all their common law rights and prerogatives; and, for convenience, the law extends to these counties certain privileges and prerogatives not necessary to their county organization. A county is "a circuit, or particular portion of a State or Kingdom separated from the rest for certain purposes in the administration of justice." (Webster's Dic.)

Counties are, by their very nature, confined to limits in their expenditure of money more restricted than those which control municipal corporations. The "roads, bridges, and ferries," over which County Supervisors may properly exercise jurisdiction, are those which lie within the county, and are necessary for the convenience and comfort of the inhabitants. Municipal corporations, on the other hand, are creatures of statute, but they are also children of trade. They may be permitted to embark in the construction of roads, the improvement of rivers, and the support of navigation companies, but for reasons growing out of this very law of their existence, are no way applicable to counties.

Pattison v. Board of Supervisors of Yuba County.

(Clarke v. City of Rochester, 24 Barb. 446; Low v. City of Marysville, 5 Cal. 214.) A county is a component part of the State—a component part cannot do that which the whole cannot do. The State cannot become a stockholder in the railroad. Therefore, a county cannot.

J. A. McDougall and Timothy Dame, for Respondents.

Appellant makes two points:

1. That the Act of the Legislature, under which the Board of Supervisors have acted in taking the stock in the railroad company, is unconstitutional.

2. That the Board of Supervisors had no authority to subscribe to the capital stock of "The San Francisco and Marysville Railroad Company," even though the Act of the Legislature was constitutional.

The first question was fully discussed at bar in the former hearing, and we do not deem it necessary to repeat in full our part of the argument. But let us consider a moment the objections urged.

They say that the power exercised by the Board of Supervisors under the Act in question, is "withheld by the spirit, meaning, and true intent of the Constitution," as expressed in Art. XI, Sec. 10.

It is certainly very clear, from the language of this section, that the State, in her capacity as a State, cannot loan her credit in aid of, or become a stockholder in, any railroad company, or other corporation; because she is restricted from doing so by the plain terms of her Constitution, and which is restrictive upon the powers of the Legislature; and that what is not clearly prohibited by the terms of this instrument, the Legislature can do. Then if the Constitution of the State does not in direct and positive terms prohibit the Legislature from granting the power to counties, cities, or other political corporations, from taking stock in a railroad company, or other public enterprise—there being no limitation or restriction imposed upon counties and cities, touching the matter—the power by implication is conceded to the Legislature to authorize the taking of such stock; for the very language of the section of the Constitution referred to, shows that the subject of taking stock in such companies must have been before the convention that framed the Constitution.

Pattison v. Board of Supervisors of Yuba County.

---

The provisions of the Constitution, then, amount to this: they admit the power of the Legislature to authorize counties and cities to take stock in works of internal improvement, but forbid the State from doing so in her State capacity.

It is further urged that the Act in question, "conflicts with the true policy of the State," etc.

We might show the contrary. But it is well settled by this Court in several recent cases, and is the prevailing rule of law in other States, that questions of policy of this character belong exclusively to the legislative branch of the Government, and not to the Judiciary.

It is the business of the Court to decide what the law is, not what it should be. The mere dicta laid down by Mr. Chief Justice Murray, in the case of Low v. The City of Marysville, (5 Cal. 214,) is repugnant to the decisions of all the State Courts upon this subject, and also of this Court in several cases recently decided. (The City of Aurora v. West, 9 Ind. 74, recently decided; and, also, the cases of Grant v. Courter, 24 Barb. N. Y. 232; Benson v. The Mayor, etc. Id. 248; and Clarke v. The City of Rochester, Id. 446, and the authorities cited in these cases.)

The complaint, in assigning causes for the injunction, alleges that the company, "is not formed for the purpose of connecting by railroad the city of Marysville with the city of Benicia, or any point on the Sacramento River, at or near Knight's Ferry, or Sacramento City." We call the attention of the Court here to the discrepancy between the averment in the complaint and the provisions of the Act.

It is not required that the company should have been organized, chartered, or "formed for the purpose of connecting the city of Marysville with any one of the points named. The subscription may be made to the capital stock of any company, 'for the purpose of constructing any railroad by which a railroad connection shall be formed,' between the city of Marysville and either of the named points."

The agreed statement of facts shows that the line of said railroad commences at a point near the center of the corporate limits of the city of Marysville and continues from thence "through the county of Sutter to a point on the Sacramento River at Knight's Ferry, forming a railroad connection between the city of Marysville and the Sacramento River at Knight's Ferry;" also, that the company are engaged in the construction of the road.

Pattison v. Board of Supervisors of Yuba County.

---

The plan and purposes of the company fulfill all the conditions required, and it is a strange position that because the same company proposes to do much more than is required, that, therefore, the county of Yuba should not aid in the enterprise. It is sufficient, however, that no such limitation as to the character of the company as is assumed in Appellant's argument is to be found in the Act itself. (Smith Stat. and Const. L. Sec. 545; 6 Dane's Ab. 600; 7 Cranch, 52; The City of Aurora v. West, 9 Ind. 74.)

BALDWIN, J. delivered the opinion of the Court — TERRY, C. J. concurring.

The bill in this case was filed in the Tenth District. Its object is to enjoin the Supervisors of Yuba County from subscribing the sum of two hundred thousand dollars to the capital stock of the San Francisco and Marysville Railroad Company, a corporation formed under the general law concerning corporations. By the Act of the Legislature, approved April 28, 1857, (Statutes of 1857, 296,) it was provided, in substance, that this Board should submit, at the next general election to be held for county officers in Yuba County, to the qualified electors of the county, the proposition for this Board "to take and subscribe two hundred thousand dollars to the capital stock of any railroad company, for the purpose of constructing any railroad, by which a railroad connection shall be formed between the city of Marysville and either the city of Benicia or any point on the Sacramento River at or near Knight's Ferry, or Sacramento City."

The second section of this Act provides the time, manner, and other machinery, of the election. The third section declares that if the proposition be carried by the popular vote, the Board of Supervisors, in the name of the county of Yuba, are empowered to take and subscribe, for the use, benefit, and advantage, of said county, to the capital stock of any railroad company, for the purpose mentioned in section one of this Act, stock to the amount of two hundred thousand dollars, and therefore to pledge the faith of said county of Yuba for the payment of the same in the manner thereafter provided. By section five a committee, constituted by section four, shall make the subscription, "conditioning the same to be paid in the bonds of Yuba County;" and by section six it is provided when, and in what manner, these bonds are to be issued.

Pattison v. Board of Supervisors of Yuba County.

---

The San Francisco and Marysville Railroad Company was incorporated on the 28th day of October, 1857, for the purposes set forth in their articles of association — that of constructing, owning, and maintaining, a railroad from the city of Marysville, in the county of Yuba, through said county and the counties of Sutter, Yolo, and Solano, to a point on San Pablo Bay, near Vallejo.

The vote on this proposition was in favor of the subscription.

This is a case of much public importance, and we are requested by the learned counsel on both sides to decide the main questions involved, without reference to technical points. The questions were before us at the last term, but we declined to pass upon them for the reason that the proper parties upon whom our judgment should be binding were not before the Court. We thought it a bad precedent to consider grave questions involving important interests, in the absence of parties really interested, since, though in the particular case there was no suspicion of such a design, such a precedent might allow any suitor to bring up mere speculative questions, and bring before the Courts titles or claims of third persons with which he had no concern, and which might be decided in the absence of, and without a hearing by, those who might be affected by the adjudication.

We do not see very clearly that the present plaintiff can interfere by injunction, and restrain the performance of a ministerial duty cast upon public officers by the law, merely upon the ground that the effect of this might be, at some future time, if certain other things were done, to subject his property to taxation. But as the proper parties are before the Court, we waive this inquiry, merely alluding to it to show that it is still an open question, not passed upon or foreclosed by this decision.

Two points are made by the Appellant.

1. That the Board of Supervisors had no authority to subscribe to the capital stock of the San Francisco and Marysville Railroad Company, even though the Act of the Legislature were constitutional.

Pattison v. Board of Supervisors of Yuba County.

---

2. That the Act is unconstitutional.

The last proposition was the one mainly argued at the bar. We shall consider it first.

It is not pretended by the counsel that there is any provision of the Constitution which specially interdicts the taking of stock in railroads by a county; nor that there is any provision which forbids this mode adopted by the Act of 1857, of ascertaining or giving effect to its will if it so desire. But it is argued that "such a power is withheld by the spirit, meaning, and true intent, of the Constitution." The generality of such a proposition creates an instinctive suspicion of its soundness. We do not deny that there may be a declared policy in a Constitution, as in a penal law, or system of laws, and that it is not within the power of the Legislature to contravene this policy, although the Act do not oppose the express language of any clause of the instrument. But this policy must be manifested by the terms of the Constitution, fixing with precision the particular rule, and not be gathered by general inference, or vague and uncertain speculation of what the framers of the Constitution designed, but failed clearly to express. Mr. Justice Daniel, of the Supreme Court of the United States, took occasion in a recent case, to disapprove of this course of reasoning, and relaxing something of the austere dignity of that august tribunal, remarked, that if the Judges were to adopt the notion that a law might be declared unconstitutional, because of its supposed repugnancy to the spirit of the Constitution, they ought to employ a rapping medium to procure authentic revelations from that spirit. We expressed our views of this mode of constitutional construction in the case of People ex rel. Brodie v. Weller, 11 Cal. 77, and do not deem it necessary to repeat here what we there said.

The argument, more fully developed by the learned counsel, seems to be this: The State is forbidden by the 8th Article of the Constitution, to create debts over three hundred thousand dollars, or to loan its credit, etc.; the counties are component parts of the State; the State cannot authorize the creation of this debt by its separate subdivisions any more than by itself as a whole. If this argument were sound, it would seem to follow that all indebtedness of every sort, incurred by all the counties of the State — the State having exceeded its privileged limit — is void. But the radical error of the argument is, this provision only applies to the State as a corporation—as a political sovereign, represented by her law-making power. As such corporation, or sovereign being, she has no subdivisions, for sovereignty is not divisible. She may have political subdivisions—that is, she may permit a portion of her powers of government to be exercised by local agents, who, of course, are her subordinates. But politically considered, geographical or political departments are no more the State, or a part of the State, than a man's land, or his agent, is a part of himself. The intent of this clause of the Constitution is plain enough; it was designed as a check on legislation, and such legislation as might create a charge upon the property of the entire State. But it is not only unwarranted by the words of the Constitution to suppose that counties were included in this inhibition, but it might well have been foreseen that the provision would prove extremely embarrassing, if it did not entirely stop the operations of those local governments. All of them, or nearly all, we believe, have been obliged to go in debt to support themselves; and, besides, the restriction would be wholly impracticable, for how ascertain from time to time whether the aggregate of all this indebtedness passed the limit, and when, or whether, by payments or otherwise, returned within it again? For the question of the validity of any contract or debt would depend upon the general balance of State and county debts or credits. Many cases have come before this Court involving the validity of these debts, but the point has never before been taken; and we think there is not enough of plausibility in it to justify a more detailed exposition of its fallacy.

Pattison v. Board of Supervisors of Yuba County.

---

The same argument, which denies force to this proposition, that this is a State debt, within the meaning of the Constitution, equally refutes the idea that it is a loan of State credit.

The general powers of Government being vested in the Legislature, the power to pass this law must be conceded, unless some constitutional restriction is imposed. We see no restriction in this case. The fact that the State could not take stock in this road does not show that the Legislature could not authorize the county of Yuba to take stock; for the reason that the Constitution says the State shall not subscribe, and does not say that the county of Yuba shall not. The restriction goes no further than the language carries it. It comprehends the particular act and party interdicted — none other.

Pattison v. Board of Supervisors of Yuba County.

---

There is no difference in this respect between a municipal corporation and a county. They are both political and geographical divisions of the State. They are both the subjects of its political dominion. The local governments derive their powers from the paramount political head, which, while it cedes to certain local agents certain powers, does not thereby remit its rightful and ultimate dominion; for it would be strange if the political power could appoint agents, and delegate powers of a political nature, and not itself be able to do or regulate what is done or regulated solely by virtue of its permission and authority.

It may be conceded that the Board of Supervisors had no power to make this subscription without the Act of the Legislature. It had no power, because it was not authorized by any law. But this law gave them the authority.

Having seen that there is nothing peculiar to our Constitution which denies effect to this Act, we are brought to consider the validity of the statute on more general principles. The question is not new. It has frequently arisen in other States, and the decisions, we believe, have been uniform. Few questions have been more thoroughly argued or more elaborately considered. In New York, Mississippi, Ohio, Tennessee, Pennsylvania, Virginia, Kentucky, North Carolina, and Indiana, the binding force of such a law has been affirmed.

The case of The City of Aurora v. West, (9 Ind. 74,) is so pertinent to the leading points involved here that it deserves particular notice. The Legislature, by Act, incorporating the town of Aurora, empowered the city to "take stock in any chartered company for making roads to said city," and that they might issue bonds, etc.; this they had power to do whenever a majority of the qualified voters of the city required it. The City Council subscribed fifty thousand dollars of the capital stock of the Ohio and Mississippi Railroad Company. The Constitution of Indiana forbade the State going in debt for internal improvements, and also forbade counties, but cities were not expressly forbidden. In that case, as in this, the spirit of the Constitution was invoked by counsel. We extract a portion of the opinion of the Court, because it not only fully receives our approbation, but comprises, within a short compass, a full answer to the argument of the Appellants. The Court say:

Pattison v. Board of Supervisors of Yuba County.

---

“The provisions in the new Constitution, then, on the question under consideration, amount to this: they admit the power of the State to construct works of internal improvement, but forbid her, in her State capacity, to create a debt for the purpose. They grant that the power may be conferred upon counties to take stock in companies chartered to construct such works, but require simultaneous payment. They do not prohibit the conferring of the power to take stock upon cities, either by means of cash or credit, or of otherwise aiding these undertakings, but they prohibit the State from assuming any debts cities may contract.

The implication from these provisions, in regard to cities, if there be any, is in favor of their power to take stock, etc. At all events, if they ever possessed the power, that power is left unimpaired. The convention did not consider that an inhibition upon the State to construct internal improvements, in her capacity as such, by means of loans, prohibited her from authorizing other agencies to construct them by such means; hence, they proceeded to impose the restriction as to counties, but did not extend it to cities, though naming them in the same section. The maxim, therefore, that the expression of one excludes the other, must apply.

Suppose the Constitution said that the State should not, by means of her officers and funds, construct railroads, would the provision be construed to prohibit the State from chartering companies for that purpose? It would rather imply that they were to be constructed by such agencies; for an intention to entirely arrest the improvement of the State could not be presumed.

If, then, cities, under the old Constitution, or it would seem under, perhaps, any Constitution, could be invested by the Legislature with the power of aiding works of internal improvement, they still can be invested with such power.

The question, therefore, presents itself, can such power be given to a city? Of the policy of conferring it, we have said all that it becomes us to say, in The City of Lafayette v. Cox, (5 Ind.

Pattison v. Board of Supervisors of Yuba County.

---

R. 38,) to which we refer. Of the capacity to confer it, we have not heretofore expressed an opinion. That is now the question. We have seen that no express constitutional provision stands in the way of granting such power to a city, as we hold that the prohibition in the Constitution upon the Legislature to create a State debt does not prohibit that body from authorizing cities to create debts. This is our construction of the language of the Constitution. But it is insisted that the power is not a legitimate part of the authority of a municipal corporation—that it is outside of the purpose for which such corporations are created—and that this is a sufficient reason for holding them incompetent to receive a grant of such power. But is not this begging the very question to be decided? For what precise purposes are municipal corporations created? How much power, and no more nor no less, is embraced by the idea of a municipal corporation? We have not been satisfactorily enlightened on this point. If the Legislature can confer a little legislative power upon a city for local objects, can it not confer a greater amount for the same objects? It would hardly be said that cities were created simply to establish and enforce police regulations—to maintain order among the citizens. By common custom, they establish sanitary regulations, rules governing markets, etc., and on what principle do they exercise these powers? They go further. They construct streets, sidewalks, bridges, etc. within their limits. They do more. They build wharfs to accommodate their trade and commerce, coming to them from a distance; they construct water-works—going, for the purpose, miles beyond corporate limits. They construct works for lighting, etc. These, and other like powers, though not existing in every one, yet, we believe, all concede may be conferred upon municipal corporations as legitimate, as constitutional, though in their exercise, the citizens are not severally equally benefited in proportion to taxes paid. (See Lafayette v. Cox, 5 Ind. R. 38.) Now, if a city may build wharfs, or take stock in companies created to build them, to foster commerce—may take stock in companies chartered to furnish the people with water, light, etc.—why, as a question of power, may it not take stock in companies for the making of highways to facilitate the bringing in of bread, and meat, and fuel, to the citizens? Are not these of nearly as much importance to them as water, light, etc. And are not such works, in a special manner, locally advantageous to the city? And where the citizens of a place have seen fit to ask, and the Legislature to grant such power, and the citizens have subsequently, in the prescribed mode, exercised it, no constitutional provision forbidding, a Court, whose province is simply to decide what the law is, not what it should be, can annul such exercise of power. How much local benefit must an improvement confer to bring it within the spirit of a local one? If a city may build a wharf to accommodate its commerce, may it not, also, a depot? May it not build the track of a road through its corporate limits? May it not, then, put in that amount of stock, or bonds, to pay the company the sum the depot and track would cost?"

---

Pattison v. Board of Supervisors of Yuba County.

---

The Court then goes on to hold, with Chancellor Kent, (Com. 2 Vol. 277,) that public corporations are created by the Government for political purposes as counties, cities, etc.; they are invested with subordinate legislative powers, to be exercised for local purposes, connected with the public good, and such powers are subject to the control of the Legislature of the State. It sums up the argument on this general subject by saying: "The Constitution of the State authorizes the Legislature to create corporations, and imposes no limit as to the powers to be conferred on them, no clause confining their action to objects entirely disconnected with anything outside the corporate limits."

In Grant v. Courter, (24 Barb. 233,) the subject is elaborately treated. The question there, was as to the validity of a statute of New York, empowering the towns in the counties through which the Albany and Susquehanna Railroad is located and in progress of construction, to borrow money and subscribe for and purchase the stock of the company. After giving the general course of reasoning adopted in the Indiana case, the Court say: "The Act, consequently, is not repugnant to the provisions of the State Constitution above referred to, nor is it without the general grant of legislative power. The precise question at issue, as to the power of the Legislature to authorize towns, cities, and counties, to subscribe for railroad, turnpike road, or bridge stocks, has been decided repeatedly in various States of the Union; and the final decision in each of them, has upheld the law as constitutional. The Constitutions of several of these

Pattison v. Board of Supervisors of Yuba County.

States contain similar provisions for the protection of private property to those above alluded to. The only case in contradistinction to which we have been referred, is that of Clarke v. The City of Rochester, (13 How. Pr. 204,) decided at special term, and in which Judge Allen, in his able opinion, rests the decision in part upon other grounds, to which allusion will hereafter be made." (Sharpless v. Mayor of Philadelphia, 21 Penn. R. 147; Commonwealth v. McWilliams, 11 Id. 62; The Cincinnati, etc. R. R. Co. v. Commissioner of Clinton County, 1 Ohio St. 77; Cass v. Dillon, 2 Id. 607; Talbot v. Dent, 9 B. Mon. 526; Slack v. The Maysville R. R. Co., 13 Id. 1; Nicoll v. Mayor of Nashville, 9 Humphrey, 252; Klein v. Alton R. R. Co. 13 Illinois, 516; Shaw v. Dennis, 5 Gilman, 405; City of Bridgeport v. Housatonic R. R. Co. 15 Conn. 475; Goddin v. Crump, 8 Leigh, 120; Harrison Justices v. Holland, 3 Grattan, 247; Taylor v. Commissioners of Newbern, 2 Jones, 141; see, also, Thomas v. Leland, 24 Wend. 65; People v. Mayor of Brooklyn, 4 Comst. 419; White v. The Syracuse and Utica R. R. Co. 14 Barb. 559.)

The Court consider the point made, that the fact that the Act was not to take effect except after a vote of two-thirds of the electors, was unconstitutional as a limitation upon legislative power, and hold that there is nothing in it — the Legislative Act being complete when exercised, and the effect of the Act only controlled by the condition. The same thing is held in 21 Penn. 189; 1 Ohio St. 77.

The case of Benson v. Mayor of Albany involved the same question, and was decided the same way. (24 Barb. 253.) The Constitution of New York contains a clause similar to our own in regard to municipal corporations, directing the Legislature to restrict the power of municipal corporations to tax, assess, borrow money, contract debts, etc. But this provision was considered as not interfering with their power to subscribe for stock, tax, etc.

Many more cases might be cited, but it is unnecessary. The decisions, with a single exception — and that case overruled — seem to be all one way.

With the policy of such laws, as the Courts of Indiana and New York remark, we have nothing to do. Our duty is to declare the law as we find it.

Pattison v. Board of Supervisors of Yuba County.

---

The result of all the cases is, that the Legislature has a right to authorize a local tax for the purpose of internal improvements; that it may authorize the local authorities to impose the tax; that this authority may be given upon petition or without it, or by or without a submission of the proposition to the people; and that it is not essential that the improvement should be within, or confined to, the locality taxed, and that a subscription for stock, to be paid for by taxation, is a valid contract to pay it.

This leaves but one question open; and we think there is nothing in it requiring extended notice. It has been seen that the Act allows the subscription to be made to the capital stock of any company "for the purpose of constructing any railroad, by which a railroad connection shall be formed between the city of Marysville and the city of Benicia, or any point on the Sacramento River." The Committee appointed must decide whether this road is a proper one to effect their object. We do not question that it answers the end intended, and that a subscription to it would give effect to the intent of the Act of the Legislature. The error of the Appellant's argument is, in supposing that the subscription is to be to a railroad company formed for the express and only purpose of connecting Marysville and one of these termini; whereas the truth is, the subscription is to any railroad by which a railway connection shall be formed between Marysville and one of these points. The company receiving the subscription need not be constituted for this express and only purpose; but the effect of their work must be to make this connection. The road of this company commences at a point in the city of Marysville, and continues on from thence, through the county of Sutter, to a point on the Sacramento River at Knight's Ferry, forming a railroad connection between the city of Marysville and the Sacramento River, at Knight's Ferry, thence to Vallejo, thence by steamboats to San Francisco. That the railroad is continued further, or that the work goes beyond this in any other respect, is no objection, as it completely answers the description in the Act, so far as the description goes, and the statute designed.

BRANCH TURNPIKE COMPANY v. BOARD SUPERVISORS
YUBA COUNTY.

In a bill for an injunction, the mere allegation of great and irreparable injury to a vested right is insufficient; the facts stated must satisfy the Court that the apprehension of such injury is well founded.

APPEAL from the Tenth District.

F. L. Hatch, for Appellant.

Bryan & Filkins, Winans and W. T. Wallace, for Respondent.

TERRY, C. J., delivered the opinion of the Court — BALDWIN, J. concurring.

In this case the demurrer should have been sustained for want of a sufficient statement of equities in the bill.

Plaintiff complains that it is an incorporated company under the law, and have, by virtue of their acts as corporators, acquired certain vested rights to collect and fix the rate of tolls to be charged over their road. That defendants, in violation of those rights, and without authority of law, are about to pass an order fixing the rate of tolls to be charged on said road, which order may entirely ruin plaintiffs, and cause them to lose the money invested in their enterprise.

These allegations are altogether insufficient to warrant the interference of a Court of Equity. An injunction is never granted unless the bill shows some vested right in the plaintiff, which is likely to suffer great or irreparable injury from the act complained of. The mere allegation of such injury is insufficient. The facts stated must satisfy the Court that such apprehension is well founded. (6 John. Ch. 19; 2 Dallas, 405; 9 Gill & John. 468.)

No such facts are stated by the plaintiff. In the first place, for aught that appears in the bill, it may have been the design of the Supervisors to increase the rate of tolls charged, and thus enhance, rather than diminish, the revenue of the corporation. Secondly, if the allegation of want of authority in defendants be true, any order which they might make in the premises would be a mere nullity, and could in no way prejudice the rights of plaintiff. On the contrary, if this allegation be not true, defendants should not be restrained from performing a plain duty.

Judgment reversed and bill dismissed.

Holmes v. Rogers et al.

HOLMES v. ROGERS et al.

A DECREE fairly entered by consent of an Attorney, is as binding upon his client as a decree entered after resistance.

The authority of an Attorney, who appears, will be presumed, and his action will bind the party, unless in cases of fraud or insolvency of the Attorney. Nor will such action be reviewed on the ground of mistake, unless the mistake be unmixd with any fault or negligence of either the party or his Attorney.

It seems that the appearance of an Attorney wholly unauthorized, there being no fraud and no allegation of insolvency, would not give the party a right to assail the judgment on that ground.

If the Attorney assents to the decree, the assent need not be made in open Court by words spoken by the Attorney. It may as well be made by stipulation out of Court. For it is the fact that is effectual, not the mere mode of its authentication to the Court. If that assent exist at the time of the action of the Court, or the entering of the decree, it is enough.

When a decree is made by consent of the Attorney, it is no ground of error that the decree embraces land not in the complaint; and, even if error, the remedy is by appeal.

APPEAL from the Twelfth District.

On the 31st day of July, 1854, Edmund Laffan filed a bill in equity against Isaac E. Holmes and plaintiff, claiming that Holmes had been left by him as his agent in charge of certain real estate in the city of San Francisco; that he had, in violation of his trust, caused said property to be sold on execution against him, Laffan, and had become the purchaser thereof, and afterwards had conveyed the same to the present plaintiff, James G. Holmes, who had united with the said Isaac E. Holmes, his brother, to defraud the said Laffan — and the bill prayed an account of rents and profits, and a reconveyance of the property. To this bill the two defendants made separate answers. The defendant, Isaac E. Holmes, denied all the equities of the bill; averred that he had acted with the best faith to said Laffan; that he had bought the property in question with the full knowledge and acquiescence of Laffan, who relinquished and abandoned it to him, and had declined to redeem the most valuable portion when full opportunity was offered him to do so. The defendant, James G. Holmes, the present plaintiff, answered that he had purchased from his codefendant for valuable consideration and without any notice whatsoever of any fiduciary relations between Isaac E. Holmes and Laffan. The defendants were both residing in Charleston, South Carolina, and were absent from the State of California. The answer of the defendant, Isaac E. Holmes, was signed by him propria persona. Mr. Louis Blanding appeared as the Attorney of James G. Holmes, the present plaintiff. When the pleadings were in this position, and before the case was brought to trial, on the 8th of June, 1855, a certain instrument purporting to be a compromise of all matters in dispute between the parties to the said action was filed in the cause, executed by Laffan in person, on the one part, and on the other part by Hall McAllister, as professed Attorney in fact of the defendant, Isaac E. Holmes, and by Wm. Blanding as professed Attorney in fact of plaintiff; and on the 27th of the month an instrument supplementary to the former, and executed by Wm. Blanding for both defendants, was filed in the cause. These instruments surrendered to Laffan all the property claimed by him in the suit, and agreed to transfer to him other property belonging to plaintiff, which had never belonged to, or been claimed by Laffan, and they provided for the entry of a decree, directing a conveyance by defendants to Laffan of all the property mentioned in them. On the 18th of July, 1855, a decree was accordingly entered, ordering the conveyance to Laffan of all the property described in the complaint, and other property not therein claimed, and which had never belonged to Laffan. The decree purports to have been made "by consent of parties" "with the consent of the defendants by their respective Attorneys in open Court." This decree the present bill prays may be set aside, and that the plaintiff may be allowed to make his defense to that action, according to the averments of his answer therein. The bill details at length the original transactions between Isaac E. Holmes and Laffan, and shows no fraud on the part of the agent.

---

The bill then alleges that the instruments of compromise upon which the decree was founded were made without authority and were void; that they were made by the friends of the defendant, I. E. Holmes, and from good motives, but with an imperfect knowledge of the facts, and without authority. And as to the consent of the Attorney-at-Law, recited in the decree, it is alleged, "that the said Louis Blanding, the Attorney of record of this plaintiff, defendant in that action, had no authority to consent to the rendering of said decree, nor was he in fact, as recited in said decree, present in Court and consenting to the rendering of said decree, nor did he in fact exercise his judgment on behalf of this plaintiff in said matter, but having a great regard for the character and reputation of the said I. E.

---

Holmes, and being misled in reference thereto by an imperfect acquaintance with the true facts of the controversy with the said Laffan, which facts he made diligent efforts to ascertain, but could not learn, he neglected and omitted the strong ground of defense which this plaintiff had in law and equity to said action, and allowed the said Wm. Blanding and Hall McAllister to compromise and arrange the whole matter as they supposed best for the said I. E. Holmes, altogether overlooking the legal position and defense of this plaintiff."

For further facts see opinion.

Defendants and intervenors demurred, generally, to the complaint. The demurrers were sustained, and final decree was entered dismissing the complaint. Plaintiff appeals.

Whitcomb, Pringle & Felton, for Appellant, argued that the decree should be set aside because: 1st. The consent or will of the party was not in fact given by his counsel, and hence that the decree was rendered through a mistake of fact. 2d. That even if the counsel consented, he was not authorized to bind plaintiff by such consent, and hence there was no consent of the party.

1st. The consent of counsel was not in fact given. Hall McAllister and Mr. Blanding assumed the settlement of the controversy with Laffan, and made a written agreement, by which all the property that Laffan claimed was given up to him; and Louis Blanding, the Attorney-at-Law, believing these gentlemen to be acting in the best interest of I. E. Holmes, whose real position he did not understand, gave up to them the management of the whole matter and allowed them to close the compromise without interposing the true defense of his own client. Thus there was not actual consent to the decree by Louis Blanding, but rather an abandonment of the case, and the pleadings were in such position that nothing short of an actual consent of counsel could justify the decree. There were no proofs; there was no default; on the contrary, there was a denial of all the equities charged in the bill.

2d. But we claim that such consent as was necessary here is not within the scope of the ordinary powers of counsel.

And again, that it was not within the authority which the counsel produced to justify his action, or rather non-action, here.

But the Respondents contend, that even admitting the above, there is no relief against a consent decree unless it were obtained by fraud. And that the remedy the Appellant has invoked here, is unknown to equity proceedings; that a bill to set aside or impeach a decree can only be brought for fraud in obtaining the decree.

I. Undoubtedly, a consent decree cannot be set aside by bill of review, appeal, or rehearing, because there is, strictly speaking, no error in a consent decree.

II. But the Respondents contend that even an original bill can impeach a decree, whether on consent or otherwise, only in the case of fraud.

The books speak of a bill to impeach a decree for fraud, because such is the prevailing character of such original bills, fraud being the chief and most usual ground of equity jurisdiction in such cases, but that the same kind of relief is in fact available in the kindred cases of accident and mistake. We claim that there is relief in equity against a consent alleged, which was not in fact given, the allegation being made by accident or mistake, or against a consent which was actually given through accident or mistake.

This decree is only a part of an executory contract. The instruments of compromise provide for the surrendering up of a large part of the plaintiff's property, for the entering of a decree to enforce part of the agreement, and for conveyance by the parties of the lots in question; some of these lots are included in the decree, though not subjects of the action, and some of them are not included in the decree. The compromise proceeds to the entry of the decree, when the parties repudiate it, and declare that they are not bound by the compromise. They are clearly entitled to set aside the uncompleted agreement because there was no authority to execute it; they are not bound to convey the property not mentioned in the decree; are they bound to convey the property improperly embraced in the decree because not the subject of the action, or are they only bound to convey the property more regularly embraced in the decree because the subject of the action? (See Anderson v. Woodford, 8 Leigh, 316; Reid v. Clark, Speer's Eq. 348; Piche v. Emerson, 5 N. H. 394; 1 Vesey, 92; Smith v. Bossard, 2 McC. Ch. 409.)

---

F. J. Lippett, also for Appellant.

I. The decree may be impeached by original bill, without charging fraud.

1. The term "original bill to impeach a decree for fraud" is a mere nomen generalissimum; there are bills that are classed in this category in which no fraud is alleged. (Story's Eq. Pl. Seca. 427, 428, and Note 1.) 2. Courts of Equity will open a decree or other proceeding taken against a party by mistake or surprise, as well as fraud. (1 Vernon, 131, Case 117; Parker v. Dee, 3 Swanston, 534, Note; Smith v. Bossard, 2 McCord's Ch. 409; Kemp v. Squire, 1 Vesey, Sen. 205, 206, 207; Denton v. Noyes, 6 Johns. 296, 301, 304, 306; Brooks' Adm'r v. Love, 3 Dana, 7; Town of Alton v. Town of Gilmanton, 2 N. H. 521, 522; Pike v. Emerson, 5 Id. 394; Decarters v. Lafarge, 1 Paige, 576; Millsbaugh v. McBride, 7 Paige, 512; Erwin v. Vint, 6 Munford, 267-270; Callaway v. Alexander, 8 Leigh, 118, 119; Anderson v. Woodford, 8 Leigh, 316, 326, 328.) 3. By Section 68 of the Practice Act, a party is relievable "from a judgment, etc. taken against him through his mistake, inadvertence, surprise, or excusable neglect;" and no time is limited for the application. (People v. Lafarge, 3 Cal. 130, 134, 135, 136.)

II. Even if it were true that a decree can be impeached only for fraud, this would not affect the present bill, which is to set aside certain instruments of compromise, which the plaintiff never authorized, and under which the decree in question was entered.

III. A decree may be opened, though entered by consent of Counsel.

1. The consent to the entry of the decree was not actually given by the plaintiff's counsel, Louis Blanding, but by his brother, who had assumed to act for the plaintiff. 2. It is doubtful whether it be within the scope of the ordinary authority of a counsel to consent to a special and final decree in equity. (Beach v. Shaw, 4 Barb. 294.) 3. The agency of an Attorney or counsel is limited to the prosecution or defense of the suit. He is clothed with all incidental powers which may be requisite for the successful fulfillment of the object of his agency; but not to make a compromise, nor, withdrawing the suit from the determination of the Court, and putting himself in loco judicis, to consent to a final decree, definitively settling the rights of his client. (Howe v. Lawrence, 2 Zabriskie, N. J. 106; Holker v. Parker, 7 Cranch, 452-455; Vail v. Jackson's Administrator, 15 Vermont, 321; Smith v. Bossard, 2 McCord's Ch. 409; Mayor v. Foulkrod, 4 Wash. C. C. 511; People v. Lamborn, 1 Scam. 124; Filby v. Miller, 25 Penn. State, 267; Commissioners of Accounts v. Rose, 1 Desausa. 469-470; Kimball v. Gearheart, 12 Cal. 27.)

Moreover, certain other property, not claimed in the suit, was stipulated to be also given up to Laffan, and although this property is not mentioned in the decree, the plaintiff's title to it is clouded by the agreement so long as it is permitted to stand. 4. Granting that a decree made by consent of counsel will not be set aside because the consent was not authorized by his client, it is no answer to the bill, which does not ask relief on this ground, but on the ground that the counsel's consent was given, not only under circumstances which prevented a fair use of his judgment, but under a supposed compromise which had never been made. If the plaintiff himself had consented to the decree, under a mistake as to an important fact, it would be a sufficient ground to set aside. 5. That courts may open decrees made by mistake of counsel, appears from authority, as well as principle. (Beach v. Shaw, 4 Barb. 293, 294, 295; Denton v. Noyes, 6 Johns. 301, 304, 306; Anderson v. Woodford, 8 Leigh, 316, 326, 328; Swinfen v. Swinfen, 87 Eng. C. L. 364; London Times of July 29th, 1859.)

---

ter is not pretended, and any error of law is barred by time. (Story's Eq. Pl. 450-455; 1 Hop. 104.) II. The complaint is not good as an original bill. A decree cannot be impeached by an original bill, except on the ground of fraud. (Davoe v. Fanning, 4 Johns. Ch. 202, 203, and Cases there cited; White v. Bank U. S. 7 Ohio, 528; 6 and 7 Cond. Ohio, 233; Brooks, Adm'r v. Love, 3 Dana, 7, and Cases cited; Story Eq. Pl. 483, Sec. 426; Id. 647, Secs. 638, 639; 3 Dan'l Ch. Pr. 1724; Id. 1785; Gifford, Adm'r v. Thorn et al. 1 Stockton, N. J. 722, etc.)

This case is like Barnett et al. v. Kilbourne, (3 Cal. 327,) and the language of the Court there is appropriate to the case at bar. It is, in reality, "only an application for a new trial," and the "ignorance of counsel," or "insufficient conduct in the prosecution of the first suit, do not constitute grounds for relief in chancery." III. That the Attorneys had the power to consent to the decree on the original suit, and that no relief can be granted on account of their negligence, appears from the following authorities:

"There is no difference between decrees entered by consent, and decrees after argument. If fairly entered, they are equally valid and operative, so long as they remain in force." (French v. Shotwell, 5 Johns. Ch. 568; S. C. in Ct. of Errors, 20 Johns. 668; Bradish v. Magee, Amb. 229; Costa v. Clark, 3 Edw. Ch. 410; Harrison v. Rumsey, 2 Ves. Sen. 488; 1 Hoff. Ch. Pr. and cases there cited; Descartiers v. La Forge, 1 Paige Ch. 574; Monnell v. Lawrence, 12 Johns. 584; Descartiers v. La Forge, 1 Paige Ch. 574; Pierce v. Perkins, 2 Dev. Eq. 252; *Story v. IV. Counsel say: "That this consent or will of the party was not in fact given by his counsel, and hence that the decree was rendered through a mistake of fact, and should be set aside."

The case of Atkinson v. Monks, (1 Cowen, 709,) furnishes an answer to this proposition. "The decree, in everything that respects the reference, purports to have been made on consent. If the Chancellor was mistaken in supposing Atchinson's counsel to have consented to it, application should have been made to him to have the mistake as to the consent corrected. That course not having been pursued, this Court cannot try the question whether there was a mistake or not. We must take the facts to be as stated in the decree, and entirely disregard the suggestion of a mistake. No appeal or rehearing lies from a decree made by consent." (2 Madd. Ch. Pr. 577; Bradish v. Magee, Amb. 229.)

But the counsel cites the 68th Section of the Practice Act, (People v. Lafarge, 3 Cal. 130,) and asserts that "an application after the term, can properly be made only by original bill." That case was a bill in equity, to set aside a judgment at law for fraud. Judge Heydenfeldt treated it as the ordinary bill in equity on that ground, but Judge Wells treated it as a motion, and maintained that it could be made after a term elapsed. In Baldwin v. Cramer et al. (2 Cal. 583,) it was expressly held, "that after the expiration of a term of the District Court, no power remains in it to set aside a judgment or grant a new trial." The latter cases are all the same way. (See Suydam v. Pitcher et al. 4 Cal. 280, 281; Shaw v. McGregor, 8 Id. 521.)

But the decree in this case recites that, "This cause coming on for hearing and trial, by consent of the parties, by the Court, and the same being considered by the Court," etc. From this it may be implied that a trial was had, and the decree of the Court rendered after deliberation on the evidence. The fact of a consent to a decree would not vitiate it, if otherwise good. The decree imports a verity, and all the intendments are those that support it.

"Where there are two presumptions, both equally reasonable, arising upon the face of the record, this Court is bound to adopt that which will maintain the judgment of the Court below." (Whipley v. Flower, 6 Cal. 632; see, also, Nelson v. Lemmon, 10 Id. 49; Girwall v. Henderson, 7 Id. 290; Ford v. Halton, 5 Id.

521; White v. Abernethy et al. Id. 3, 99; Blaney v. Findley, 2 Black. 338; Evans v. McMahon, 1 Ala. 45; Ellis v. Dunn, 3 Ala. 632; Ice v. Manning, 3 Id. 121; Dearing v. Smith, 4 Id. 432; Gary v. Wood, Id. 296.)

We submit that: 1. The decree sought to be impeached is good as rendered on "a hearing and trial." 2. It is good as a consent decree. 3. That the counsel for the respective parties did, in fact, and without mistake, consent. 4. That counsel may consent to a decree that will bind their client. 5. If there was a mistake in supposing counsel did consent, that it should have been corrected on motion at the same term of Court, and it is now too late. 6. That the complaint is not a bill of review. 7. That no decree can be impeached by an original bill, except for fraud.

V. As to the compromise outside of the decree, this Court has nothing to do with it, and no jurisdiction concerning it. If the "professed Attorneys in fact" had no authority to make the agreement, it does not bind the brothers Holmes: they have not yet conveyed, and have the title in their names. If out of possession, they can recover in ejectment. If in possession, they can file a bill to quiet title.

BALDWIN, J. delivered the opinion of the Court — TERRY, C. J. concurring.

This is a bill filed to vacate a decree rendered in a case of Edmund Laffan v. The Plaintiff and others, on the 18th July, 1855.

It is not a bill of review technically so called, for it is not brought either for error appearing on the record, or upon the discovery of any new matter. (Story's Eq. Plead. 450.)

The bill charges that, on the 16th December, 1851, Edmund Laffan was the owner of certain real estate in the city of San Francisco, and that Isaac E. Holmes was his agent and Attorney; that Holmes became, in various ways, the owner of the property, and conveyed it to the plaintiff; that Laffan sued for this property, alleging that Holmes was his agent, and bought in violation of his trust for his own use; that the fact was that Holmes was fully authorized and justified in buying the property, of which he produces proof of letters of Laffan and otherwise; that a decree, a copy of which appears as an exhibit, was

Bryan & Filkins, Winans and W. T. Wallace, for Respondent.

TERRY, C. J., delivered the opinion of the Court — BALDWIN, J. concurring.

In this case the demurrer should have been sustained for want of a sufficient statement of equities in the bill.

Plaintiff complains that it is an incorporated company under the law, and have, by virtue of their acts as corporators, acquired certain vested rights to collect and fix the rate of tolls to be charged over their road. That defendants, in violation of those rights, and without authority of law, are about to pass an order fixing the rate of tolls to be charged on said road, which order may entirely ruin plaintiffs, and cause them to lose the money invested in their enterprise.

These allegations are altogether insufficient to warrant the interference of a Court of Equity. An injunction is never granted unless the bill shows some vested right in the plaintiff, which is likely to suffer great or irreparable injury from the act complained of. The mere allegation of such injury is insufficient. The facts stated must satisfy the Court that such apprehension is well founded. (6 John. Ch. 19; 2 Dallas, 405; 9 Gill & John. 468.)

No such facts are stated by the plaintiff. In the first place, for aught that appears in the bill, it may have been the design of the Supervisors to increase the rate of tolls charged, and thus enhance, rather than diminish, the revenue of the corporation. Secondly, if the allegation of want of authority in defendants be true, any order which they might make in the premises would be a mere nullity, and could in no way prejudice the rights of plaintiff. On the contrary, if this allegation be not true, defendants should not be restrained from performing a plain duty.

Judgment reversed and bill dismissed.

HOLMES v. ROGERS et al.

- A DECREE fairly entered by consent of an Attorney, is as binding upon his client as a decree entered after resistance.
- The authority of an Attorney, who appears, will be presumed, and his action will bind the party, unless in cases of fraud or insolvency of the Attorney. Nor will such action be reviewed on the ground of mistake, unless the mistake be unmingled with any fault or negligence of either the party or his Attorney.
- It seems that the appearance of an Attorney wholly unauthorized, there being no fraud and no allegation of insolvency, would not give the party a right to assail the judgment on that ground.
- If the Attorney assents to the decree, the assent need not be made in open Court by words spoken by the Attorney. It may as well be made by stipulation out of Court. For it is the fact that is effectual, not the mere mode of its authentication to the Court. If that assent exist at the time of the action of the Court, or the entering of the decree, it is enough.
- When a decree is made by consent of the Attorney, it is no ground of error that the decree embraces land not in the complaint; and, even if error, the remedy is by appeal.

APPEAL from the Twelfth District.

On the 31st day of July, 1854, Edmund Laffan filed a bill in equity against Isaac E. Holmes and plaintiff, claiming that Holmes had been left by him as his agent in charge of certain real estate in the city of San Francisco; that he had, in violation of his trust, caused said property to be sold on execution against him, Laffan, and had become the purchaser thereof, and afterwards had conveyed the same to the present plaintiff, James G. Holmes, who had united with the said Isaac E. Holmes, his brother, to defraud the said Laffan — and the bill prayed an account of rents and profits, and a reconveyance of the property. To this bill the two defendants made separate answers. The defendant, Isaac E. Holmes, denied all the equities of the bill; averred that he had acted with the best faith to said Laffan; that he had bought the property in question with the full knowledge and acquiescence of Laffan, who relinquished and abandoned it to him, and had declined to redeem the most valuable portion when full opportunity was offered him to do so. The defendant, James G. Holmes, the present plaintiff, answered that he had purchased from his codefendant for valuable consideration and without any notice whatsoever of any fiduciary relations between Isaac E. Holmes and Laffan. The defendants were both residing in Charleston, South Carolina, and were absent from the State of California. The answer of the defendant, Isaac E. Holmes, was signed by him propria persona. Mr. Louis Blanding appeared as the Attorney of James G. Holmes, the present plaintiff. When the pleadings were in this position, and before the case was brought to trial, on the 8th of June, 1855, a certain instrument purporting to be a compromise of all matters in dispute between the parties to the said action was filed in the cause, executed by Laffan in person, on the one part, and on the other part by Hall McAllister, as professed Attorney in fact of the defendant, Isaac E. Holmes, and by Wm. Blanding as professed Attorney in fact of plaintiff; and on the 27th of the month an instrument supplementary to the former, and executed by Wm. Blanding for both defendants, was filed in the cause. These instruments surrendered to Laffan all the property claimed by him in the suit, and agreed to transfer to him other property belonging to plaintiff, which had never belonged to, or been claimed by Laffan, and they provided for the entry of a decree, directing a conveyance by defendants to Laffan of all the property mentioned in them. On the 18th of July, 1855, a decree was accordingly entered, ordering the conveyance to Laffan of all the property described in the complaint, and other property not therein claimed, and which had never belonged to Laffan. The decree purports to have been made "by consent of parties" "with the consent of the defendants by their respective Attorneys in open Court." This decree the present bill prays may be set aside, and that the plaintiff may be allowed to make his defense to that action, according to the averments of his answer therein. The bill details at length the original transactions between Isaac E. Holmes and Laffan, and shows no fraud on the part of the agent.

---

The bill then alleges that the instruments of compromise upon which the decree was founded were made without authority and were void; that they were made by the friends of the defendant, I. E. Holmes, and from good motives, but with an imperfect knowledge of the facts, and without authority. And as to the consent of the Attorney-at-Law, recited in the decree, it is alleged, "that the said Louis Blanding, the Attorney of record of this plaintiff, defendant in that action, had no authority to consent to the rendering of said decree, nor was he in fact, as recited in said decree, present in Court and consenting to the rendering of said decree, nor did he in fact exercise his judgment on behalf of this plaintiff in said matter, but having a great regard for the character and reputation of the said I. E.

---

Holmes, and being misled in reference thereto by an imperfect acquaintance with the true facts of the controversy with the said Laffan, which facts he made diligent efforts to ascertain, but could not learn, he neglected and omitted the strong ground of defense which this plaintiff had in law and equity to said action, and allowed the said Wm. Blanding and Hall McAllister to compromise and arrange the whole matter as they supposed best for the said I. E. Holmes, altogether overlooking the legal position and defense of this plaintiff."

For further facts see opinion.

Defendants and intervenors demurred, generally, to the complaint. The demurrers were sustained, and final decree was entered dismissing the complaint. Plaintiff appeals.

Whitcomb, Pringle & Felton, for Appellant, argued that the decree should be set aside because: 1st. The consent or will of the party was not in fact given by his counsel, and hence that the decree was rendered through a mistake of fact. 2d. That even if the counsel consented, he was not authorized to bind plaintiff by such consent, and hence there was no consent of the party.

1st. The consent of counsel was not in fact given. Hall McAllister and Mr. Blanding assumed the settlement of the controversy with Laffan, and made a written agreement, by which all the property that Laffan claimed was given up to him; and Louis Blanding, the Attorney-at-Law, believing these gentlemen to be acting in the best interest of I. E. Holmes, whose real position he did not understand, gave up to them the management of the whole matter and allowed them to close the compromise without interposing the true defense of his own client. Thus there was not actual consent to the decree by Louis Blanding, but rather an abandonment of the case, and the pleadings were in such position that nothing short of an actual consent of counsel could justify the decree. There were no proofs; there was no default; on the contrary, there was a denial of all the equities charged in the bill.

2d. But we claim that such consent as was necessary here is not within the scope of the ordinary powers of counsel.

And again, that it was not within the authority which the counsel produced to justify his action, or rather non-action, here.

The case of Adams & Co. v. Hastings, was lost in the Superior Court by the defendants' neglect.

1. On the trial of the cause now before the Court, there was evidence to warrant a jury in finding that Hastings had communicated the facts of his defense and the names of the witnesses who could prove them, to the defendants as his Attorney and counsel, before the suit of Adams & Co. was tried. A negative pregnant is an admission. (Baker v. Bailey, 16 Barb. 56.) The defendant "never heard of certain matters before a certain time," is a negative pregnant that he did afterwards. (Walker v. Walker, 2 Atk. 100.) An evasion is an admission. (McCampbell v. Gill, 4 J. J. Marsh. 90, 91; 3 Greenl. Ev. Sec. 276.) 2. The failure to prove the facts was owing to the defendants' neglect. The only point raised by the defendants on the trial was the sufficiency of the power of Attorney on its face to authorize the borrowing of money. Defendants were guilty of neglect, if they knew enough to put them on inquiry. (You. & Col. 271, 280.)

II. By their neglect and misconduct defendants lost Hastings a new trial. Again, the Supreme Court reversed the judgment against Hastings; but the defendants, as Hastings' Attorneys, sacrificed the new trial, to which he had become entitled, by a stipulation that the judgment should stand as affirmed.

III. If, by defendants' neglect, a new trial was lost, they are liable in this action for all damages caused by the judgment, unless they prove affirmatively that a new trial would not have varied the result. (Swannell v. Ellis, 8 E. C. L. 542; Bourne v. Diggles, 18 Id. 652; Godefroy v. Jay, 20 Id. 190, 191.)

IV. If Hastings had had a new trial, apart from his defense to the entire claim, he would have been able to reduce the interest of three per cent. per month from the date of the note to ten per cent. per annum, which would have saved him seven thousand three hundred and forty-six dollars and eighty-seven cents a year, or upwards of twenty-two thousand dollars by the time the judgment was satisfied.

Winans, also, for Appellant, discussed the effect of the stipula-

tion referred to in the opinion of the Court, insisting that it embraced an appeal from a judgment as well as from an order overruling a motion for new trial. (1 Taunton, 417; Goodtitle v. Bailey, Cowper, 600; Parkhurst v. Smith, Willis, 332; 2 Blac. Comm. 279; 1 Scott, N. B. 309; 19 Vt. 202; 13 How. Pr. 23; 2 Zabriskie, 104.)

Yale, for Respondents. First, as to the motion to reject the statement. The stipulation had reference only to the appeal taken from the order denying the motion for a new trial. By the terms of the stipulation itself the statement is necessarily associated with the motion for the new trial, for which it was prepared. No stipulation relating to an appeal should be construed to refer to more than one appeal. The legal inference is, that the parties treated of the immediate matter before them, not to any number of appeals growing out of the same case. The immediate appeal referred to here, was the appeal from the motion denying the new trial. On a dismissal of that appeal the stipulation ceased to operate.

On the merits, Mr. Yale argued the following propositions:

1st. The legal obligation imposed upon the defendants, by engaging to defend the action of Adams & Co. v. Hastings, was to exercise reasonable diligence and skill in their profession as Attorneys and Counselors-at-Law in the defense of said action. (Pennington's Ex'rs v. Yell, 6 English, 227-229; Evans v. Watrous, 2 Porter, Ala. 210; Suydam v. Vance, 2 McLean, 102; People v. Yaldon, 4 Burrows, 2060; Lamphier v. Phipos, 8 Car. & Payne, 479; Lynch v. Commonwealth, 16 S. & R. 370; Godefroy v. Dalton, 6 Bing. 460; 19 E. C. L. 135.)

2d. The presumption of law is, that the defendants did exercise reasonable diligence and skill in their profession of Attorneys and Counselors-at-Law, in said case, until the contrary is established by evidence. (Pennington's Ex'rs v. Yell, 6 Eng. Ark. 228.)

3d. "If from evidence, there was no subsisting defense to the suit of Adams & Co. v. Hastings, if no just and proper defense could have been set up in said action, then the defendants were not liable to the plaintiff in this action." (Hogg v. Martin's Adm'r, Riley, S. C. 157; Grayson v. Wilkinson, Smedes & Mar. 288.)

Hastings v. Halleck et al.

---

As to the power of Attorney, it was sufficient to enable the agents to do everything except to sell or hypothecate.

4th. If from the evidence, any important matter was omitted in the defense of the action in consequence of the absence of Dr. H. which might have been made had he been present, aiding and assisting, and that absence was not brought about by the instigation of the defendants, then they were not liable in this action.

5th. It has not been shown by the evidence, that the defendants did not exercise reasonable diligence and skill in the preparation and defense of said action of Adams & Co. v. Hastings, either on the trial in the Superior Court, or in the argument of the appeal in the Supreme Court.

TERRY, C. J. delivered the opinion of the Court — FIELD, J. and BALDWIN, J. concurring.

This is an action against Attorneys, to recover damage for injuries alleged to have resulted from their negligent and unskillful management of a cause in which they were retained by plaintiff.

Judgment was rendered in the Court below for defendants, and plaintiff appealed.

The statement in the record was prepared with reference to plaintiff's motion for a new trial, and contains a stipulation to the effect that it may "be used on the motion for a new trial in this cause, and also on the appeal to the Supreme Court." The Respondent moves to reject this statement, on the ground that the stipulation had reference to a contemplated appeal from the order of the Court on the motion for a new trial; and was not intended to apply to an appeal from the judgment only, in which the propriety of the decision on the motion for new trial was not involved.

It was doubtless contemplated by the parties, at the time of making the stipulation, that an appeal would be taken from any decision which might be rendered by the Judge below upon the motion for a new trial. But it is not perceived that plaintiff is at all benefited, or defendants prejudiced, by the fact that the appeal is taken from the judgment alone; and it is not at all likely that defendants intended to hold plaintiff bound to appeal from both the judgment and order refusing a new trial, or that they would have interposed any objection to his appealing from the judgment alone. We think the language of the stipulation is sufficiently broad to include any appeal which plaintiff should elect to prosecute in the cause, and that the objection to the statement is not well taken.

---

Having disposed of the preliminary objection to the statement, we will proceed to an examination of the case made by the record.

The Court below instructed the jury "that plaintiff had not proved any legal damages as resulting from defendants' neglect," and the point presented by the exception to this instruction necessarily involves an investigation of the evidence given on the trial, and the determination of questions of fact, which are almost the only questions at issue.

It appears that in 1853, plaintiff was part owner of certain lots in San Francisco, on which he, in connection with his cotenants, Adams & Co., Woods, and Flint, Peabody & Co., was constructing large and expensive improvements; that while these improvements were in progress, plaintiff departed from the State, leaving Haven and Briceland as his agents, with full power to act for him in matters pertaining to his interest in the property; that, after his departure, a change was made in the plans of the building, involving a large increase of expenditure; that, in consequence, large advances were made by the banking house of Adams & Co. to defray the expenses incurred in the erection of the buildings, for the one-fourth of which advances, the agents of the plaintiff executed a note or obligation in writing, on the part of the plaintiff, to pay the same, with interest at three per cent. per month from the dates of the various advances; that suit was instituted by Adams & Co. on this obligation, and plaintiff's interest in the property attached; that, after the institution of this suit, plaintiff returned to the State, but within a short period he, after having employed defendants to conduct his defense, again left the State clandestinely, and under an assumed name, in order to avoid service of process, and thus delay the trial of the cause; that defendants appeared in the action as the Attorneys of plaintiff; that the judgment was rendered against plaintiff for the full sum claimed; that an appeal was taken to the Supreme Court, in which the judgment was reversed, because of the allowance of interest for the time prior to the date of the obligation sued on, after which defendants signed a stipulation, agreeing to permit the judgment to stand as affirmed upon the deduction of the amount of interest erroneously allowed in the Court below.

The plaintiff alleges that he had a good defense to the whole of the claim of Adams & Co. because of an unauthorized change in the plans of building, (which had been agreed on by all the parties interested in the property,) made by Woods and Haskell, the agent and resident partner of Adams & Co., by which alone the additional expense was incurred, and the advances made necessary; that defendants were fully informed of this defense, but failed to set it up in answer to the suit, and by stipulating for the affirmance of the judgment, after deducting interest, deprived plaintiff of the benefit of a new trial, in which such defense could have been established.

The only evidence that the defendants were apprised of the grounds of defense stated, is contained in an allegation in the complaint, (which plaintiff insists is not sufficiently controverted by the answer,) and the fact that the plaintiff was, while the suit was pending, and before his second departure from the State, in frequent consultation with defendants, and living upon terms of close intimacy with one of them. It is at all times difficult, if not impracticable, to produce evidence of the tenor of confidential communications between client and Attorney, and perhaps the evidence offered, being the only kind of which the case is susceptible, would be sufficient to warrant the jury in finding that plaintiff had put defendants in possession of all the facts which constituted his defense to the action. But in order to charge the defendants with negligence in failing to set up such defense, he must show by evidence the existence of such facts, and that they were susceptible of proof at the trial by the exercise of proper diligence on the part of his Attorneys. In this the plaintiff has wholly failed. He has, indeed, shown that a material change was made in the plan of the building by which the cost was greatly increased, but so far from showing that this change was made by Woods and Haskell alone, the fact is conclusively established by the evidence of plaintiff's agents that it was approved by both, and actually carried out by one of them, who also acted as Superintendent of the building.

Hastings v. Halleck et al.

---

That no such defense really existed, or could have been proven on the trial of the suit of Adams & Co. v. Hastings, 6 Cal. 126, is further shown by the evidence of O. L. Shafter, Esq., (who argued the case both before the Superior and Supreme Courts,) who testifies to frequent interviews and conversations with plaintiff, whilst the case was pending in the Supreme Court, in which he gave his opinion that plaintiff could derive no advantage from a new trial unless he could overcome the evidence of his agents, Haven and Briceland, as given on the trial. That plaintiff never informed him that this could be done, or mentioned the names of any witnesses by which he could establish a state of facts different from that made out by their evidence, and by the failure of the plaintiff on the trial of this cause to produce such evidence. He has shown the departure from the plans originally adopted to have been ill-advised, and to have entailed a large pecuniary loss on all the parties interested, but he has failed to show any circumstances which would have relieved him from responsibility for his proportion of this loss. The persons who were fully authorized to represent him in the premises consented to the departure, and he was bound by their acts.

It is urged by the Appellant, that a great damage to plaintiff was caused by the stipulation of the defendants to permit the judgment to stand as affirmed in part after it had been reversed in the Supreme Court and the cause remanded for further proceedings, because, but for this stipulation, plaintiff would have been able, upon a new trial of the cause, to establish his defense.

And it is said that, but for this stipulation, "apart from his defense to the whole claim, he would have been able to reduce the ruinous interest of three per cent. per month from the date of the note, February 13th, 1854, to ten per cent. per annum, which would have saved him from seven thousand three hundred and forty-six dollars and eighty-seven cents a year, or upwards of twenty-two thousand dollars, by the time the judgment was satisfied in 1857. The first of these propositions is already answered; the second is untenable. The question as to the rate of interest accruing from the date of the obligation had been directly made and decided, and counsel cannot be charged with neglect for believing that the decision had become the law of the case and could not have been reviewed under the rulings of this Court, in Clary v. Hoagland, (6 Cal. 685.)

---

From a careful examination of all the evidence contained in the record, we are satisfied that the facts proven were sufficient to sustain a verdict for plaintiff, and that there was no error in the instruction complained of. This view renders it unnecessary to examine in detail all the points made in the elaborate and ingenious brief of counsel, the greater part of which seems to have been addressed rather to the allegations of the complaint than to the facts proven on the trial.

Judgment affirmed.

On petition for a rehearing, the following opinion was delivered by TERRY, C. J.—BALDWIN, J., concurring:

Plaintiff asks for a rehearing in this cause, on the ground that the Court had mistaken material facts contained in the record. Before the opinion was rendered, a very careful investigation of the whole record was had. The case was a novel one, involving the professional integrity of respectable Attorneys, and the decision depended mainly on the facts of the record. The charge of the Court below having, as counsel for Appellant consented, "entitled the Appellant to the benefit of every fact in evidence on the trial."

Upon the suggestion of the plaintiff we have again instituted an examination of the statement, and are unable to discover the mistake of fact into which it is claimed the Court became involved.

We think the conclusion stated in the former opinion that the departure from the plans originally adopted by the owners of the building were assented to by Hastings' agents, who had authority to bind him in the premises, is entirely supported by the record. The power of Attorney, authorized Haven and Briceland to represent plaintiff's interest in the property, and to cast his vote in relation thereto in all matters relating to the administration or improvement of the property, and to do and perform every act or thing relating to, and concerning such interest, except the sale or hypothecation thereof. There can be no question as to their power to consent to alterations; as to the fact of such consent having been given, Haven says: "I remember saying to Woods when he showed me his diagrams, that I thought the alterations were wise ones. There was nothing said about the increase of cost. Briceland and myself had frequently spoken of the defects in the original plans."

Hastings v. Halleck et al.

Again, in answer to a question as to his testimony on the trial of a former cause, he said: "Briceland always consulted me about his vote with the other owners, and he cast the vote as we had agreed." Briceland says: "When Mr. Woods proposed to substitute bricks, I objected to it. There was no consultation on the subject. It was simply mentioned in the office. There was a strong force employed, as strong as could be, in filling in, and the winter was coming on. Masons know why it is easier to build in winter with brick than stone. I at last came to the conclusion that it would not be much more expensive, if any, to build with brick than stone. When the winter approached I thought it would be for the interest of the owners to build with brick, as the building could be sooner completed and rendered productive.

Plaintiff says: "That on the eve of Hastings' departure, the four co-owners, including Woods and Haskell, entered into a mutual agreement that the works should be completed according to the original plans, and that the warehouse and wharf being sufficient to bring in a considerable revenue, there should be thenceforth no new outlay, but the expenses of completion should be paid out of the receipts from storage and wharfage.

And further, that it was on the faith of this agreement that the power of Attorney was given to Haven and Briceland."

This is the counsel's conclusion from the testimony of Mr. Flint, who stated that "it was so understood among the owners."

It does not appear that at this time there was anything stored in the building, or that any revenue whatever was collected from the wharf, and if such an anticipation was indulged in by the parties, it must necessarily have resulted in disappointment. No revenue was being derived from the property, and we think it sufficiently appears from the evidence that in the then state of the building there was no probability of realizing any considerable sum from it. Its condition at the time is thus stated by the Superintendent:

"There was in the rear part of the building, a portion of the floor laid — about one-quarter, or thirty or forty feet — the only chance of having storage was either outside the building, or under cover of the floor, that is the floor of the second story. You could not get to the warehouse with any kind of a vehicle at that time. He further says: "I never understood that the improvements were to be completed out of the profits. If I had, I would not have drawn on Adams & Co. and would have discharged all the men."

There was certainly no reasonable ground for indulging the belief that the current revenue of the property would defray the costs of the improvements, and that plaintiff himself had doubts on the subject, is shown by his conversation with Haven, in which he expressed the belief "that moneys would be forthcoming if his own failed, that is, if his part could not be paid, it would be advanced by other partners," and the fact that he undertook to make an arrangement with Adams & Co. to advance the necessary funds, at one and a half per cent. and his giving to Haven, on the eve of his departure, a paper to this effect, which Adams & Co. refused to sign.

It is also objected that illusion is made to the fact that the plaintiff clandestinely left the State to avoid service of process, in the suit of Adams & Co. v. Hastings, which fact the counsel conceives, has no bearing upon the merits of the case, and which he insists is not true.

It was certainly not the design of any member of the Court to go out of the record, to imply a charge affecting the standing of any litigant.

The fact was thought to bear upon the merits of the case. for the reason that one of the charges in the complaint upon which damages are assigned is that defendants, instead of using proper means to procure a speedy trial of the cause, permitted it to remain pending in the Court below for about a year, the interest meantime accumulating at the rate of over seven hundred dollars per month. Defendants urged in reply to this charge that the delay was desired by the plaintiff so earnestly that he took extraordinary means to procure it. The counsel is much mistaken in supposing that evidence of this fact is confined to the sworn answer of defendants. It appears in the testimony of two witnesses called by plaintiff, and is nowhere contradicted.

---

Dr. Maxwell, a witness sworn on behalf of plaintiff, testified:

"When Dr. Hastings left, in 1854, I went part of the way with him to the steamer. * * * I met him somewhere on Washington Street. At his request, stopped short and did not accompany him. He requested me not to go on board, as he did not want it to be known that he was going home. He told me the day before that he was going to remain two weeks longer, and I afterwards learned that at that time he had his ticket in his pocket. He did not tell me the business on which he went home. * * * He intimated to me that it was some private matters that he wished to avoid."

B. F. Voorhies, a witness for plaintiff, "was Cashier of Nicaragua Ship Co. A few days before the sailing of the steamer a gentleman applied to take passage privately. He first applied to Mr. Ralston. I was called to be present at the meeting, and was not informed of his name till he was about leaving. I gave him the cue—a wrong name was put down on the berth-list, which is open to public inspection; but I presume Dr. Hastings' own name was on the ticket, for the tickets were only taken up after getting to sea. * * * John Smith, or some bogus name, was put down on the berth-list. It is a common thing to do. I know that it was Dr. Hastings' from a private mark I placed under the bogus name on the berth-list, to guide me in making out the tickets."

Application denied.

THE Uncle Sam Mining Company execute a mortgage upon their mining claims to R., a Director of the company. The mortgage was in fact in trust to secure F. et als. who had, as sureties of R., signed with him a joint and several note to D. for money loaned by him to R. The money was for the Company. R. assigns this mortgage to F. to secure him against his liability on the note, delivering the mortgage, at the same time, to F., who retained it a few minutes and returned it to R. to receive the interest from the company, as agent for him, F. The note is unpaid; R. owes the company nothing; Heid, that after the assignment, R. had no interest in the mortgage which a judgment creditor could reach; that the delivery of the mortgage to R. for the purpose of collecting interest, there being no circumstance of fraud or suspicion, did not impair the rights of the assignee; that the liability of F. et als. as sureties was a sufficient consideration for the assignment, and that such assignment is not a mortgage of a mortgage.

---

Hall v. Redding et als.

---

The doctrine of continuous possession of personal property after sale or mortgage does not apply to the case of a paper, the mere evidence of a debt. Nor does the Chattel Mortgage Act, or the general statute of frauds apply to such case.

APPEAL from the Fourteenth District.

The mortgage to Redding was executed under the Chattel Mortgage Act, and was direct to him without expressing on its face any trust in favor of Fall et als. Plaintiff appeals.

McConnell, for Appellant.

I. Did the relation of principal and sureties, subsisting between Redding and Fall, Taylor and others, of itself operate to vest in them any present interest, legal or equitable, in the mortgage from the Uncle Sam Company to Redding?

II. If it did not, then did the assignment from Redding to Fall operate to pass the title in such mortgage?

The debt for which Fall is surety has not been paid. The relation of principal and surety of itself involves no higher equities than that of debtor and creditor. It is only when the surety pays the debt of his principal that his equities begin to vest. He then becomes entitled to demand from the creditor all the securities and remedies against the principal debtor which he at any time had, and if the creditor has released or extinguished any of these securities it may operate to discharge the surety. But this rule does not seem to have ever been applied as between the surety and the principal debtor himself.

The rule as between the creditor and surety, is founded upon the idea of trust. The creditor is regarded in equity as occupying the position of Trustee for the surety who has paid the debt. But there is no element of trust in the relation subsisting between the surety and the principal debtor. A surety before judgment has no legal or equitable liens against the property of his principal. The latest case on this question is Copis v. Middleton, reported in Mylne & Keene.

The next question is, is there an express trust?

There is no mention of the trust in the mortgage deed, nor was there any other paper produced declaring the trusts, or leaving the uses otherwise than as they were limited by the terms of the mortgage itself, that is to Redding. There is, in a legal point of view, an express trust in favor of Redding himself, existing by the direct terms of the deed, which the defendants seek to set aside by parol proof of the intention of one only of the parties to the deed, viz. Redding.

---

Again, there can be no such thing as an express trust over lands or fixed property unless it be declared in writing. (Wood's Digest, 106, Secs. 6 and 7, of an Act concerning Fraudulent Conveyances and Contracts.)

We contend, next, that the assignment was insufficient to pass the title to the mortgage.

The assignment in terms is to secure Fall as surety. It is, therefore, a mortgage of a mortgage. Every conveyance for the purpose of securing the payment of a debt, the performance of any act, is a mortgage. The original mortgage itself was executed in pursuance of what is termed the Chattel Mortgage Act. (See Wood's Digest, 106, 109.)

The question is, what interest Redding had in the mining claims by virtue of the mortgage to him?

If he had any estate, either legal or equitable, then in order to mortgage that interest to Fall, the same steps were necessary which were required to mortgage the mining ground itself. The assignment does not purport to be in conformity with the Chattel Mortgage Act. It appears, on the contrary, to have been an intentional departure therefrom. Therefore it did not pass Redding's estate, if he had an estate. But the law does not give to the mortgagee an estate in the thing mortgaged. A mortgage is a chose in action. (McMillan v. Richards, 9 Cal. 368.) A chose in action passes by delivery.

Besides, Fall had possession of the mortgaged property for the space of fifteen minutes, and then redelivered it to Redding as his agent. This violates the Statute of Frauds. (Wood's Dig. 107.)

III. The finding of facts by the Court is contrary to the evidence, and, therefore, the conclusions of law of the Court are erroneous.

Vanclef & Stewart, for Respondents, argued that no debt ever existed from the company to Redding, and that the mortgage was given to secure Redding and his co-obligors on the note to Decker. If Redding had himself paid the notes, the company might have been indebted to him, and such debt might have been secured by the mortgage. Before this assignment, Fall, in equity, had the same interest in the mortgage that Redding had; and the assignment was made for the purpose of greater security to Fall, and for the purpose of giving him a direct remedy against the Uncle Sam Company in case he was compelled to pay the note. This was consideration enough to make the assignment valid. (Hickox v. Lowe et al. 10 Cal. 197; Dana v. Stanford, Id. 269.)

Hall v. Redding et al.

---

The statute requiring an actual and continued change of possession, applies only to goods and chattels, and not to a mortgage. (Wood's Digest, 107, Sec. 15.)

The assignment is in writing, subscribed by the party making it, and is sufficient. (Runyon v. Mersereau, 11 John. 534.) If no assignment had been made the Appellant could not have maintained his action. Redding had not paid, and could not pay, the debt to Decker. Fall is still liable and solvent. A Court of Equity will not in such a case rob him of his only security.

BALDWIN, J. delivered the opinion of the Court — FIELD, J. concurring.

This was a bill filed by the plaintiff as a creditor of Redding, to subject to plaintiff's judgment a mortgage executed to Redding by the Uncle Sam Mining Company. The bill charged that Redding had, before the judgment, made a pretended assignment of this mortgage to the defendant, Fall, to secure him against a certain demand against Redding, for which Fall was his security. This assignment the bill charges to be fraudulent. 1. It was without legal consideration. 2. Made to hinder creditors. 3. Because the mortgage was not delivered to Fall. 4. And it is further asserted that the assignment is insufficient on its face to pass the title of the mortgage.

Fall and Redding answered by denying the fraud charged.

The Judge below finds this state of facts: That in September, 1857, Redding was President of this mining company, and that the company authorized Redding and one Burgess to buy a steam engine and other machinery to work the claims; that to raise the money they negotiated a loan with one Decker for five thousand dollars, to secure which, the note of Redding, Fall, and two others—the last three as sureties—was made; that of this sum three thousand dollars was appropriated to buying a steam engine and appurtenances—the balance paid to the Treasurer of the company or laid out for its uses; the machinery was placed in the claims, where it is yet. At the maturity of the note, Decker delivered it to the makers, and it was canceled, when a new note was given to Decker, for the same money, due 25th of May, 1858, signed by Redding, Fall, Taylor, and one Gingle; the company paid the interest on these notes as it fell due. That some time after the five thousand dollars was obtained, and before the making of the mortgage to Redding, in the bill mentioned, the company issued an order on the Treasurer of said company, payable to Fall and others, for the sum of five thousand dollars. That at the time this mortgage was executed, a settlement took place between Redding and the company, and a balance of one hundred dollars found due the company from Redding, which was deducted from the order drawn in favor of Fall & Co. Redding then desired that the company should execute a mortgage on the mining claims to secure Fall et al. against their liability on the note to Decker; this the company refused to do, for the reason that they did not wish to have so many creditors, but proposed to execute a mortgage to Redding individually; this was accordingly done on the 12th April, 1858, and it is the one in controversy. On the execution of the mortgage, Redding delivered up to the company the order in favor of Fall et al. When the last note to Decker became due, he demanded a renewal of it, and the makers renewed it, taking up the former. At this renewal, Redding assigned the mortgage to Fall, and both the assignment and mortgage were duly recorded, 25th May, 1858. That at the time of the assignment of the mortgage, the same was delivered to Fall, who retained it for a few minutes and then returned it to Redding, as the agent of Fall, to receive the interest of the company. The Court finds that the consideration of this assignment was the liability of Fall et als. on this note to Decker. The Court find the subsequent acts of the parties consistent with the arrangement—the Decker note has not yet been paid by these sureties. There is no debt due from the company to Redding, other than appears from the facts already stated.

---

---

The Court accordingly dismissed the bill.

We think rightly. The object of the bill being to seize and appropriate the interest of Redding in this mortgage, treating it as a valid security in his hands, no question, of course, is raised as to its validity. The only question is a question of fact, whether Redding had any interest, which, in equity, should go to this creditor. In order so to hold, it is necessary to show that Redding had a beneficial interest in the subject matter. It might be difficult for the plaintiff to show, even if there had been no assignment of this mortgage, it having been executed to Redding merely in trust, that he had such interest. But after the assignment which executed the trust, there is no pretense that any interest remained which could be appropriated by the creditor of Redding, the latter being the mere conduit through which this title passed. Nor do we consider that any further delivery of the mortgage or assignment of it as security for the protection of Fall than is proven was necessary. A corporal delivery and retention of a paper answers none of the purposes of publicity or notice which are subserved by the possession of personal or even real estate, though delivery, of course, is essential to give effect to the contract. But, after such delivery, the lodging of the paper in the hands of the nominal mortgagee for the purpose of collecting the interest, did not, in the absence of any circumstance of fraud or suspicion, impair the right of the assignee. The papers were recorded, and it nowhere appears that the transaction misled the plaintiff or induced him to advance his money or extend credit to his debtor, much less that anything was done by Fall with this design. It seems to be a fair transaction, entirely free from fraud, and there is no pretense for holding that the defendant, Redding, had any interest in the mortgage debt or property which a Court of Equity could subject to the payment of the plaintiff's claim. The Appellant supposes that the evidence does not sustain this finding of facts; but certainly, taking the whole transaction together, it tended to establish the main facts stated. But we do not deem it very important to view critically the proofs; for enough of the statement is undisputed to justify the conclusion of the Court.

The assignment of the mortgage was sufficient. We do not understand it to be a mortgage of a mortgage. It is the assignment of a mortgage for a particular purpose, to wit: the security of the assignee as surety for a note. But the assignment vested all the interest of the mortgagees in the assignee, who could enforce the mortgage and hold the proceeds in trust for the proper purposes of the assignment. Nothing was required of him but to make the assignment available in the given contingency, or, probably, he might have enforced it before he was required to pay the debt. It is like a promissory note assigned as a security to a party for indemnity against his suretyship. The consideration of such liability is sufficient to support the assignment, and it is not required, in order to the validity of the transfer, that the assignee, after receiving it, should keep the paper in his pocket or his desk all the time. The doctrine of continuous possession of personal property has no application to the case of a paper, the mere evidence of a debt. Nor is it embraced by the provisions of the Chattel Mortgage Act, or the general Statute of Frauds.

McDonald & Blackburn v. Bear River and Auburn Water and Mining Company.

---

Decree affirmed.

McDONALD & BLACKBURN v. THE BEAR RIVER AND AUBURN WATER AND MINING COMPANY.

New trial not granted on affidavit of the Attorney of record, that he as well as his client and witnesses were absent on the trial of the case, because of a verbal agreement by opposing counsel to give notice of day of trial, when such affidavit is met by counter affidavits by the opposing counsel, and when an Attorney did appear and contest the case on the trial.

In an action of damages for diverting the water of a river from plaintiffs' mill, an averment in the complaint of possession of the land and mill, is sufficient against a trespasser, without averring riparian ownership or prior appropriation of the water.

Where no words appear in the body of an instrument expressive of the intent to make it a sealed instrument, it will not be such, even though the characters [L. s.] are added to the signature.

A general objection will not exclude a paper offered in evidence, unless on its face inadmissible or void.

Though an instrument be inadmissible as evidence of title, because on its face it is doubtful whether it be the deed of the agent executing it or of the principal, still it may be admissible to show the date of plaintiffs' possession; and if the agent was in the actual occupancy of the land, the paper would be good to show a surrender by him to plaintiff.

Arguendo: Right to water acquired by appropriation may be transferred like other property.

Arguendo: If by the erection of a mill and the possessory right of land on a stream, the water be acquired, a transfer of the possession of the property to a vendee, as owner, passes the water right.

Arguendo: An appropriation of water for mill purposes, stands on the same footing as an appropriation for the use of miners.

McDonald & Blackburn v. Bear River and Auburn Water and Mining Company.

Where a power of Attorney, not under seal, authorizes the agent to sell a saw-mill, dwelling, etc. by the execution of all needful instruments, sealed or otherwise, and the agent sells the right of the principal, by a paper not under seal, representing himself as the Attorney of the principal, and the vendee takes possession, and retains it for several years, he has an equitable estate in the premises, with the right to its full enjoyment, and this right, united to possession, enables him to maintain an action for interruption to his possession or injury to the property.

The rule requiring an instrument to be executed or signed in the name of the principal does not apply to instruments not under seal.

If the name of the principal and the intention to bind him, appear in an instrument not under seal, the agent having authority, the principal alone will be bound, though the instrument be signed in the agent's name only.

A power of Attorney to sell "my saw-mill, dwelling, etc. said mill and other improvements being situated," etc. embraces the water privilege of the mill.

Arguendo: Where a party takes up a mill seat on public agricultural land, erects a saw-mill, dwelling, etc. and appropriates the water of the stream for the use of the mill, he may use the water for a grist-mill erected at the same place years afterwards.

It would require clear proof that the purposes of the water for the saw-mill had been fully answered, to hold that the title to the water was abandoned. This question cannot be raised for the first time on appeal.

V. erects a mill and acquires a water right in 1850. In 1851 defendants appropriate for ditch purposes, water from the same stream, forty miles above the mill. In 1854 plaintiffs, M. & B. succeed to the possession of V. Held: that plaintiffs may, possibly, recover damages for the diversion of the water, on their possession, without connecting themselves with the title of V. back to 1850; that defendants' appropriation in 1851 could only be of the water not appropriated by V. there being no abandonment by him, and that M. & B. can jointly maintain an action for damages accruing after they came into possession.

At all events, the objection that M. & B. have no common interest in the mill, etc. but claim title from V. under different rights, should have been taken by motion for nonsuit or upon instructions, the want of common interest appearing from plaintiffs' evidence.

The question of the Statute of Limitations cannot be raised on appeal, unless presented in some form on the trial below, even though it be pleaded.

APPEAL from the Tenth District.

Action of damages for the diversion of the water of Bear River to the injury of plaintiffs' saw and grist-mills situated on that stream.

The original complaint was filed March 6th, 1857, and an amended complaint filed January 18th, 1858. The difference between the original and amended complaint consists in the substitution of the phrase "one thousand inches of water sectional area, with a two and one-half foot head," instead of "one thousand cubic inches of water."

Among other things the complaint avers that plaintiffs "are lawfully possessed of a certain saw-mill and grist-mill, works and premises, with the appurtenances, situate and being in the county of Yuba, California, and situate upon a stream called Bear River, and by reason thereof, etc. * * * ought to have and enjoy the benefit and advantage of the water of said stream or water-course * * * called Bear River."

McDonald & Blackburn v. Bear River and Auburn Water and Mining Company.

---

The complaint also avers, in substance, that, by reason of the diversion of the water by defendants' ditch, plaintiffs have lost the use of their mill; have suffered in the reputation of the mills; have been put to great expense on account of their not running; have lost the profits which would have accrued, and claim damages in the sum of twenty-five thousand dollars.

The complaint describes defendants as the "Bear River and Auburn Water and Mining Company," composed of numerous persons unknown to plaintiffs, etc. but does not aver it to be a corporation.

An answer was filed to the original complaint denying, generally, its allegations and setting up the Statute of Limitations of three and five years, and that defendants were in possession of the land and water, etc. as public land, and using it for mining purposes. To the amended complaint a demurrer was filed, on the ground: 1st. Defect of parties defendant in not averring defendant to be a corporation, etc. 2d. Want of facts to constitute a cause of action. Demurrer overruled February 1st, 1858. The Attorney of record, Crocker, being absent, the demurrer was argued for him by Mr. Rowe. No time for answering was given, as none was asked. February 8th, 1858, the cause was called for trial, and, in the absence of Mr. Crocker, as also of the defendants and their witnesses, Mr. Rowe, an Attorney employed by Mr. C. to attend to serving notices, etc. appeared, and a continuance being refused, conducted the trial for defendants. Defendants asked the following instructions, which were refused and exceptions taken:

1st. That unless the jury believe, from the evidence, that the defendants turned the waters of Bear River into the ditch themselves, the plaintiffs cannot recover.

2d. That the defendants are not liable for any injury occasioned by miners or others turning the water into the plaintiffs' ditch.

4th. That the jury must be satisfied, from the evidence, that the division of the water was not occasioned by any other cause than the defendants' dam and ditch, or the plaintiffs cannot recover.

The Court instructed the jury as stated in the opinion. Verdict for plaintiffs, twenty-one thousand and eight dollars. Motion for new trial on most of the grounds authorized by law. The grounds mainly relied on were, that neither defendants nor their attorney of record, Crocker, knew of the trial until it was over, because of an alleged verbal agreement on the part of Bryan, Attorney of plaintiffs, not to bring the case on without notice to Crocker, and that there was no issue, no answer having been filed to the amended complaint. The motion was based on affidavits by one of the defendants and others, and by Crocker, stating the alleged agreement with Bryan, surprise, etc. an answer being annexed.

A counter affidavit was filed by Bryan, denying any such agreement, according to the best of his recollection. The Court overruled the motion, on the ground that the affidavits of defendants were contradicted, and that it would not notice verbal agreements between counsel. And, further, that the defendants were not entitled to answer the amended complaint after demurrer overruled, without leave of Court on motion. Defendants appeal.

E. B. Crocker and Gregory Yale, for Appellants, argued: 1st. That the complaint was defective in not averring that plaintiffs were the riparian owners, or the first appropriators, of the water of Bear River, and that the allegation of possession merely was insufficient; citing Tuolumne Company v. Chapman, (8 Cal. 397,) Parke v. Kilham, (Id. 79,) to the point, that diversion of a water-course is a nuisance. The owner of the property must bring the action. (Practice Act, Section 249; Leigh Company v. Independent Ditch Co. 8 Cal. 323; Crandall v. Woods, Id. 144.)

Counsel also argued, that Tartar v. Spring Creek Water Company, (5 Cal. 397,) and Fitzgerald v. Urton, (Id. 309,) go too far in protecting the appropriators of water, for mill purposes, and town lots against miners. That the mill in this case being forty miles below the point on Bear River, where defendants' ditch takes the water, to give plaintiffs exclusive use of the water for the purposes of the mill, is a violation of the entire policy of the State relative to mining interests.

2d. The demurrer should have been sustained upon the ground that no damage is set forth in the complaint. The only mention of damages is in the prayer, as part of the relief claimed. (Prac.

McDonald & Blackburn v. Bear River and Auburn Water and Mining Company.

tice Act, Sec. 39.) The particular circumstances out of which the damages arose, are nowhere stated in the complaint. (Goodman v. Stebbins, 2 Cal. 103; 1 Saund. Pl. and Ev. 918, Ed. of 1851; 1 Chitty's Pl. 338, 396; Sedg. Measure of Damages, 574, 575; Chitty's Pl. 385-388; 8 T. R. 133; Peake's N. P. C. 46, 62; 9 Coke, 113, a; 1 Saund. 346 a. b. n. 2; 2 East, 154; 1 Saund. 243, n. 5; Vin's Abr. Ev. tit. b. 6. See, also, 9 Wend. 425.) The doctrine is unquestionable. (Bogart v. Burkhalter, 2 Barb. 525; Donnell v. Jones, 13 Ala. N. S. 490; and Rowand v. Bellinger, 3 Strobb. 373.)

3d. The demurrer should have been sustained upon the ground that there was not a proper party defendant.

The 29th Section of the Practice Act requires the complaint to contain the names of the parties to the action, plaintiff and defendant. The complaint was not framed under Section 69, but under Section 14. This section has been decided in Andrews v. Mokelumne Hill Co. (7 Cal. 333,) to be applicable to equity cases only, and not to actions at law. This is strictly an action at law. If it was intended to declare against the defendants as a corporation, such should have been averred. (Wood's Dig. 115, Art. 448; 6 Cal. 186; 5 Id. 503; 4 Black. 50; 4 Sandf. 657, 659.)

As to errors on the trial. The paper purporting to be a deed from B. J. Van Court to McDonald, dated March 25th, 1854, is void on its face, and should not have been admitted in evidence. (Story's Agency, Secs. 147, 149, Note 4.) The name of the principal is not signed to it, nor is he described in it as grantor, and the Attorney had no power to make a deed, his power not being under seal.

Without this paper, plaintiffs could not show themselves prior appropriators of the water, or that they had title by connecting themselves with the possession of B. J. Van Court, in 1850.

The power of attorney was not under seal, and hence the principal was not bound by a deed signed by the agent. (Dunlap's Palcý, 157, Note A, to top page 156, Note C, top page 157.)

Under this paper neither the land nor the grist-mill could be sold. (6 Cal. 373; 7 Id. 171.)

The contract made between A. Van Court and plaintiff, Blackburn, does not give him any interest in the land or saw-mill, and yet he has recovered damages jointly with McDonald for injury to the saw-mill in which he has no interest. There is, therefore, a misjoinder of causes of action. B. J. Van Court should have been co-plaintiff instead of Blackburn. Tenants in common must join in an action for the diversion of a water-course. (8 Cal. 77.)

McDonald & Blackburn v. Bear River and Auburn Water and Mining Company.

---

A water right cannot be transferred in any way except by deed. The mere delivery of possession of the land, and the mills by which the water is used, will not do. (Angell on Water Courses, Secs. 168-172; Wood's Dig. 106, Sec. 6; Hill v. Newman, 5 Cal. 445; McCanon v. O'Connell, 7 Id. 152; Jenkins v. Redding, 8 Id. 598; McKeon v. Bisber, 9 Id. 137; Partridge v. Townsend, 10 Cal. 181; 5 Id. 40-87, 249, 485; 4 Id. 33, 69; Bird v. Lisbros, 9 Id. 1; 4 Id. 209; Howard v. Easton, 7 Johna. 205; Stephens v. Mansfield, 11 Cal. 365; Simpson v. Downing, 23 Wend. 320; O'Keiffe v. Cunningham, 9 Cal. 590.) Some of the cases cited refer to transfers of mining claims. (See, also, 1 Denio, 550; 5 Barb. 364; 7 N. H. 523; 1 Sugden's Vendors, 111, 126; 16 Wend. 28; 8 Barb. 130; Riddle v. Brown, 20 Alb. 412.)

During the argument it was suggested that, though these papers did not constitute a conveyance, yet they might give a right to call for a deed. But the complaint is strictly for a legal cause of action, following Chitty's forms literally. And this Court has held that the essential and inherent distinctions between law and equity are not abolished by the Practice Act. (Smith v. Rowe, 4 Cal. 6; De Witt v. Hayes, 2 Id. 463.)

And if a party has an equitable cause of action or defense, his pleadings must be framed accordingly. (Thayer v. White, 3 Cal. 228; Smith v. Rowe, 4 Id. 6; De Witt v. Hayes, 2 Id. 463; Coates v. Campbell, 3 Id. 191; 4 Id. 227; 5 Id. 156; 6 Id. 56.)

But plaintiffs insist that, being in possession, they had a right to maintain the action upon proof of that fact alone, and cite numerous authorities. These authorities merely show that persons in possession of land can maintain trespass, that they are proper parties; but the case of Fentiman v. Smith, (4 East, 107,) shows that possession is insufficient in actions for the diversion of water, unless the plaintiff has the right to the use of the water. The question is who has the right to the use of this water? We say that, as against the plaintiffs, defendants have the better right to it, as they appropriated it prior to plaintiffs.

(Irwin v. Phillips, 5 Cal. 140; Tartar v. Spring Creek Co. 5 Id. 395; Bird v. Lisbros, 9 Id. 1.)

In the answer we plead limitation of five years, and also of three years.

An action for "trespass upon real property" must be commenced within three years. (Wood's Dig. 47.)

This is an action, not for the "recovery of real property," but to recover damages for a "trespass upon real property," that is, for the diversion of the water from plaintiff's land. It is, therefore, governed by the three years' limitation law.

The evidence shows that we appropriated the water in June, 1851, actually diverted it in the fall of 1852; and this action was not commenced until March 6, 1857, more than four years afterwards. The statute, therefore, commenced running, at least from the time we actually diverted it. This was before the sale to plaintiffs, which was in March, 1854.

If they claim that their right of action accrued from the time of their purchase, and that the statute only commenced running, as to them, from that time, we reply that a party cannot stop the running of the statute by conveying to a third party.

In addition to the above it is urged, that the offer to prove that the water was diverted by others, below the point where the defendants' ditch takes the water from the Bear River, and the rejection of the evidence by the Court below, entitles the defendants to a reversal of the judgment. The charge is against a particular company, and that company proves that the injury was committed by others. As an elementary rule of pleading, the evidence is material, and goes directly to the issue. A general denial would let in this evidence.

In Lower v. Winter, (7 Cowen, 264,) the Court admits that improvements can be sold by parol, but refers to Howard v. Easton, (7 Johns. 205,) as a contract for the sale of the possession to the land, and the case is placed upon the principle that possession is prima facie evidence of title to land. This is the principle contended for by the plaintiffs; that their possession is evidence of title, and yet that this possession can be sold by word of mouth.

Is the water privilege attached to the improvements or to the land, the possessory interest in the land? If to the improvements which could be removed and placed on another piece of land. then the water privilege would follow the improvements to another stream, or another district, where timber is not so scarce. But in all probability the water right will be held to follow the land, and not the improvements.

McDonald & Blackburn v. Bear River and Auburn Water and Mining Company.

---

Mr. Brown states the rule emphatically in his work on the Statute of Frauds. In Sec. 231 he says: "Mere possession of land seems to be properly regarded as such interest in or concerning the land itself as cannot be contracted for or disposed of without writing."

How, then, can the plaintiff claim the possessory title, on conveying the water right, without connecting themselves by deed with those in possession prior to the appropriation in June, 1851, by the defendants?

The Court is not bound to fix a time to file an answer after demurrer overruled. The party must apply for time if he desires it. (Practice Act, Sec. 67.)

Defendants were represented on the trial by an Attorney, and that the Attorney of record was absent, is no fault of plaintiffs.

The complaint is sufficient without averring ownership, etc. It is taken literally from 2 Chitty's Pleading, 785-793; (see also, 1 Chitty Pl. 379, 380; 1 East, 244; 4 T. R. 719; 5 East, 276; Com. Dig. Pl. C. 39; 2 Lord Raymond, 1228; 2 Saunders' Pl. and Ev. Vol. 2, Part 1, 462, 463; Angell on Water Courses, Sec. 407, and cases cited; 18 Conn. 243; 8 Barr. 13.)

This Court has never decided otherwise.

It is not necessary in an action for the diversion of a water-course, that the particular circumstances out of which damages arose should be stated in the declaration. (See 2 Chitty, before cited; 17 Com. 297; Stephen on Pleading, 428; 1 Gilman, 544; 2 Johns. 149.)

The point as to want of proper party is not tenable, under the 69th section of the Practice Act. Besides, having answered the complaint without raising the question, the demurrer to the amended complaint only goes to the portion amended. (Practice Act, Sec. 45.)

The various papers offered in evidence were properly admitted, the defendants not specifying any ground of objection.

McDonald & Blackburn v. Bear River and Auburn Water and Mining Company.

---

(Provost v. Piper, 9 Cal.) Nor could defendants question the proper execution of the papers, because they were not subsequent purchasers, nor was there any privity of interest between their right to the water and the right of plaintiffs. (8 Cal. 187.)

Upon the point that a new trial was correctly refused, we cite: (Rogers v. Huie, 1 Cal. 429; Cooke v. Stewart, 2 Id. 348; Brooks v. Lyon, 3 Id. 113; Speck v. Hoyt, 3 Id. 413; 3 A. K. Marshall, 81; 7 Smedes & M. 270; 2 Zabriskie, 19; Steret v. Culver, 6 Mo. 254; 2 Bibb, 177; 4 Humph. 229; 1 Caines, 111; 8 Mo. 186; 3 Bibb, 80; 2 Cowen, 578.)

As to the Statute of Limitations, we say: The only evidence upon the subject of adverse possession by defendants was that of J. A. Hill, a witness called by us, and he swears that the Bear River Company turned their water into the ditch "about September, 1852."

This suit was brought early in the spring of 1857, inside of the five years. We could not be injured until the water was turned into the ditch. If we were injured, then dating from the moment they turned in the water the five years lacks six months of having expired. But the fact is that we were not injured until 1854. Then: 1. If the limitation of five years could run in this case we are inside of it from the time of the turning the water in. 2. It could not run until we ascertained their possession.

The former opinion of this Court is erroneous in regard to the facts in relation to Blackburn's interest. We did not introduce the paper between Alexander Van Court and Blackburn for the purpose of showing title, but to locate the time he went into possession. (Provost v. Piper et al. 9 Cal. 552.) Throw the paper out of the case and the testimony shows that we did succeed to Van Court's possession, and this is sufficient. (Biquette v. Caulfield, 4 Cal. 278; Morris v. Russell, 5 Id. 249; Partridge v. Townsend et al. 10 Id.)

If we have succeeded to Van Court's possession, and his possession was prior to the defendants', we can recover. It is mill property upon U. S. Government land, and a verbal sale and transfer of the possession would be sufficient.

A party who does not claim title, but is treated as a wrong-

McDonald & Blackburn v. Bear River and Auburn Water and Mining Company.

---

doer, cannot go behind our possession, whether it be actual or constructive. (Bequette v. Caulfield, 4 Cal. 278, 279.)

If the bill of sale or agreement was of any consequence to us, they failed to make any objection to its introduction in evidence, and it is too late to object to it now. (Provost v. Piper et al. 9 Cal. 552.)

We are in possession under B. J. Van Court, he being in possession in 1854 by the possession of his agent, A. Van Court. When we "succeed to the possession we succeeded to Benjamin Van Court's possession, which runs back to 1850, the waters of Bear River being used and appropriated by A. Van Court that year.

If we had alleged title, we might be held to prove it. If the half of the title be in B. J. Van Court at the time of the suit, yet still, we, succeeding to his possession, are the only persons who can sue. If Van Court be landlord and we tenants, he cannot sue. (1 Chitty's Pleadings, 175, and Note 4 and authorities cited.)

The party in possession of real property is the only person who can maintain this action, whether it is for an injury to the land or a right growing out of land, such as to water. Van Court, even if he had title, could not maintain this action against a stranger and trespasser. (Miller v. Fulton, 4 Ham. Ohio, 433; 1 John. 510; 3 Id. 468; 12 Id. 183; 8 Pick. 235; 15 Id. 32; 19 Conn. 154; 2 Greenl. Ev. Sec. 618.) As to parol evidence of ownership, see 5 Gil. Ill. 506.

Now, McDonald has a clear and admitted right to one-half interest (running back years behind the possession of defendants) to the waters of Bear River. B. J. Van Court, as well as his agent, A. Van Court, have been out of possession since 1854, during which time the injuries complained of have been committed. B. J. Van Court cannot sue, being out of possession. McDonald is admitted to be rightfully in possession, and Blackburn has been in possession with him during the committing of the grievances, claiming ownership, whether rightfully in possession or not. McDonald cannot sue alone, for all in possession must join in the action.

In reply to a supplemental brief of Appellant, counsel argued, that Howard v. Easton (7 Johns.) was a suit inter partes, and had no application; and the defendants here being trespassers a writing was unnecessary. And, further, that plaintiffs had writings, which, at least, are contracts to purchase, and, as such, admissible in evidence to show the character of their possession. (Moore v. Moore, 21 Maine, 350; 1 Chit. PL. 62; 1 East, 244; 4 Taunton, 547; 3 Met. 239; 14 Pick. 297; 2 Greenl. Ev. 618.)

McDonald & Blackburn v. Bear River and Auburn Water and Mining Company.

---

At the July Term, 1858, an opinion was delivered by BURNETT, J.—TERRY, C. J. concurring, reversing the judgment, on the ground that plaintiff, Blackburn, had no interest in the premises, not connecting himself with the possession of A. Van Court.

On rehearing, BALDWIN, J. delivered the opinion of the Court —TERRY, C. J. and FIELD, J. concurring.

1. Many technical and minor points are taken by the Appellants which we do not deem it necessary to consider. Some of these are frivolous, and some unsustained by the record. The refusal of the Court to grant a new trial upon the affidavit of the Attorney was proper. No sufficient cause was shown. If we could listen to affidavits of oral agreements or understandings of counsel, yet the fact that an Attorney appeared for the defendant and contested this case on the trial, and the counter affidavits of the plaintiffs' Attorneys, sufficiently negated the grounds of the motion for this cause.

2. Nor is there anything in the objection taken in the demurrer to the complaint. It is a very formal pleading, and is, in itself, unobjectionable. It follows the approved precedents in actions for the diversion of water. It avers the possession of the plaintiffs of the land, and the subject of the injury; and that is enough against trespassers which the defendants are charged to be.

3. Still worse grounded is the objection that ten days were not given the defendants to answer the formal amended complaint.

4. Upon the trial the plaintiffs introduced evidence for the purpose of showing title to the water in dispute. The plaintiffs claimed that the water had been appropriated by one Van Court before the defendants' right accrued, or they had taken possession, and they claimed that Van Court had gone upon this land in 1850, and taken actual possession, and built a saw mill, and afterwards a grist mill, on public land, using the waters of Bear

McDonald & Blackburn v. Bear River and Auburn Water and Mining Company.

---

River for mill purposes. Van Court remained in possession, by A. Van Court, his brother, until 1854, when he placed McDonald in possession. The following paper was executed at the time:

"Know all men by these presents, that I, Alexander Van Court, of the county of Yuba, State of California, do sell and convey all the right, title, and interest, of B. J. Van Court in the property, to wit: one saw-mill, situated on Bear River, with everything appertaining to said mill; also, the one-half of the merchant and flouring mills; also, all the machinery appertaining to said mills; one dwelling-house, kitchen, and one chest of tools, (millwright,) log chains, etc. also all the interest that the said Van Courts have in a ferry or erection of a ferry on Bear River, near said mills; also, the pre-emption of one hundred and sixty acres of land running up and down Bear River, and belonging to said mills, and all the above named property to be free from all arrears; and I, Alexander Van Court, being my brother's legally authorized Attorney, do sell, convey, transfer, and set over, to J. L. McDonald, all the above named property, for the consideration of two thousand dollars, for which I, Alexander Van Court, receive one thousand in hand, and the other thousand at the completion of the Merchant Mills, when the same are in good operative order.

ALEXANDER VAN COURT, [L. S.]"

This instrument, it will be observed, is not under seal, for though the characters (L. S.) are added to the name of Alexander Van Court, yet no words are in the body of the instrument expressive of the intent to make it a sealed instrument. It was not, therefore, a deed, but only an executory agreement, if sufficient in other respects. It is insisted that this paper was not admissible in evidence; but no specific objection was taken to it at the time it was offered. The general objection was not enough to exclude it, unless plainly upon its face inadmissible or void. The plaintiffs claimed by possession, and this paper, if not otherwise admissible, was proper evidence to show the date of their possession, and, perhaps, the character under which McDonald entered. Besides, the actual occupancy seems to have been in Alexander Van Court, and so far as plaintiffs had gone at the time of offering this paper, it might have been enough to show that the person in actual occupancy, supposing this to be the deed of Alexander and not of B. J. Van Court, had surrendered his claim to the plaintiff, McDonald; so that there was no error in admitting this paper. We shall have occasion to consider this paper and its effect further when we proceed to discuss the merits of this case. The same objection, in the same form, was taken to a paper executed on the 30th March, 1853, by Alexander Van Court to his brother, B. J. and to a paper executed by B. J. Van Court, not under seal, purporting to be a power of attorney to Alexander, authorizing the sale of his saw-mill, etc. Under this power Alexander made the sale through which plaintiffs claim. The same remarks so far apply to this paper as to the other.

---

McDonald & Blackburn v. Bear River and Auburn Water and Mining Company.

---

On the 20th March, 1854, Blackburn made a contract with Alexander, respecting the construction of a grist-mill, by which he became interested in the premises, at least to the extent of the water needed for that mill. It is urged that there was no conveyance to Blackburn, of any interest in the saw-mill or in the one hundred and sixty acres of land. The defendants claim that they appropriated the waters of Bear River in June, 1851, at a distance of forty miles above the mills; and this was prior, of course, to the actual possession of the plaintiffs, but subsequent to the first appropriation by Van Court and one Moore, under whom Van Court claimed. It would seem that if the plaintiffs relied upon their possession alone, they could not by force of it recover damages for a trespass committed before, nor for water diverted prior to their title. Their mere possession would give them title only to that which they possessed. They would take the premises as they found them; and if the water had been diverted from the old channel anterior to the acquiring of their possession, they could not regain it. It was probably in view of this principle that they sought to connect themselves with the title of their predecessors, in order to show that this water in dispute was really a part of their title or property. The ownership of water, as a substantive and valuable property, distinct, sometimes, from the land through which it flows, has been recognized by our Courts; and this ownership, of course, draws to it all the legal remedies for its invasion. The right accrues from appropriation; this appropriation is the intent to take, accompanied by some

McDonald & Blackburn v. Bear River and Auburn Water and Mining Company.

---

open, physical demonstration of the intent, and for some valuable use. We have held that there is no difference in respect to this use, or rather purpose, to which the water is to be applied; at least, that an appropriation for the uses of a mill stands on the same footing as an appropriation for the use of the mines. Each of these purposes, indeed, may be equally useful, or even necessary to the miners themselves. But the nature of the use may be important, as denoting the extent of the water appropriated. Water taken for a mill is not taken as an article of merchandise, to be sold in the market; it is merely used as a motive power, and after it passes the mill and subserves its purposes, may be used as an aid to the working of the mines. But this last use must not be inconsistent with the prior right acquired by the mill owner, so far as his necessary use is concerned. This right of water may be transferred like other property. If, by the erection of a mill and the possessory right of land on the stream, the water be acquired — this being evidence of the appropriation of the water — we do not see that the right would not pass by any sufficient transfer of the possession of the property to the vendee, as owner; in fact, we do not doubt that it would. And this brings us to consider what we deem the essential matter of this case, whether the plaintiff and Blackburn got the title of Van Court, the first appropriator of the water, to this mill. We assume for proven all the disputed or disputable facts upon which the jury have passed, directly or in effect, by their verdict. The question of the possession of the premises, the mill, etc. by McDonald, by virtue of some contract with Van Court, is not disputed; but it is argued, that this contract gives him no title to this water, diverted and used, and sold by the Bear River Company. The grounds of this objection we will now consider: It is said that, conceding that title was originally in Van Court, it did not pass to the plaintiff, McDonald, because the paper executed by Alexander Van Court to McDonald was not legally executed so as to pass the title. The power of attorney from B. J. Van Court to Alexander seems to be regular in form, except that it is not under seal; though professing in the body of it to be sealed, the scroll is omitted. The power authorizes "Alexander to grant, bargain, sell, and convey, my saw-mill, dwelling, etc. situated in the county of Yuba. Said mills and other improvements are situated on a tract or claim of land on Bear River." * * "I do grant unto my said Attorney full power to execute and deliver all needful instruments, whether under seal or otherwise * * to perform all such matters, acts, and things, as my said Attorney shall deem necessary and expedient for the complete and effectual execution of the authority granted," etc.

Under this power Alexander Van Court made the instrument first set out, which, it has already been seen, was not under seal; so that the argument of the counsel for Appellants, that the paper executed by the Attorney was void, because the Attorney could not execute a technical deed, except under authority by deed, has no application to the facts. The power authorizes the execution of needful instruments, sealed or unsealed, and seems, from the comprehensiveness of its language, to impart the largest discretion as to the terms and form of sale to the agent. Taking the agreement, or so to call it, conveyance, in connection with the power, and we can see no fatal objection to it. It is true, that, for technical reasons, a deed of an Attorney must purport to be the deed and executed in the name of the principal. That doctrine was discussed in the argument of Dupont v. Wertheman, (10 Cal. 354) but was not passed on by the Court. But this doctrine applies more strictly to technical deeds than to parol contracts. The power is not under seal; it is only a written authority to the agent to contract in reference to the property, etc. and the contract is made by Alexander for the right of the principal in the subject, and the paper recites that "I, Alexander Van Court, being my brother's legally authorized Attorney, do sell, convey," etc. The property sold is the property of B. J. Van Court, the principal, and the agent selling represents himself as the Attorney of the principal; a consideration is stated, and an authority to sell is shown. The vendee is put in possession and retains possession for a series of years, making valuable improvements.

That such an agreement might be specifically enforced, and was a sufficient memorandum in writing to give effect to the contract, we think cannot be disputed. (See Wood's Dig. Sec. 106.)

That by force of such agreement, and the possession taken under it, the plaintiff, McDonald, acquired an equitable estate in the premises, giving him a present right to its full enjoyment, we think, clear, and this right, being united with the present

McDonald & Blackburn v. Bear River and Auburn Water and Mining Company.

---

possession, enabled him to maintain any action for an interruption of the possession or any injury to the property.

The case of New England Marine Insurance Company v. De Wolf, illustrates the distinction between sealed and unsealed instruments, and shows that the rule requiring the instrument to be executed or signed, in the name of the principal, does not apply to instruments not under seal, and the same distinction is expressly stated in Andrews v. Estes et als. (2 Fairf. 267). The cases in all the States, in regard to instruments not under seal, agree that if the name of the principal appear in the instrument, and the intention, on the whole, be apparently to bind him, he will be the party bound, if the agent had authority, although the instrument be signed in the agent's name only. (See Farmers and Mechanics Bank v. Troy City Bank, 1 Doug. 458, 467.) "In an agreement not under seal," said the Chancellor, in the late case of Townsend v. Hubbard, (4 Hill's N. Y. 351, 357; and see Townsend v. Corning, 23 Wend. 436, 440,) "executed by an agent or Attorney on behalf of his principal, and where the agent or Attorney is duly authorized to make the agreement it is sufficient as a general rule, if it appears in any part of the instrument that the understanding of the parties was that the principal, and not the agent or Attorney, was the person to be bound for the fulfillment of the contract." (See, also, Evans v. Wells, 22 Wend. 325, 335, 340.) In South Carolina, in some earlier cases, this was not admitted, and it has been decided that a note in the form, "I promise to pay," etc. signed "J. L. R. for J. J." bound the agent personally, and did not bind the principal. (Fash v. Ross, 2 Hill's South Car. 294; Taylor v. McLean, 1 McMullan, 352; Moore v. Cooper, 1 Spears, 87.) But all these are overruled in Robertson v. Pope, (1 Richardson, 501); and the distinction recognized between deeds and parol contracts, that in the former the sealing and delivery must be in the name of the principal; but in the latter it is enough if it appear that the contract was intended to be made for the principal.

5. There is no foundation for the notion that this power of attorney did not embrace the water privilege. The mill sold, or proposed to be sold, would be wholly valueless without it, and the general language is: "including the mill, dwelling," etc. "said mill and other improvements are situated," etc. The deed to a house is held to include the land on which it is, and it would be absurd to hold that a deed to a mill, only of use because of the water which moves it, does not include the right to the water, especially when the phrase et cetera, to which Lord Coke attaches such extension of meaning, is used.

McDonald & Blackburn v. Bear River and Auburn Water and Mining Company.

---

6. We have, in these remarks, assumed that these papers were as they are set out in the Appellant's brief. But we do not, after looking over the transcript, find them set out. On page twenty-one we find that some papers of this general character were offered by plaintiff and objected to generally by defendant. But the grounds of objection are not given, and the papers not even particularly described. And it seems that "a bill of sale of a portion of mills and property given by A. Van Court to John C. Blackburn" was given in evidence by plaintiff; and this seems to have been done without objection. The presumption is, that what is done by a Court of general jurisdiction is properly done, and it rests with the losing party to show affirmatively that there was error.

7. It seems that Blackburn was in possession with McDonald, and it might be inferred that he was interested with him in this mill company and the right to the water. The saw-mill was put up January 8, 1850; the grist-mill was commenced in 1853, and was put in operation in the fall of 1854, built on the same side of the stream as the saw-mill. It seems that the mill, before the ditch of defendants, required and used one thousand inches of water. The instruction of the Court limited the plaintiff's claim to the amount of water first taken for the mill.

The appellants contend that they took, by the location of their ditch, all the water not needed for the saw-mill; and that their right, by appropriation, was perfect to all, subject only to the right of the mill-owner; that the right of the mill-owner was limited to a use of this water for this particular purpose, and ceased immediately when the saw-mill, from want of timber in the neighborhood, or otherwise, ceased its operations as such; and that the plaintiffs, having subsequently built a grist-mill, are not entitled to the water for that mill. Probably it would be enough to say in answer to the ingenious argument on this subject, that the point seems to be taken here for the first time; it is not taken in the answer, nor was it made on the trial. No instruction on the subject was asked by the counsel; nor was it made a point on the motion for a new trial. The point rests on particular facts or inferences, which, the jury, if properly instructed, might or might not draw from the evidence—such as the extent of the defendants' appropriation, or of the plaintiffs', as evidenced by the acts of both—the declarations, the relative quantity of water needed for the grist-mill or the saw-mill, the quantity of timber, etc. etc. and many other considerations, which a Court of Appeals could scarcely be called upon for the first time to determine. But even if we felt disposed to permit this matter to be asserted here for the first time, we are far from being convinced that the point is well taken. It by no means follows that, because in an agricultural district, a party takes up a mill-seat, gets a good title—as we esteem possession of public land to be—to the land, and makes valuable permanent improvements, all dependent on the use of the water as a motive power—that he means only to use the water appropriated for the first purpose to which he applies it. At any rate a very clear case should be made that that purpose had been fully answered before his title to the water should be held to be abandoned. The mere fact that he chooses to apply the water which he had a right to use, in whole or in part, if he so chose, in sawing timber, to grinding wheat, is no abandonment of his title to it. But the question is not so made on this record as to require from us a decision upon this last point.

McDonald & Blackburn v. Bear River and Auburn Water and Mining Company.

---

8th. The plaintiffs claim that they were in possession of this property and these mills in 1854; that at the time, and since, they were entitled to this water to work their mills; that this quantity was not permitted, at the time laid in the complaint, to flow to their mills, but was diverted by the ditch; and for this they claim damages. Possibly it was enough for the plaintiffs to show the simple fact that they were in the use of this water, as against every one claiming by subsequent right, without calling to their aid any antecedent title to their entry, for the location by defendants of their ditch in 1851, supposing that to be an appropriation of waters of Bear River from that time, was only an appropriation of so much as was not before appropriated by Van Court, and no abandonment is shown by him; but on the contrary, it is shown by plaintiffs' proof that McDonald and

McDonald & Blackburn v. Bear River and Auburn Water and Mining Company.

---

Blackburn succeeded to the possession of Van Court. For the damages resulting after they came into possession, it would seem they could jointly maintain this action on that possession; at all events, this question of misjoinder, or want of common interest in the subject of the suit, should, if it appeared by the plaintiffs' evidence, have been taken by motion for nonsuit, or upon instructions. The plaintiffs, if the point had been made, might have dismissed the suit as to Blackburn, but if permitted to wait until after a new trial is denied, without making the point, it would throw upon us the trouble of searching every transcript to see if ingenious counsel here were right in the suggestion of points which ought to have been, but were not, made below. This would give a great advantage to the Appellants, for a statement is usually made up with reference to the points actually made below, and there would often be advantages taken in the statement, or effect given to it wholly different from what was foreseen or expected. Besides the unsatisfactory nature of such an inquiry, our labors would be interminable if we were compelled to search every record for the purpose of seeing if some new point resting on the evidence, but never taken by counsel below, was well founded in law or fact.

These observations apply to the question on the Statute of Limitations, insisted upon as a defense. No instruction was asked. Nor do we see how it could be. The injury was not from the location of the defendants' ditch. That was a subsequent appropriation secondary and subordinate in right to the plaintiffs as it was claimed. The diversion complained of was since the period barring the claim for damages; and the statute could not operate merely from the fact that the defendant had made a claim; it must have been shown that he made an exclusive claim with possession.

The instruction given by the Court, at its own instance, fairly placed the law before the jury on the main question in the case. It is in this language: "If the jury should find from the evidence, that the plaintiffs were the first to acquire a right to the use of the water flowing in Bear River, and that the defendants subsequently diverted the waters of the stream to the extent of depriving the plaintiffs of the same quantity of water which they originally possessed as prior locators, then they should find for the plaintiff — but if the water which the defendants took by means of their ditch, or other means, did not diminish the quantity of water, then no injury resulted to plaintiffs, and they should find for the defendants. The principle is, as decided by our Courts, that he who is first in time is first in right. The jury should take into consideration the quantity of water which was necessary for the plaintiffs in running their mill, for if there was an excess of water for this purpose, any other locator or proprietor is entitled to have it."

9th. The three instructions refused were, as proposed, manifestly erroneous upon their face, and were properly denied.

10th. There is no error in admitting proof of Dwyer's signature to the paper; no grounds for excluding it were assigned, nor does it even appear that the paper was admitted or read. It might have been proper to locate and explain the premises.

11th. The objection to the refusal to admit the question, "Do you know of any other ditches taken out of this stream, or do you know whether the waters are taken out above the mill by any other company, for any other purpose?" does not give us such information in reference to the subject as to enable us to decide whether the question was admissible. This might well have been refused on several grounds. It is not material whether there was at the time of the trial any other diversion of water from this dam; nor is it apparent that there was error in refusing a question so broad as to admit proof of water taken so far above the mill as to be beyond the ditch of defendant. It must be affirmatively shown that there was error in the ruling of the Court, before, on an incidental point like this, we can reverse on account of it.

We have given the case all the consideration we could extend to it, consistently with other engagements, and we think the judgment should be affirmed.

STAFFORD v. LICK et al.

A power of attorney to sell land must contain some description of the property to be sold, unless it be shown otherwise that the land in controversy is the only land owned by the principal at the time.

APPEAL from the Twelfth District.

Ejectment for a lot in San Francisco. Defendants aver title in themselves. (See same case in 7 Cal. 479; 10 Id. 12.)

The instrument of title relied on by defendants is in the following words:

TRANSLATION.

"By this present I give ample and sufficient power to Don José de Jesus Noe to use or dispose of my lot, which I hold (or have) granted, as may best seem to him; and, in testimony, I give the present power in the place of Yerba Buena, the 6th day of October, 1846.

MAXIMO Y. FERNANDEZ."

On the trial defendants offered this instrument in evidence, in connection with testimony, that in 1846 sales of land in California were, by custom, sometimes verbal, sometimes by simple writing signed by the vendor, and sometimes, where the value of the property was great, by a writing before the Judge and witnesses. They also offered to show, in this connection, that the Spanish words in the instrument imported a transfer or conveyance to Noe in full property; a consideration paid by Noe to Fernandez, and an actual transfer and possession of the lot accompanying the execution and delivery of the instrument.

Plaintiff objected to all this evidence on the ground that it was incompetent to prove a sale or contract for the sale of lands. The Court sustained the objection and excluded the evidence, defendants excepting. Defendants then offered to prove a verbal sale of the lot from Fernandez to Noe, consummated by transfer of possession and payment of a consideration, offering the writing as a memorandum of said sale. On plaintiffs' objection the evidence was ruled out, defendants excepting.

Defendants offered, with all this evidence, to connect themselves with Noe by conveyances, and also to show in themselves or grantors a notorious and continued possession, with claim of title since October, 1846. The Court ruled out the evidence, defendants excepting.

Stafford v. Lick et al.

---

Defendants also offered said instrument as evidence of a license to occupy the land, under which Noe and those holding under him were entitled to a notice to quit before action brought. Same objection. Same ruling.

The jury found for plaintiffs, and defendants appealed from: the order overruling the motion for new trial, and from the judgment entered for plaintiff on the verdict.

Whitcomb, Pringle & Felton, for Appellants, argued: that the defendants derive good title by means of the power given in the instrument by Fernandez to Noe, and the execution of the power by the deeds of Noe; and that, within the rule of the civil law, the execution by an agent, though made in his own name, is binding upon his principal, if actually within the authority given to him. (Rice v. Gore, 22 Pick. 158; New Eng. M. Ins. Co. v. De Wolf, 8 Pick. 56; Story on Agency, Sec. 152; Hopkins v. Lacouture, 4 La. 64; Pothier on Obl. Nos. 82, 449; 1 Id. Sec. 449; 4 Id. Sec. 88, 252.)

It may be objected that the power of attorney under which a sale takes place should contain the same description of the lands as the former decision in this case requires for the conveyance. But even in the common law a parol authority to make a written contract is valid. (Shaw v. Nudd, 8 Pick. 12.) And that although the contract be required to be in writing by the statute of frauds. The same rule holds good in the civil law. (See Story on Agency, 49, and Note.) And in 4 La. the power seems to have been a verbal one.

This instrument was offered as a license to occupy, which required of Fernandez or his assigns, at least a notice to quit. (And we think that the dicta in Salmon v. Hoffman, (2 Cal. 142,) and the late decision of Ortman et al. v. Dixon, ante, 33, sustain the defendants' right of possession. Salmon v. Hoffman recognizes the obligation of the deed by the Attorney, as entitling the party to a further conveyance from the principal and admits in the defendants such "an equitable title accompanied by possession" as "is sufficient under our system to give a right of possession."

Forbes et al. v. Scannell,

---

No brief on file for Respondent.

TERRY, C. J. delivered the opinion of the Court—BALDWIN, J. concurring.

This cause is before us for the third time, upon evidence not materially different from that contained in the record upon which it was before decided.

The Appellants now contend that the paper which they before called a sufficient deed or conveyance to vest in Noe the title to the property, is a power of attorney authorizing Noe to sell the lot as the agent of Fernandez.

We think the paper is worthless for any purpose. A power of attorney, in order to authorize the sale of real property, must contain some description of the property to be sold. The paper in question, if we admit it to contain a power to sell, designates no property whatever. "By this present, I give ample and sufficient power to Don José de Jesus Noe to use or dispose of my lot." What lot? Where situated? The paper would answer as well for a lot in San José, Monterey, or Los Angeles, as in Yerba Buena. It is not shown that the premises in controversy is the only lot which was owned by Fernandez at the time, and we are not to presume, in the absence of proof, that such was the case.

Judgment affirmed.

FORBES et al. v. SCANNELL.

PERSONAL property beyond the limits of this State, assigned in trust to pay the creditors of the assignor, the assignor and assignee both residing, and being at the time, in the foreign jurisdiction where the property was, and possession being taken by the latter, vests in the assignee according to the lex loci; and his title will be maintained here against execution creditors of the assignor.

Such an assignment is not void as contravening the 89th Section of our Insolvent Act.

Rights of property acquired by contract, valid in the place where made, will be protected here.

Doubtful, whether the inference of title from the possession here of personal property, acquired by contract in a foreign country, can be rebutted by the legal presumption, in the absence of proof on the point, that the contract was made subject to the provisions of a statute of the forum.

Under the treaty between the United States and China, of July 3d, 1844, and the act of Congress carrying it into effect, the United States Commissioner and Consuls constitute a judiciary for the government of the citizens of the United States in China, and are governed by the law of nations, the laws of the United States, the common law, and the "decrees and regulations"

- of the Commissioner, until modified or annulled by Congress. And such a judicial system is constitutional.
- Assignments of personal property in China, made there between citizens of the United States resident there, will be tested by the common law.
- People v. Gerke*, (5 Cal. 281;) Siemssen v. Boker, (6 Id. 250,) commented on.
- An alien friend may sue an American in the Consular Courts in China, established under the treaty of 1844. And the assignees of personal property assigned there in trust for foreign creditors, among others, may be compelled by such Courts to execute the trust.
- The right of Englishmen and Americans to sue each other in foreign countries where, by treaty, the laws of England and America, respectively, are the rule of decision, discussed and affirmed.
- What is meant by the common law as used in the Act of Congress carrying out the treaty with China, stated.
- The decision of the Consul, as to the validity of the assignment, is not conclusive in the Courts of this State.
- An assignment of personal property in trust for creditors, need not be delivered, as a deed. The making of the trust and its acceptance, are sufficient, especially if accompanied or followed by the possession of the property.
- In such assignments where no conditions are imposed on creditors, an acceptance by them is presumed.
- Where an assignment embraces the property of the firm and of one member of the firm, in trust to pay his debts and the debts of the firm, it must be construed so as to give individual property to individual creditors, and firm property to firm creditors.
- An assignment in trust for the benefit of each and all the creditors of a firm, is sufficiently specific. Such trust, under the law, imposes well defined duties, such as to convert the property into money and pay over the proceeds, etc.
- After the assignee of property in trust for creditors takes possession, the title and trust become fixed and executed, and the assignment is not revocable.
- An assignment in trust for creditors to two firms jointly, by the firm names simply, is good, and the acceptance of the trust by one of the Trustees is sufficient.
- The want of a schedule of the property in such case, though sometimes regarded as a circumstance of fraud, will not of itself avoid the assignment.
- One partner of a firm, expressly, or by implication, sole manager, his copartners being absent at a great distance, may assign the firm property in trust for the benefit of creditors, if the assignment be necessary for their protection.
- That the Trustees employ the partner assigning, to aid them in winding up the concern, and pay him, and allow his wife some furniture, etc. is not proof of fraud in the assignment, there being no evidence that these benefits were promised at the time of the assignment.

APPEAL from the Fourth District.

The main facts are stated in the opinion of the Court, but it is deemed best to insert those findings of the Court below, not stated:

1. That on the 8th or 10th day of March, A. D. 1856, the commercial house of Nye Brothers & Co. then and before that time doing business in Canton, China, had returned to them by the European Mail which arrived at Canton on one of those days, protested bills to the amount of thirty thousand pounds, (£30,000,) drawn by the said house at Canton upon Frederick Huth & Company, Bankers, at London, G. B. and now the contesting creditors in this case.

2. That said assignment was executed by the said Gideon Nye,

---

Forbes et al. v. Scannell.

---

before the American Consul, at the American Consulate, at Canton, on the day it bears date, and delivered to the assignees.

3. That the James Russell & Co. mentioned in said assignment, constituted, on the 11th of March, 1856, an American commercial house of long standing, good character, and at the date of the assignment, and long before, of unquestionable solvency. Said house being composed of Paul S. Forbes, Robert S. Sturges, Edward Cunningham, David N. Spooner, George Griswold Gray, Charles N. Spooner, and Frederick Reiche, and that James Purdon & Company, mentioned in said assignment, also constituted, on the 11th day of March, A. D. 1856, an American commercial house, established at Canton, of good standing, and at the time of, and long before, the assignment, of unquestionable solvency, composed of the said James Purdon and his brother, John C. Purdon, and that said parties, composing said firms, are the plaintiffs in this case.

4. That said assignees are competent and suitable persons to take charge of said assigned property.

5. That at the time of the said assignment, the house of Nye Brothers & Co. was composed of the said Gideon Nye, Jr. the sole managing partner, residing at Canton, China; of Clement D. Nye, residing at Shanghai, China; and of Charles Keating Tuckerman, a salaried partner, not participating in the profits or losses of the partnership.

6. That said Tuckerman also resided at Canton, but at the date of said assignment was on a voyage from Canton to Calcutta, via Manila and Singapore, having left Canton on said voyage in the month of January preceding.

7. That at the date of said assignment the said Charles D. Nye was at Shanghai, between which place and Canton it required ten or fifteen days to make the trip.

8. That the English steamer bringing the European mails with the protested bills, as aforesaid, at Canton, on the 8th or 10th of March, A. D. 1856, left Canton on the 12th with the return correspondence; and that the said Gideon Nye, Jr. between the time of the arrival and the departure of the said mail to and from Canton, had no opportunity of consulting with the said Clement D. Nye, or the said Tuckerman, respecting the propriety of said assignment.

---

Forbes et al. v. Scannell.

---

9. That before the return of said protested bills the house of Nye Brothers & Co. had good credit in China and abroad, and that the return of said bills was the immediate emergency for making said assignment; and that said emergency did, in fact, exist at the time of making of the assignment.

10. That the assignees, at the date of the assignment, resided in China, except Paul S. Forbes, who resided in Boston; and all the assignees were in Canton at the date of the assignment, except Edward Cunningham and Geo. G. Gray, who were at Shanghai, where they resided, and Charles N. Spooner, who was at Chow-Fow, where he resided, about midway between Canton and Shanghai.

11. That the assignees accepted the assignment, took possession of the property, real and personal, of Nye Brothers & Co. under the assignment, made sales of some of the said property, took the general management of the former business of Nye Brothers & Co. relating to consignments on hand and due, issued circulars to the creditors and correspondents of said house, made statements to said creditors concerning the liabilities and assets of said firm, employed the said Gideon Nye, Jr. and others, to assist in the administration of the assignment, and made the said Nye a reasonable allowance for his services.

12. That schedules of the debts and assets of the said Nye Brothers & Co. were made out by said Gideon Nye, in pursuance of the reservation in said assignment of the 11th of March, and delivered to the assignees a short time after the execution and delivery of said assignment of the 11th of March.

13. That prior to said assignment, the said Nye Brothers & Co. had an established credit upon the house of Frederick Huth & Company, to the amount of about thirty thousand pounds sterling, and that since the assignment the said Gideon Nye and some of the creditors of Nye Brothers & Co. contend that the terms of that credit were violated by Frederick Huth & Co. by their protest of said bills.

14. That the said assignment was executed in good faith by the said Gideon Nye in behalf of Nye Brothers & Co. for the benefit of all their creditors, and the same is free from any fraud in fact on the part of the said Nye Brothers & Co. or on the part of the said Gideon Nye, or on the part of the said assignees, in the acceptance and administration of the same, and that the co-partners of said Gideon Nye did not and have not dissented or objected to said assignment.

---

---

15. That the teas in question constituted a part of the assets of the firm of Nye Brothers & Co. at the time of the assignment, and were actually delivered to said assignees subsequent thereto, who took possession of the same and shipped them to San Francisco for a market, consigned to Morgan, Hathaway & Co. for sale on their account in the regular course of their administration under the assignment, with instructions to remit the proceeds thereof to them, the said assignees.

16. The said teas being the product of China, where the assignment was executed and accepted, it was a proper act on the part of the assignees to ship them to San Francisco for a market — under the expectation of securing a higher cash price — and an immediate return of the proceeds to them — and that said transaction on the part of the assignees was and is entirely free from fraud.

17. That the suit upon which the execution was issued in this case by Frederick Huth & Co. against Nye Brothers & Co. was instituted on the 15th of February, 1856, by attachment.

18. That there were several meetings of the Chinese creditors of Nye Brothers & Co. representing about two-thirds of the entire indebtedness of the house, soon after the assignment, before the American Consul in Canton, at which the assignees attended, and that said creditors assented to said assignment and co-operated with the assignees in carrying it out, etc.

19. That at said meeting the said creditors made a reasonable allowance of furniture to Mrs. Gideon Nye, for the use of the family, to which the assignees assented, and that in assenting thereto, the assignees were not guilty of fraud.

20. That the entire foreign population residing in Canton at the date of the assignment, including Missionaries, did not exceed three hundred, and that among this foreign population, there were not more than thirty or forty American residents.

21. That this population resided together at the place called the Foreign Factories, a place of limited extent, and devoted to the transaction of foreign business.

22. That there were no Americans residing in Canton at the date of the assignment, except those connected with the commercial houses, and no suitable person residing at the Factories to act as assignee for Nye Brothers & Co. except those connected with a commercial house.

23. That it is customary for the foreign residents in Canton to execute legal documents and transact legal business at their respective consulates.

24. That the foreign residents of Canton, within the isolated place called the Factories, outside the wall of Canton, have no access to the Chinese Courts for the purpose of litigation, as established by the laws peculiar to that empire.

25. That the first mentioned assignment has been adjudicated upon in a controversy between the American citizens by the Consular Tribunal authorized by Act of Congress, and declared valid.

26. That there is no evidence tending to show that such an assignment is contrary to the positive law of China, or the policy of that empire, or contrary to any usage or custom of the foreign commercial population resident in China.

27. That the value of said teas is fifty thousand dollars.

From the foregoing facts, conclusions of law are by the Court:

1. That the assignment of the 11th of March, 1856, is valid, and vested in the assignees the title of the teas; was acquiesced in by the copartners of Gideon Nye, Jr. and is binding upon the firm.

2. That the assignees are entitled to the teas in question, as their property, to be disposed of by them, in the execution of their trust under the assignment.

3. That the defendant, the Sheriff of the county of San Francisco, having seized and taken said teas by virtue of an execution against the property of the said Nye Brothers & Co. is liable to said assignees in this action for the value thereof, and that judgment be entered accordingly.

4. And that the plaintiffs recover of the defendant, as Sheriff, the sum of fifty thousand dollars, the value of the teas at the date of the seizure.

Forbes et al. v. Scannell.

The only question is, whether these teas were, by the effect of the assignment, so vested in the plaintiffs as to deprive the judgment creditors of Nye Brothers & Co. of the right to seize them on execution.

The claim would not be maintained on such an instrument if executed in this State. The 39th Section of the Act for the relief of insolvent debtors and protection of creditors, (Wood's Dig. 501,) provides that, "No assignment of any insolvent debtor, otherwise than is provided in this Act, shall be legal or binding upon creditors." (Adams v. Woods & Haskell, in the matter of Lynch, Intervenor, 8 Cal. 152; Cheever v. Hays, 3 Id. 471; Cohen et al. v. Barrett et al. 5 Id. 210.)

The first question is whether this is a case for the application of the rule of international comity.

In the Bank of Augusta v. Earl, (13 Peters, 519-589,) the Supreme Court of the United States, by C. J. Taney, lays down the rule, but always with the restriction that the foreign law be not repugnant to the law or policy, or prejudicial to the interests of the country where its application is sought to be enforced. (See Zipcey v. Thompson, 1 Gray, 248; Brown v. Knox, 6 Mo. 306, 307; Ingraham v. Geyer, 13 Mass. 147; Varnum v. Camp, 1 Green, N. J. 326; Brown v. Knox, 6 Mo. 302.)

It may be contended that this repugnancy of the law of California to voluntary assignments for the benefit of creditors, is to be considered as confined to those made within the territory of the State. Of course, it can deny effect to foreign assignments only so far as they conflict with the rights of creditors to property within this State. The statute is general with respect to all creditors and all assignments, except such as our insolvent law permits, and the policy of the law, is as much offended by such assignments made elsewhere, as by those made here, when the former are set up in our Courts against the rights of creditors. For this question, it is not material that the property was transferred to the assignees before it came here. It is the title they assert to it, which our law proscribes, refuses to recognize, in opposition to the claims of creditors. If the rule of comity were to be admitted, the foreign assignee could as well claim property situated here, as to maintain his title to that brought by him into the State. The only question would be the priority of the assignment. (Story, Conflict of Laws, Sec. 398, quoting Lord Kenyon in Hunter v. Potts, 4 Term R. 182, 192; 2 Kent, 496; Story, Conflict of Laws, Sec. 415, and cases cited.)

But if the Court should be unable to come to this conclusion, the question then arises, What was the law of the place where the assignment was made? The burden of proof of it was on the Respondents, who set it up, and assert their claim under it. In the absence of proof of any other law applicable to the case, the Court must apply the law of the forum at the time the seizure was made. (Leavenworth v. Brockway, 2 Hill, N. Y. 202, 203, and the cases cited in the notes; Harris v. Allnut, 12 Lou. 465; Allen v. Watson, 2 Hill, S. C. 319, 322; Ingraham v. Geyer, 13 Mass. 147.)

The Respondents seem to acknowledge this, for they endeavor to establish the lex loci. They appeal to the treaty with China, of July 3d, 1844, negotiated by Mr. Cushing, Commissioner for the United States, (8 Statutes at Large, 592,) and to the Act of Congress passed on the 11th of August, 1848, for the purpose of carrying into effect the provisions of the treaty. (9 Statutes at Large, 275.)

From this Act it appears that, in all cases, civil and criminal, even in capital cases, the Consul determines both fact and law without the intervention of a jury, and in some cases without appeal. In cases of a certain magnitude he is to be assisted by two or three Assessors, of his own selection, but even then he decides the case, and their dissent only gives the right of appeal to the Commissioner, who decides, finally and alone, both fact and law.

It thus appears that this Act of Congress, for carrying into effect the treaty, requires a great deal of legislation on the part of the Commissioner before it can go into effect.

If we assume, for the moment, that Congress had the power, under the Constitution, to determine the legal relations, and legislate upon the rights of property and person of Americans in China, a power not admitted now, even in our own territories, and inquire what is the law of American citizens in China, under this Act, we shall be not a little puzzled to determine it. Recurring to the fourth section, which makes the common law supply the deficiency of the statute law of the United States, the question arises, What common law?

---

---

In Wheaton v. Peters, (8 Pet. 591, 658,) the Supreme Court say: "It is clear there can be no common law of the United States. The Federal Government is composed of twenty-four sovereign and independent States, each of which may have its local usages, customs, and common law. There is no principle that pervades the Union, and has the authority of law, that is not embodied in the Constitution or laws of the Union. The common law could be made part of our federal system only by legislative adoption.

When, therefore, a common law right is asserted, we must look to the State in which the controversy originated." (See, also, Vol. 7, Opinions of Attorney-General, 504, Ex. Docs. 33d Cong. 1st Sess. No. 123, Vol. 16, 325.)

[Counsel here quote at length from Mr. Cushing's opinion as to what common law is meant by the Act of Congress, and as to the "decrees and regulations" which the Act authorizes the Commissioner in China to make to supply the defects in the common law, and the laws of the United States. For these decrees, etc. see briefs on file.]

Thus we see that in the judgment of the author of the treaty, the regulations of the Commissioner are necessary to determine what the common law is on all those questions in which the States and their Courts differ from one another.

The jurisdiction is limited by the 25th Article of the treaty, to controversies between American citizens.

No amendments to the Act of Congress, no regulations to define the rights of parties, or the relative jurisdiction of the Commissioner and Consuls, appear to have been made. A curious inquiry here presents itself, how far the Act of Congress is binding upon the creditors, not of other nations only, but even of our own.

It is direct legislation by Congress upon the rights of property and persons of American citizens by a power derived from China. It is a delegation, moreover, of legislative power to an executive officer, holding his place at the will of the President, and a union in his hands of powers executive, legislative, and judicial. It subjects American citizens, in their persons and property, to laws which they have no voice in making; it holds them to answer for capital or infamous crimes, without the presentment or indictment of a grand jury, and to liability to be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law, and without trial by jury. (Arts. 5-7, Amendments to Constitution of United States.)

---

---

The reasoning of the Supreme Court of the United States in the Dred Scott Case, (19 Howard, 449) disclaims this power in the General Government over American citizens, not merely in the States and Territories, but wherever they may be found.

This absolute power cannot be maintained under the clause which makes treaties the supreme law of the land, because no foreign power, by treaty, can give to our government more power over American citizens than the Constitution allows it to receive, hold, and exercise. In the case of New Orleans v. The United States, (10 Pet. 736,) it is held that the federal powers cannot be enlarged by treaty.

The Act of Congress of August 11th, 1848, could have no effect upon the relations of debtor and creditor existing between Nye & Co. and other American citizens, much less upon their relations with strangers; it can afford no rule for determining their rights of property.

But this is the only attempt the Respondents have made to establish the lex loci. This Court, then, must apply the law of the forum which sanctioned this seizure at the time it was made, and held null and void the title set up by the plaintiffs, because there is no other rule applicable to the case.

The decision of the Consul at Canton upon the validity of the assignment, can have no weight as evidence of the law of the place, because he was without jurisdiction even under the law itself, unaided by the "legislation" of the Commissioner, as Mr. Cushing says, and because the Act under which he made the decision, and the powers given to him by the Act, are unconstitutional and void, as to citizens, and without authority as to all others.

We say, then: 1st. That the well ascertained policy of this State denies all effect to such assignments, as against creditors, without regard to the place where the assignment was made, or to the citizenship of the creditors; and, 2d. That if it were a case for the exercise of international comity, the law of the place of contract has not been proved by the plaintiffs, and no other rule than the law of this State is applicable to the case.

---

Forbes et al. v. Scannell.

---

But the Respondents contend that if the foreign law is not provided, the Court should administer, not the statute law, but merely the common law of this State; and they rely upon the case of Wright v. Delafield, (23 Barb. 513) in which it is held that when the common law is known, proved, or assumed to prevail in another State, it will be administered by the New York Court, independently of New York statutes.

But this assumption of the existence of the common law in a State is equivalent to proof, pro tanto, of what its law is; and, in the absence of proof of a modification of it, by a statute of that State, the Court administers the common law as the ascertained law of the place of contract. The reasoning in Wright v. Delafield has no application to cases in which Courts refuse to take judicial cognizance of what the foreign law is.

In most of the cases in which the law of the forum has been applied to a foreign contract, it was statute law, and the principle is invariable and inevitable, that, in the absence of proof of what the foreign law is, the law of the forum, in its unity and entirety, is to be administered as the only rule left to the Court. The case of Wright v. Delafield did not turn upon that question, for it is admitted, (pp. 516, 517) that the application of the statute law of the forum did not change the result.

Indeed that case is but a confirmation of the rule we seek to apply. It supposes such a knowledge of the law of sister States as dispenses with the application of the rule of the forum. It is at variance with the rule that courts cannot take judicial cognizance of the laws of other sovereignties, so far only as certain sister States are concerned, but not as to other countries, governed by entirely different systems of law. (Story, Conf. of Laws, Sec. 637, and the cases cited in the notes; Leavenworth v. Brockway, 2 Hill, N. Y. 202, and the cases cited in the notes; Brown v. Gray, 16 Eng. C. L. 426; Ingraham v. Geyer, 13 Mass. 147; Mason v. Wash, Breese, Ill. 16; Allen v. Watson, 2 Hill, S. C. 319-322; Bonneau v. Poydras, 2 Robinson, La. 1-13; Harris v. Allnutt, 12 La. 465; Crozier v. Hodge, 3 La. 357.)

In the brief made by Mr. Duer, when this case was first before

---

---

this Court, there is an objection to this assignment, which we give in his language:

"Every assignment to Trustees, for the benefit of creditors, tends to hinder the delay even the creditors provided for, in the collection of their debts. They have been upheld, however, where otherwise unobjectionable, on the ground that, though the creditor was hindered in his legal remedy, yet another, through the medium of a Court of Equity, was afforded him. If this latter remedy be wanting, the creditor is hindered and delayed, and, indeed, utterly defeated in the collection of his debt. (5 Mass. 154; 6 Id. 342.) In this case any such relief as that of a bill in equity, to compel the Trustees to discharge their trust, or to remove them for misconduct, is wanting. The assignors have, among their creditors, citizens and residents of China, citizens and residents of the United States, citizens and residents of Great Britain, and also citizens of the United States and Great Britain, residing in China. To a bill filed by a creditor to compel the execution of a trust, all the creditors should be made parties, or it must be filed in his behalf, and that of all others. (4 Paige, 23; 23 Pick. 508; Burrill, 537.) Now what tribunal is there that could take jurisdiction of such an action? Where could Messrs. Huth & Co. go for relief? Not to the Courts in China, for American residents in China, being parties, the treaty divests the Chinese Courts of jurisdiction; not to the American Commissioner, or Consul, for the controversy would not be between American residents merely, though they would be necessarily parties; not to the public officers of the United States and China, acting in conjunction under the 24th Article of the treaty, for that applies to controversies between Chinese and American residents of China; and British subjects, in such action, would be the plaintiffs. In short, there is no tribunal competent to enforce the trust; and if the creditors of Nye Brothers & Co. cannot seize the property of their debtors, where they can find it, they are wholly without relief, legal or equitable; and the insolvent firm, and their assignees, may keep the assets forever."

We call the attention of the Court to the objections under the common law, apparent upon the face of the assignment; 1st. It is not a deed nor a declaration of Gideon Nye, Jr. much less of the firm of Nye Brothers & Co. It is the language of the United States Consul, Perry, not of Nye, that is used in it. 2d. It is the act of Gideon Nye, Jr. and not of Nye Brothers & Co. 3d. There is nothing in it, or in the attestation of it, showing that it was delivered or was made to be delivered to the assignees. 4th. This memorandum, in the hands of the Consul, unaccompanied by schedules, operated no conveyance of realty or personalty. 5th. The failure to convey the realty, left all that part of the property of the assignor in his hands. It is not an application of the whole of the assignor's property to the payment of his debts. Moreover, one partner has no power to convey the realty of the other partners. 6th. It is made by one of three partners, without the knowledge, assent, or co-operation, of the other partners. (15 How. Pr. R. 268; Haggerty et al. v. Granger, Id. 243; Patten et al. v. Wright et al. Id. 481-488; 17 Vt. 393, Opinions of Wright and Redfield.) 7th. It places the individual creditors of Gideon Nye upon a par with the creditors of the firm of Nye Brothers & Co. and pays them pari passu, which is a fraud upon both the individual and partnership creditors. (29 Me. 59, 60; 25 Vt. 362.) 8th. The whole purport, aim, and effect, of the instrument, if supposed capable of effect according to its intent, is to transfer property to assignees, without giving them power to sell it or direction how to apply it for the benefit of the cestuis que trust, without power to take possession, to collect the choses in action, or any express direction or authority whatever. They are to hold on to it, apparently, until compelled to give it up, and creditors are to look for a Court of Equity in China, of general jurisdiction, capable of supplying the defects of the instrument. (Grover v. Wakeman, 11 Wend. 221; Pierson v. Manning et al. 2 Gibbs, Mich. 448; Goodrich v. Downs, 6 Hill, 438; 21 Pick. 185; 7 Maryland, 380; Keep v. Sanderson, 2 Smith, Wis. 58; Hutchinson v. Lord, Id. 313; 3 Selden, 438; Murphy v. Bell, 8 How. Pr. Rep. 468, Wells' Opinion; 5 How. Pr. Rep. 444, 445; Van Nut v. Yoe et al. 1 Sandf. Ch. 7, 8-14; Averill v. Foucks, 6 Bar. S. C. R. 474, 475; Arthur v. R. R. Bank of Vicksburg, 9 Sme. & M. 433; Same point on same deed, Bodley v. Goodrich, 7 How. U. S. 277; D. Ivernois v. Leavitt, 23 Barb. 80, 81.) 9th. The assignor reserves to himself, individually, not to the firm, sufficient time to record in this Consulate a full and complete schedule of all the assets and liabilities, whether appertaining and belonging to him personally or to the said commercial house of Nye Brothers & Co. 10th. The instrument has scarcely any of the essential features of an assignment enumerated by Mr. Burrill on page 238.

---

Forbes et al. v. Scannell.

---

But this assignment can not be maintained, for the following additional reasons: Gideon Nye had no power to assign the partnership property without the concurrence of his copartners. Clement D. Nye was at Shanghai, within the same country, under the same jurisdiction, (by the act of Congress, that of the Commissioner,) at about five days distance from Canton. It does not appear that there was any danger of liens, or judgments, or any other excuse for not consulting the other partners, or at least Clement D. Nye. (Haven v. Hussey, 5 Paige, 21; Hitchcock v. St. John, 1 Hoffman, 518; Deming v. Colt and Hayes v. Heyer, 3 Sand. S. C. Rep. 290-293; Fisher v. Murray, 1 E. D. Smith's Rep. 341; Kemp v. Carnley, 3 Duer, 5; Kirby v. Ingersoll, 1 Har. Ch. Rep. 172; Same case on appeal, 1 Doug. 477; See, also, the reference to it by Justice Daly in Fisher v. Murray, 1 E. D. Smith, 345. So in Missouri, in Hughes v. Ellison, 5 Mo. 465, 456; in South Carolina, in Dickenson v. Legare, 1 Dessaussure, 540, 541.) If a partner cannot assign the partnership effects to a Trustee for the benefit of partnership creditors, with or without preferences, still less can he assign them for the benefit of his individual creditors. (Jackson v. Cornell, 1 Sand. Ch. 348; Kirby v. Schoonmaker, 3 Barb. Ch. 51; Moddevell v. Keever, 8 Watts & S. 64, 65; Murrell v. Neill, 8 How. U. S. 421, 426, 427; Robb v. Stevens et al. 1 Clarke Ch. 191-195; Deveau v. Fowler, 2 Paige, 400, 402.) The trust created in this assignment is "for the benefit of each and all the creditors of the said Gideon Nye, Jr. and the said commercial house of Nye Brothers & Co." It is difficult to understand this in such a manner as to authorize any discrimination between individual and partnership creditors. If it requires a distribution pro rata among the creditors of one class, it does so equally among those of the other, without distinction of classes or of funds.

There are numerous other objections to the assignment in this case. 1. There is the want of schedules. This has been held evidence of fraud. (Pierpont v. Graham, 4 Wash. 232-237. So

---

Forbes et al. v. Scannell.

---

Stevens v. Bell, 6 Mass. 339-344; Will v. Franklin, 1 Binn. 523; Burd v. Smith, 4 Dall. 76; Drakely v. Deforest, 3 Conn. 272.) Possession did not accompany the transfer; and it is not shown that either assignment or schedules were ever delivered to the assignees. The fact that the debtor was employed as agent of the assignees, with a salary, does not constitute a constructive change of possession, when there was no actual change. (Camp v. Camp, 2 Hill, 628; Hantford v. Artcher, 4 Hill, 271, 297; Edwards on Receivers, 280 et seq. Edit. 1846; p. 408, Edit. 1857; and the opinion cited by him in Hart v. Acker, Scholefield v. Hill, and Butler v. Stoddart; Burrill, Chap. 25, p. 285.) The whole transaction was merely colorable, and to enable Nye to put the property where the creditors could not reach it by the ordinary process of the law. (McAllister v. Marshall, 6 Binney, 344, etc.; Cook v. Smith, 3 Sandf. Ch. 336; Connal v. Sedgwick et al. 1 Barb. 212; Caldwell v. Rowe et al. 1 Smith, 195; Same case, 1 Carter, Ind. 405; Findley v. Day, 2 Sandf. S. C. 595; Price v. Rickart, 21 Barb. 475, etc.; 1 Sandf. Ch. 252; Id. 7-14, before cited.) 2. The assignment is deficient in not declaring what is to be done by the assignees with the property assigned. The simple expression, "in trust, and for the benefit of each and all the creditors of the said Gideon Nye, Jr. and the said commercial house of Nye Brothers & Co." is all that indicates the objects and purposes and mode of execution of the trust. An authorization to sell on credit makes the assignment void. (Barry v. Griffin, 2 Com. 371.) A right to sell in such convenient time as shall seem meet to the assignees, has also been held void. (Woodburn v. Mosher, 9 Barb. 256.) The opinion cited from Barry v. Griffin, was held, in the case of Nicholas v. Leavett, (4 Sandf. S. C. 252-293,) to be an obiter dictum, which could not be supported on authority or principle; but, in the Court of Appeals, it was sustained on both, (2 Seld. 510-521;) as also in the case of Burdick v. Post et al. (12 Barb. 168); 2 Seld. 522. In Schufelt v. Abernethy, (2 Duer, 533-537,) it is held to be a consequence of the doctrine of the case of Nicholson v. Leavitt, (2 Seld. 521,) that "the assignment, to be valid, must either, by express words, or by its necessary legal construction, devote all the property which it embraces, not only absolutely and unconditionally, but immediately, to the payment of the creditors. In Brigham v. Tillinghast, (3 Kernan,

---

Forbes et al. v. Scannell.

---

215—220,) the Court of Appeals reversed the decision of the Supreme Court, in 15 Barb. 618, and held that authority to convert an estate into money, or available means, avoided the assignment as being equivalent to a power to sell on credit. The Chancellor, in Meacham v. Sternes, (9 Paige, 398, 404, 405,) denies the right of an assignee to send the property away, to be sold on commission. The meaning of the parties to the deed, may be inferred from their own practical interpretation of it. It was so drawn as to leave to the assignees that discretion in the management and disposition of the trust property, which they have exercised. In Pierson v. Manning, (2 Gibbs, Mich. 448,) it is held that if an assignment be so drawn as to hinder and delay creditors in its execution, it is a legal presumption that it was framed with that intent, and that a statute, making fraud a question of fact, has no application, when fraud is apparent on the face of the instrument; that it cannot then be rebutted by extrinsic evidence. The application of partnership property to individual debts, and of private property to partnership debts, and the absence of all provisions for taking immediate possession of the property, and making sale of it for cash, without delay, are of this character, even if the assignment had been in other respects properly executed by all the partners. 3. The assignment is not executed by creditors, nor is their assent to it proved, and for aught that appears, the trust, as to this property, was held for the assignors, and was revocable at their will. Such is the common law, unmodified by State legislation. (Acton v. Woodgate, 2 Mylne & Keen, 492; Wallwyn v. Coutts, 3 Merivale, 707; Smith v. Keating, 6 Mann. Grang. & S. 136; S. C. 60 Eng. C. L. 134—157; McKinnon v. Stewart, 1 Eng. L. and Eq. 162, 163; Garrard v. Ld. Lauderdale, 2 Sim. 1; 3 Id. 14; Burrill, 85, 313, 314; Widgery v. Haskell, 5 Mass. 144—154; Stevens v. Bell, 6 Id. 339; Ingraham v. Geyer, 13 Id. 146; Russel v. Woodward, 10 Pick, 407; Carr v. Dole, 5 Shep. 358; Burrill, 215; Note 3, 216, 220, 221, Note 5.) Under the provision of the instrument, giving partnership property to individual creditors, and individual property to partnership creditors, there can be no presumption of the assent of any of the creditors. It is in fraud of the rights of one or the other class, and in the absence of schedules, neither class can know whether it is wronged or favored by the provision. The reason of the rule for presuming the assent of the cestuis que trust fails. (Drake v. Rogers, 6 Mo. 317; Swearingen v. Slicer, 5 Id. 241; Duval v. Raisin, 7 Id. 440; Burrill, 308.) 4. No persons are named as Trustees. The assignment is made to two mercantile firms jointly — Russell & Co. and James Purdon & Co. Who composed these firms was not disclosed by the instrument; was not even known here when this suit was brought. Such a trust was not within the scope of the ordinary business of a mercantile firm, and the acceptance of it, by one or more of the partners, could not bind the firm and the partners who did not accept. (Story on Part. Secs. 111—113.)

---

Even if each member accepted, and became liable for the execution of the trust individually, and the firms turned out insolvent, would the creditors of the Trustee firms in their legitimate business have to share their assets with the cestuis que trust of the assignment? The firms may be found solvent, but are the firms bound? If not, who are the Trustees, and how can creditors know them and their fitness for the trust, even to this day? The assignment makes the firms Trustees jointly, not the individual members of them.

Under whatever system of law, then, the Court will test this assignment, it will be found void against the attachment of the Appellant. We think we have fully established, on every ground, that the law applicable to the cause is that of California in its entirety, as it stood when the Respondents appeared in her Courts, setting up title to the property in dispute; that the treaty and Act of Congress, which are set up as establishing a lex loci contractus, if admitted to have effect according to their intent, do not purport to establish a lex loci, a territorial law, but simply personal statutes, confined exclusively to American citizens; that the constitutionality, extent, force, and completeness of said personal statutes, as respects American citizens, admit of grave doubts; that, at least, it is evident, they offer no remedy for any foreign creditors under the assignment; and that if they be held to establish the common law of England as the law of this case, the assignment is invalid by that test, and void as to the Appellant.

I. Does this assignment come under the general rule of international comity, and is its validity determinable by the lex loci contractus; or is it within the exceptions to that rule, and its validity to be decided by the lex fori?

As a general rule, the law of the place where any instrument relating to personal property, is executed by a person domiciled in that place, governs as to the form, execution, effect, interpretation, and operation, of the instrument. Lex loci domicilii regit actum. (Story, Conflict of Laws, 242 — 244.) The repugnancy of the Statute of California, (39th Section of the Act of May 4th, 1852,) to voluntary assignments for the benefit of creditors, must be confined to those made within the State.

Counsel have misstated the reason of the distinction in the rule of comity with respect to foreign bankrupt laws and voluntary assignments. Effect is not given to the latter, "because most of the States have had laws authorizing and regulating them;" but because the jus disponendi applies to them, whereas the bankrupt law is a proceeding in invitum.

Nor is this assignment excepted from the general rule of international comity. 1st. It is true that contracts opposed to the national policy and institutions of a State, or to the good morals and duties of its subjects, are excepted from the general rule of comity. But these exceptions have each their limitations. Comity is the general rule, and the exceptions are strictly limited so as not to affect the principle which is recognized and established by the rule. (Greenwood v. Curtis, 6 Mass. 378.) They must in the first case be limited to contracts, the execution of which would be repugnant to the interests and rights of sovereignty of the interdicting State; and in the second case, those which are founded on moral turpitude, in respect either of the consideration or the stipulation. (Burge, Col. and Foreign Laws, Vol. 3, 779, 780, and authorities referred to.) 2d. It is true, that in certain cases, where the law of a State prohibits particular kinds of voluntary assignments for the benefit of creditors, it has been held that those made in foreign States, and which come within the prohibition, although valid by the law of the place where made, will not be sustained in the forum of the State so prohibiting them. But the exception in those cases is not made on the ground of repugnancy in the laws of the two places. The exception, with respect to personal property, when made, has been based on the fact that the foreign assignment was injurious to the rights and interests of the citizens of the prohibiting State, and it has been limited to property within its jurisdiction, at the time of the assignment, and held by the law as pledged for the payment of debts due within the State.

In the last case cited and relied upon by Appellant's counsel, Varnum v. Camp, (1 Green, N. J. 326-339,) it was the unanimous opinion of the Court that the merchandise which belonged to the assignor in New York, and was comprehended in the assignment, but had been sent to New Jersey after the assignment was made, was the property of the assignee, and could not be taken by the Sheriff under execution for a judgment creditor in New Jersey.

That decision is conclusive of the present case, even admitting that the assignment of Nye Brothers & Co. is by the laws of California declared fraudulent and void with respect to property situate in this State.

The rule above announced by the Supreme Court of New Jersey is nothing more or less than the ordinary rule of bargain and sale of personal property.

If reduced to possession, actual or constructive, by the purchaser, it is not subject to attachment by the creditors of the vendor. (Thuret v. Jenkins, 7 Martin, 353.)

(See, also, Richardson v. Leavitt, Lou. Ann. 430; Whitenwright v. Leavitt, 4 Id. 352. The same doctrine was held in U. S. v. Bank of U. S. 8 Rob. 262; Black V. Zacharie, 3 How. 483; Amor v. Cockburn, 4 Mart. N. S. 667; Babcock v. Malbie, 7 Id.; 137 Russell v. Gale, 4 Lou. 183; Hepp v. Glover, 15 Id. 461; Powell v. Aiken, 18 Id. 321; Delvach v. Jones, Id. 447; Urie v. Stevens, 3 Rob. 251; Price v. Smith, 5 Id. 124; Bank of St. Mary's v. Morton, 12 Id. 409; Oliver v. Lake, 3 Lou. Ann. 78.)

Nye Brothers & Co. had lost their control over this property. It was in the possession of the assignees, and held by them under a title valid by the law of the place. It was sent by them to California as their own property, under the law of the place from which it was sent. (See Bur. on As. 336; Story, Conflict of Laws, Sec. 411, 3d Ed.)

Forbes et al. v. Scannell.

---

We consider the following propositions to be well established principles of public law:

1st. That, by the general rule of international comity, contracts valid by the law of the place where made are valid everywhere.

2d. That voluntary assignments of personal property for the benefit of creditors, are held to be within this rule of national comity.

3d. That the only exception to the application of this rule to such assignments is where the property assigned is within the jurisdiction of the prohibiting State at the time the assignment is made, or has not been reduced to possession, actual or constructive, of the assignees.

4th. That, with respect to property thus within the prohibiting State at the time of the assignment, or not reduced to the possession of the assignees, the attaching creditor must be a citizen of, or domiciled in, the prohibiting State where the property has its situs.

5th. Moreover, personal property, situated within the prohibiting State, is considered as pledged by the law only to the debts of the assignor which are there due and payable; and the creditor, even though a citizen, cannot seek property for debts contracted and payable in foreign countries.

6th. Property upon the high seas at the time of the assignment is, under the common law, reduced to the possession of the assignees, ipso facto, by the assignment.

7th. To extend the law of the forum to property not within the State at the time of the assignment, would be giving to the law an extra-territorial effect, and to the Court an extra-territorial jurisdiction, which have never been claimed or permitted by Christian States.

It follows, therefore, that the goods, coming here in the possession, and prima facie the property of the assignees, could not be lawfully seized by the Sheriff in this case, and cannot be held by him under this execution without showing that the assignees have no title.

But conceding, for the purpose of argument, that it is necessary for us to show the validity of this assignment, we will now proceed to inquire:

Fogbes et al. v. Scannell.

---

II. What was the law of the place where the assignment was made, and what tribunal was authorized to take jurisdiction and determine upon its validity under that law?

Under this head counsel cited 2 Phillimore on Int. Law, 235, 239, 271; Opinions of Attorney-Generals, Vol. 7, 346, 348, 498, 499, 501; Treaty with China, 1844, Art. 25; Act Congress Aug. 11, 1848, carrying into effect the Treaty; Decree of Robert M. McLane, U. S. Commissioner to China, distributing the judicial authority conferred upon the Commissioner and Consuls, to be found in "The China Mail" of May 15th, 1856.

This decree provides detailed "Rules and Regulations" for the law and equity jurisdiction of the United States' Consular Courts in China, the issuing of writs and processes, etc. It says: "The United States Consular Court may exercise equity jurisdiction where the subject matter complained be a matter of — 1st, Accident and mistake; 2d, Account; 3d, Fraud; 4th, Infants; 5th, Specific performance of agreements; 6th, Trusts. * * As to trusts, equity will superintend and protect the creation of trusts, whether vesting in the Trustee real or personal estate, and take jurisdiction of trusts, whether resulting from an express deed or the force of circumstances and the situation of parties, which latter are implied trusts." The decree provides, in detail, for new trials and appeals from the Consular Courts in all proceedings at law, and adds: "New trials and appeals, shall lie from the equity jurisdiction of the U. S. Consular Courts as from the common law jurisdiction of the same."

We deduce from the foregoing summary of laws and authorities:

1st. That, in the earlier part of the middle ages, merchants and traders, residing in foreign States, were not subject to the local jurisdiction, but only to the jurisdiction of Consuls and other officers appointed by their own States for that purpose.

2d. That, about the middle of the seventeenth century, this rule of general public law was changed throughout Christian Europe, the civil and criminal jurisdiction of foreign Consuls over their resident countrymen passing into the hands of the local authorities.

3d. That in Mohammedan, Pagan, and all unchristian dominions, Consuls retain the jurisdiction which in earlier times they possessed everywhere.

---

Forbes et al. v. Scannell.

---

4th. That the treaty between the United States and China recognizes and establishes, by express stipulations, this general principle of the extritoriality of Americans in China.

5th. That the treaty provides that jurisdiction over Americans in China may be exercised not only by Consuls, but also by other officers, other public functionaries, public officers, and the authorities of the United States.

6th. That the Statute of 1848 (Secs. 1, 2, and 3) gives to the Commissioner and Consuls the judicial authority necessary to carry into effect the provisions of the treaty, without, however, distributing it between them, except in certain cases, but leaving that distribution to be made by regulation.

7th. That cases of insolvency are included among the questions thus left to be distributed by regulation, and that the Commissioner, in 1854, by a decree which is "binding and obligatory until annulled or modified by Congress," assigned to the United States Consular Court equity jurisdiction of all matters of trust, whether of real or personal estate, and whether resulting from express deed or otherwise.

8th. That in the exercise of the jurisdiction thus conferred, the Commissioner and Consuls, when acting in their judicial capacity, are to be governed by the law of nations, the laws of the United States, the common law, and the decrees and regulations issued by the Commissioner, until annulled or modified by Congress.

Objections made to this system of law and jurisdiction in China:

1. The first objection to be noticed is, that "It is direct legislation by Congress upon the rights of property and persons of American citizens by a power derived from China." A treaty cannot enlarge the constitutional powers of the Federal Government, or give to Congress the power to pass laws which shall contravene any of the provisions of the Constitution.

But the Constitution does not prevent "direct legislation by Congress upon the rights of property and persons of American citizens" in foreign countries. The reasoning of the Court in

---

Forbes et al. v. Scannell.

---

the Dred Scott case is limited to the States of the Union, and to the Territory which has become a part of the United States. (19 Howard, 449, 450.)

How can the "power to make treaties" and "to regulate commerce," be exercised by the Federal Government, without in some degree affecting "persons and property" of citizens of States and Territories. (The People v. Gerke, 5 Cal. 381; Cherac v. Cherac, 2 Wheat. 289; Orr v. Hodgson, 4 Id. 453; The Society, etc. v. New Haven, 8 Id. 464; Hughes v. Edwards, 9 Id. 489; Banks v. Corneal, 10 Id. 181; Henks v. Dupont, 3 Peters, 242; Ware v. Helton, 3 Dallas, 230.)

The same rule of decision is applicable to the power of the Federal Government "to regulate commerce with foreign nations," etc. The power given to the Federal Government over any particular subject, cannot be controlled by the legislative enactment of a State, for that would annul and destroy the power itself.

Nor is there any difficulty in enforcing the trusts created by the assignment. The United States Consular Courts in China have the same jurisdiction with respect to Chinese and British subjects resident in China, and non-resident Americans and foreigners, that the Courts of California have with respect to the same persons resident in China, or elsewhere out of the United States. The European, Asiatic, and non-resident American creditors of Nye Brothers & Co. have the same relief, legal and equitable, in those Consular Courts, as they would have had in the Courts of California or of New York, if the assignment had been made in either of those States, and Messrs. Huth & Co. hold in this matter precisely the same relation to the United States Consular Court in Canton as they would hold in ordinary cases of litigation to the Courts of California. Although they are British subjects and non-residents in California, they may invoke the jurisdiction of our Courts over a resident defendant; and, although British subjects and non-residents in Canton, they may invoke the jurisdiction of the United States Courts in Canton, over American citizens resident there.

There is no plainer or better established principle of public law than this, that alien friends may sue in the Courts of the defendant's country.

---

The United States Attorney-General, Mr. Cushing, in his official opinion, has fully discussed this question with respect to the jurisdiction of the United States Courts in China. (Opinions of Attorney-Generals, Vol. 7, 517—519.)

[Counsel here quoted at length from Mr. Cushing's opinion; but, as the quotations appear in the opinion of this Court, they are omitted.]

These views are carried out in the "Rules and Regulations" contained in the decree of Commissioner McLane. It is especially provided, that the Consular Court shall exercise equity jurisdiction in all matters of trust, express or implied, and of real or personal estate.

III. Is this assignment valid by the laws of the place where it is made?

As preliminary to this discussion, let us, first, inquire how are those laws to be ascertained? And, second, by what are we to be guided in applying them to the present case?

1st. The system of laws by which the validity of this assignment must be tested is composed, as already stated: 1st. Of "the laws of the United States." 2d. Of "the common law;" and, 3d. Of the "Decrees and Regulations" made by the Commissioner.

Strictly speaking, there is no uniform system of common law of the United States; nevertheless, there is a diverse common law in the different States which is the English common law, or at least its great leading principles, modified and adapted to the legislative adjudication and usage of the people of the States. This, says Mr. Cushing, is the common law meant by the statute, and it "furnishes a code of laws for the great mass of civil or municipal duties, rights, and relations, of men, such as, within the United States, are the resort of the Courts of the several States." But, while the great body of this code is generally applicable, there has not been an entire uniformity in the modifications and changes of the English common law, made by the legislation and judicial construction of each of the States. To dispose of this difficulty, continues Mr. Cushing, the statute went one step further, and enacted that the Commissioner might, from time to time, issue decrees and regulations, "which shall have the force of law, and supply any defects and deficiencies in the common law and the laws of the United States." (Opinions of U. S. Attorney-General, Vol. 7, 504.) Referring again to the decree of Commissioner McLane, he says: "By 'common law' is intended that law which is to be found in the decisions of the Courts of Justice of the United States, both Federal and State Courts, as distinguished from that law which is found in the statute law of the United States and of the several States. These decisions are to be found in the numerous volumes of American Reports, known as reports of cases decided in the Courts of the United States, and of the several States of the American Union, and they embrace the common law of England, so far as the same has been judicially noticed as evidence of the common law, in the administration of justice in the United States. The Commentaries of Kent and Story on American Law, and the American edition of Blackstone's Commentaries on the laws of England, are referred to as further evidence and explanation of the common law; and no practice of proceeding, and no final judgment, not expressly authorized by the laws of the United States, or the common law as thus defined, or by the decrees of the United States Commissioner to China, should ever have place in a United States Consular Court in China, whether the same be exercising a common law or equity jurisdiction."

---

---

The 34th Section of the Judiciary Act of 1789, says: "that the laws of the several states, except where the Constitution, treaties, or statutes of the United States, shall otherwise require or provide, shall be regarded as the rules of decision in trials at common law in Courts of the United States, in cases where they apply," and the 14th Section of the same act empowers the Courts of the United States "to issue all writs not specially provided for by the statute, which may be necessary for the exercise of their respective jurisdictions, and agreeable to the principles and usages of the law." Chief Justice Marshall, in commenting upon these apparently repugnant provisions of that statute, regards the 14th Section as explanatory of what is meant by the 34th, and that by the principles and usages to which the power of the Court was intended to be limited by the act, he understands "those general principles and those general usages which are to be found, not in the legislative acts of any particular State, but that generally recognized and long established law, which forms the substratum of the laws of every State." (Burr's Trial, Vol. 2, 482.)

---

---

The laws, therefore, by which this assignment is to be tested, are not foreign laws, in the general sense of that term, but laws with which all Courts, whether of the United States or of a particular State, are presumed to be acquainted.

2d. In applying the law of New York or of any other State, we follow the interpretation and construction given to the law by the Courts of that State. So, in applying the above described system of laws in China to a particular case, we should be guided by the adjudications of the Courts whose duty it is to interpret and construe those laws. In this case we have the decision of the Consular Court of Canton, which under the law and decrees had jurisdiction of the matter, upon the validity of this identical assignment, the Court, after a careful consideration of the case, sustaining the assignment as good and valid. This is decisive of the case.

If that Court were to be considered foreign in the general sense of the term, its judgment would be of "universal obligation, as to all the matters of right and title, which it professes to decide in relation thereto." (Story, Conflict of Laws, 956, 989; Kaims on Eq. B. 3, Ch. 8, Sec. 4; French v. Hall, 9 N. H. 137.)

But this Court is foreign, only in relation to this State — it is a Court established by the United States, in a place over which the laws and jurisdiction of the United States are extended, so far as respects the persons and property in this case. It is not a constitutional Court, in which the judicial powers conferred by the Constitution on the General Government are deposited; but it is a legislative Court, created by Congress, in virtue of the general right of sovereignty which exists in the government, in a territory over which the exercise of this particular power and jurisdiction has been ceded to it by treaty. (Am. Ins. Co. v. Canter, 1 Peters, 511 et seq.) This is as much a domestic Court as was the Territorial Courts of Florida, referred to in the case just cited, or as are now the Territorial Courts of Oregon or Washington, and its judgments are entitled, in California, to the same respect and authority as the judgments of the Courts of those territories are here entitled to.

Objections made to the validity of this assignment:

1st. The first general objection is, that no law of the place has been shown allowing voluntary assignments for the benefit of creditors. Nor has any law of the place been shown, or alleged, which prohibits such assignments. The jus disponendi, or right to dispose of property by contracts inter vivos, has its origin in the law of nature, and is not the offspring of legislation. And where there is no statutory provision prohibiting or regulating the disposition of property by a particular kind of contract, such a disposition will be considered good and valid. "Foreigners enjoy every right which arises from the jus gentium. They may, therefore, perform all sorts of acts inter vivos. The right to make a testament, active or passive, is, on the contrary, derived from the civil law — testamenti factio est juris civilis — foreigners not enjoying what is of civil law, have not this faculty or right." (Pothier, Traité des Persones, Part 1, Tit. 2, Sec. 2.)

The French law adopted the maxim of the Roman law, factio testamenti est juris civilis. For that reason a foreigner could not dispose of property by testament. He was forbidden by municipal law. But, says Pothier, the right to dispose of property by acts inter vivos is founded on the jus gentium, the law of nature.

"Where there is no insolvent law, there is nothing to prevent a debtor from making a voluntary assignment of his property in trust for his creditors." (Parsons' Mercantile Law, 307.)

2d. An assignment by the resident and managing partner, for himself and in the name of the firm, is sufficient to vest in the assignee the entire property of the firm, wheresoever situate. (See the authorities above referred to on the general doctrine of the jus disponendi; Means v. Hapgood, 19 Pick. 106, 107; Deckard v. Chase, 5 Watts, 23; Hennessy v. The Western Bank, 6 Watts & Serg. 310; Harrison v. Sterry, 5 Cranch.; Henderson & Wilkins v. Tompkins, Brock. 458; Parsons' Mer. Law, 175, Note 1.)

But Appellants contend that C. D. Nye, the only other full partner, must be considered as present in Canton at the time the assignment was made, although actually at Shanghai, nine hundred miles distant, with no means of communication except by a sea voyage of ten or fifteen days; and that he cannot be considered as assenting to the assignment, although it is particularly stated in the decree of the Consular Court that it

---

---

"has received the assent and adoption of his, the said Gideon Nye, Jr.'s copartners." Counsel have stipulated that Gideon Nye, Jr. was "the only resident partner, and managing the affairs of the house at Canton," and the evidence shows that C. D. Nye had not, for a long time, taken any part in the management of the affairs of the firm of Nye Brothers & Co. if, indeed, he had not actually ceased to be a partner.

But it is urged that there was no immediate necessity, on the 11th of March, 1856, of making an assignment at that time. We answer, the failure was caused by the return of thirty thousand pounds sterling of protested bills drawn by Nye Brothers & Co. on Huth & Co. which protested bills were returned to Canton on the 8th or 10th of March, 1856, and that two-thirds of the debts of the firm were due to Chinese creditors.

3d. Another objection is, that this assignment is insufficient to convey the real estate either of Nye or of the partnership, and, therefore, it left a part of the property of the assignor in his hands. If this were so, Huth & Co. have no reason to complain, for it left such unassigned realty liable for the payment of the debt due to them. It is shown, however, by Appellant himself, that a subsequent conveyance of the realty to the same assignees, for the same purposes, was made April 29th, 1856, ratifying this assignment, and curing any defects in the manner of its execution.

4th. The assignment says, "in trust, and for the benefit of each and all of the creditors." The use required to be made of the property assigned is sufficiently declared—it was for the payment of each and all of the creditors, without preference or distinction. The necessary legal construction of this is, that the property assigned was devoted "absolutely, unconditionally, and immediately," to this object.

5th. Another objection is, that the partnership funds are assigned "for the benefit of his (Nye's) individual creditors."

It is the evident intent and fair construction of these words that the individual property of Nye is assigned for the benefit of his individual creditors, and the partnership property for the benefit of the partnership creditors.

6th. The next objection is, that "this assignment is not executed by creditors, nor is their assent to it proved." And it is argued, that by the common law of England, "unmodified by State legislation," the assent of creditors is necessary to bind the property of the partnership involved in this action. We have shown that the lex loci contractus is not the common law of England, "unmodified by legislation," but the common law, as modified by legislation, adjudication, and usage, in the several States, and as resorted to, interpreted, and applied, by the Courts of the United States, to the great mass of civil or municipal duties, rights, and relations, of men. It was this same common law which was applied by this Court in the case of Billings v. Billings, (2 Cal. 107,) before the statute was passed regulating assignments in this State. In that case the assignment was not executed by the creditors, nor did they assent to it; on the contrary, the suit was brought by an execution creditor, to set it aside as illegal and void, nevertheless its validity was sustained.

---

Forbes et al. v. Scannell.

---

The argument that the assignment was revocable by the common law of England, even if that law, in its unmodified form, had been in force in China, can have no application to this case, because this property was reduced to the possession of the assignees, and sent by them to the consignees, Morgan, Hathaway & Co. In this case the assignment is absolute and unconditional, the assignor neither retaining power to change the trusts nor a control over the deed of trust. (Fellows v. Com. Bank, 6 Rob. 242.)

By the common law, the assent of creditors will be presumed where no release or other condition is stipulated for, and the property assigned is for the benefit of all the creditors pro rata; nor is it very objectionable to a deed of trust, under the common law, that the cestui que trust is not a party to a deed. (U. S. v. U. S. Bank, 8 Rob. Lou. 262; Oliver v. Lake, 3 Lou. Ann. 78; Layson v. Rowan, 7 Rob. Lou. 1; Halsey v. Whitney, 4 Mas. C. C. 206; Brooks v. Marbury, 11 Wheat. 78; Brashear v. West, 7 Pet. 608, 613; Nicoll v. Mumford, 4 Johns. Ch. 522; Bur. 308 and Notes.)

7th. Another objection is that no persons are named Trustees, but only mercantile firms, which, not being formed for such objects, cannot legally be made Trustees, as firms, but only as individuals, and therefore they are required to be individually named in the assignment. But counsel have given no authorities in support of this objection, and the position is opposed to the established doctrine of trusts. Trusts, when once created, never fail on account of the non-appointment, disability, incompetency, or death, of the Trustee. In either of these contingencies, a Court of Equity will follow the subject matter of the trust, and provide the proper means for executing it. (Hill on Trustees, 48.)

But it is urged that as the firms, and not the individual members, are named, and as such trusts are not within the ordinary business of a mercantile partnership, neither the firms nor the individual partners are responsible for any neglect or misapplication of the trust funds, and that, therefore, the assignment must be regarded as made to hinder, delay, and defraud, the creditors. This proposition is incorrect, both in its premises and in its conclusion. Partnerships and individual partners are responsible for the acts of a single copartner in the name of the firm, even outside of the ordinary business of the association, where the other partners concur, either expressly or impliedly, in such acts. (Collyer on Partnership, Sec. 390.)

In this case all the partners, (with a single exception,) of both firms were present, and accepted the trust, and immediately issued circulars in the names of the firms to that effect.

In assignments for the benefit of creditors, the assent of the Trustees is always presumed, until the contrary is shown, and the legal title passes without their assent, if made with their knowledge and privity. If such an assignment be made to two or more persons, and one of them accepts the trust, and the others repudiate it, the assignment is nevertheless operative as to the assenting Trustee, unless it contains some condition rendering the assent of all requisite. (2 Kent, Com. 533, notes; Galt v. Dihrell, 10 Yerger, 146; Gordon v. Coolidge, 1 Sumner, 537; Neilson v. Blight, 1 Johns. Cases, 205, Moses v. Murgatroyd, Johns. Ch. 129.)

8th. Another objection is "the want of schedules." The authorities referred to contradict the position taken. It is distinctly held, in the cases cited, "that the mere circumstance of a want of schedule, will not render it (an assignment) fraudulent." It may be an indicium of fraud, or an "item in the list of circumstances to establish a fraudulent intent," but nothing more, if the transaction be fair and possession accompanies the transfer.

---

Forbes et al. v. Scannell.

---

9th. The next objection is, that Nye was "employed as agent of the assignees, with a salary." The authorities cited go no further than to make this a badge of fraud, and the finding of the Court is, that there was no actual fraud. (Billings v. Billings, 2 Cal. 107.) But the assignee may employ the assignor as clerk, agent, etc. (Burrill, 430, 431, 174.)

To the third finding it is objected that there is no evidence that the assignment was delivered. The original instrument was made before the Consul as a judicial act, and became a part of the records of his office, as is the usual practice in Consulates.

This mode of execution and delivery to the officer is, the world over, a delivery to the parties. Moreover, the transcript of that act, under the signature and seal of the Consul, which has the force and effect of an original, is found in the hands of the assignees, and filed by them in this case. The delivery of the property and its possession by the assignees, is conceded by the stipulation.

With respect to the form of this instrument, and the manner of its execution, which have been so much commented on by counsel, it has been decided to be valid by the proper forum of the place where it was made. The Consul followed the common forms laid down in the most approved consular form-books. (See the official work of M. Declercq on Diplomatic and Consular Forms.)

Summary:

1st. These goods, being in the possession of Respondents, and held by them under title prima facie valid, the burden of proof rested on Appellants to show a better title in execution debtors, and this he has sought to do by attempting to establish the invalidity of the assignment by which this property was transferred from the execution debtors to the Respondents.

2d. The title of Respondents was acquired in a foreign country, and has been adjudged good by a Court of competent jurisdiction of the country where the parties were domiciled, where the contract was made, and where the property was situated. It must, therefore, be held good everywhere.

---

Forbes et al. v. Scannell.

---

3d. But conceding that the Courts of California may disregard such judgment of the forum loci rei sitae, and may re-examine the validity of this assignment, its validity must be determined by the lex loci contractus, unless the case comes within the admitted exceptions of the rule of international comity.

4th. It has been shown that this case is not within any of the exceptions to the rule of comity which have been admitted by any Court, even by those Courts which have carried the doctrine of the lex fori the very furthest.

5th. The lex loci contractus is not, properly speaking, a foreign law, nor the statute of any particular State, nor the English common law; "but that generally recognized and long-established law, which forms the substratum of the laws of every State."

6th. The jus disponendi of the assignors, not having been limited by any statute, their general right, under the system of laws prevailing in China, to transfer this property to Respondents, in trust for their creditors, cannot be denied. It is sustained not only by the judicial decisions of England and America, but also by the decision of this Court, in the case of Billings v. Billings, (2 Cal. 107).

7th. The assignment in this case being sufficient, when accompanied with a change of possession, to vest the title of property in Respondents, their title to these teas can only be impeached on the ground of actual fraud.

8th. But Appellant, after the benefit of a new trial for the express purpose of giving him an opportunity to impeach the bona fide character of this assignment, has not only failed to establish any fact showing a fraudulent intent, but Respondents are now fortified by the finding of the Court, sitting as a jury, against the allegations of fraud.

BALDWIN, J. delivered the opinion of the Court—FIELD, J. concurring.

Suit brought to recover damages of defendant for taking certain teas. The case is one of more than usual interest and importance. It involves principles novel in their application in this State, and it has been ably and fully argued at the bar and upon briefs. The general nature of the suit may be thus stated: Nye

Brothers & Co. were a mercantile firm, composed of citizens of the United States, residents of, and doing business in, Canton, China, before and on the 11th March, 1856. On that day they failed, when Gideon Nye, Jr. one of the firm, the only resident partner, and managing the affairs of the house at Canton, appeared before Oliver H. Perry, United States Consul at Canton, and signed and acknowledged before the Consul this instrument in writing:

"Be it known, that on the eleventh day of March, A. D. eighteen hundred and fifty-six, before me, Oliver H. Perry, Consul of the United States of America, at Canton, China, personally came and appeared Gideon Nye, Jr. a citizen of the United States of America, and at present a resident of the city of Canton, China, and a partner in the commercial house of Messrs. Nye Brothers & Company, residing, transacting, and doing business in the city of Canton, China, and being the only partner in said commercial house of Nye Brothers & Company here present, and requested me to note, that he desires to assign, and does assign, all and singular the real and personal property belonging and appertaining unto the said commercial house of Nye Brothers & Company, whether situate in China or elsewhere, jointly unto Messrs. Russell & Company, a commercial house residing and doing business in Canton, China, and unto James Purdon & Company, also a commercial house, residing and doing business in the said city of Canton, China, in trust and for the benefit of each and all the creditors of the said Gideon Nye, Jr. and the said commercial house of Nye Brothers & Company, and the said appearer declared that he reserves to himself sufficient time to record in this Consulate a full and complete schedule of all the assets and liabilities, whether appertaining and belonging to him personally, or appertaining and belonging to the said commercial house of Gideon Nye, Brothers & Company, of which he is a partner, as aforesaid.

GIDEON NYE, JR. for self and NYE BROTHERS & Co.

Noted before me on the eleventh day of March, A. D. eighteen hundred and fifty-six, at the hour of two, P. M. this day, in faith whereof I hereunto sign my name and fix my seal of office.

---

That at the time of executing this instrument, Nye Brothers & Co. were largely indebted to the citizens and residents of China, and to citizens and residents of the United States, and those of Great Britain, and also to citizens of the United States and Great Britain residing at Canton. The merchandise in controversy was shipped by Nye Brothers & Co. from Canton, to Morgan, Hathaway & Co. at San Francisco, in the ship called the "Berreda Brothers," before their failure in March, 1856, and that the "Barreda Brothers," returned to Canton after the failure, from stress of weather, when the plaintiffs took actual possession of the goods as assignees under the before mentioned assignment of Nye Brothers & Co. and shipped them directly to Morgan, Hathaway & Co. for sale, with instructions to account to them as such assignees for such proceeds, and the seizure of these teas was made by the defendant while in the possession of Morgan, Hathaway & Co. under the consignment of the assignees. After the execution of the assignment, a controversy arose between one A B, a citizen of the United States residing at Canton, and these assignees, before O. H. Perry, U. S. Consul at Canton, in which was involved the question whether or not the assignment was valid; and the Consul held, for reasons given in his judgment or opinion, which is to be found in the record, that it was, and that an assignment, made after insolvency, which divides the assets with perfect equality among all the creditors, is considered by the Court, under its equity jurisdiction, as a valid trust, and will be sustained. That the assignees have, by general and special circulars, notified the creditors and others dealing with the house of Nye Brothers & Co. of the state of assets and liabilities, and their business as assignees in the execution of their trust is still unsettled. The defendant seized the goods by a valid execution, issued on a valid judgment, in favor of F. Huth & Co. v. Nye Brothers & Co. defendant knowing of plaintiffs' claim.

Some other facts appear in the record. These relate mainly to the question of fraud in fact, in the assignment, and will be noticed when we come to consider that subject. The case was tried by the judge below, who made a finding of facts and legal conclusions, and gave judgment for plaintiff for the amount claimed. The defendant appeals from the judgment.

The first point made by the Appellants is that this assignment is void. The argument in favor of this general proposition is, that by the 39th Section of our statute for the relief of insolvent debtors and protection of creditors, (Wood's Digest, 501,) an assignment of this character is absolutely void; that upon this subject, our own legislation has declared a State policy, and that while effect will be given in the Courts of a State to contracts entered into beyond its jurisdiction, this general rule is not based upon any absolute right in a party to such enforcement of the contracts, but is a mere regulation of international comity, and this comity will not be exercised when it is opposed to the interests or declared policy of the State of the forum. And the conclusion of the learned counsel is, that this case falls within the exception just given. There would be more force in this view, if this were an executory agreement to make an assignment in this State, of this character, or if this property were within this State at the time of the assignment. But here the contract, such as it was, was executed beyond the jurisdiction. The property was beyond this State—the parties, also; the actual possession taken, and the title vested in the foreign jurisdiction. The property came into this State with the full effect—whatever that was—which the contract made abroad impressed upon it. It is not even shown that at the time of that contract the property was agreed, or intended to be shipped, as assigned property, to this State; on the contrary, at the time of this assignment, the teas were at sea; they were taken possession of on the return of the vessel, by the assignees, and again transmitted. It cannot be pretended that this policy of our statute is anything more than a conventional rule, established for the regulation of a certain class of contracts and interests. The rule itself is not of natural obligation. It is considered here as the safer and better rule; it is considered elsewhere, and by the common law, as not as conducive to the public welfare as a contrary rule. It does not occupy a more favorable position in this respect than our Statute of Frauds, requiring certain contracts to be in writing in order to prevent perjury, and yet we presume no one would contend, that because, under our system, we refused to give effect to any other contract than one so evidenced, we would refuse to enforce a contract, valid in the place where made, because not executed according to our statutory modes; and especially would it not be contended, if a right of property had vested under such law, in the foreign country, that we would not recognize the title here. The truth is, we do not consider this question as one of comity at all. It is a pure question of property. By our general laws, we recognize the duty of government to protect property, and that is property which is acquired by contract, lawful and effectual, to pass title in the place where it is made. It might as well be said that if a man made his money by usury, in California, and carried it into Pennsylvania, the Courts of that State would refuse to recognize his right, because usury is against the policy of Pennsylvania. Or if won at cards in Mexico, where no laws exist against gaming, it would cease to be his property whenever brought into this State.

---

---

If this property had been sold by these assignees in China to third persons, it is not a question that the title would be upheld here if the property vested abroad and had been brought here by the purchaser. Why? Because the attributes of property — a thing acquired by a legal mode of acquisition — had been impressed on it — where, is wholly immaterial, or, probably, by what law, unless, indeed, the Courts had to give effect to some worse principle than a rule of the common law of England, or violate some better declared public policy than a section of the statute regulating modes of assignment of property here. The authorities cited have no application to the facts here. The early cases in Massachusetts maintain only the doctrine that where the property is within the State, the Courts will not allow a contract operating on it to be made in another State, the effect of which is to dispose of the property differently from the mode provided in Massachusetts. In other words, Massachusetts will not suffer her own resident creditors to be prejudiced in favor of foreign creditors, by giving the debtor the right to assign the property in the State contrary to the mode she has prescribed for assignments. But Massachusetts has never held that when the property is in New York, and there assigned, and the assignee legally vested with the title, she will not recognize the title when the property is brought within her jurisdiction.

It is hard to see by what rule of justice or of policy, Hugh, a citizen of London, could claim from the laws of California any greater privileges than he could obtain from his own Courts if this proceeding were pending in England.

---

Forbes et al. v. Scannell.

---

The Appellants contend that, in the absence of any proof of the law of the place of contract, our own law must be presumed to prevail, and they cite several authorities which seem to maintain this doctrine. This presumption, if it be one, would present a curious illustration of a fact presumed to exist, when in every single instance, probably, in which the application is made of the presumption, it would falsely represent the real fact. That China had ever passed or given effect to the 39th Section of our insolvent law is rather a violent intendment, but possibly the principle invoked was necessary, as some rule must be had for the determination of matters of litigation, and the convenience or necessity of the case constrains the adoption of the one nearest at hand when the foreign rule is unknown. (See 2 Hill, 202; 12 La. 465; 13 Mass. 147.) Having shown possession and control of this property in China, or on the seas, and the property having been brought into this State by the plaintiffs, by a law of universal application a title prima facie good is shown by the plaintiffs. Upon that title so proved, without showing anything more than this possession, the plaintiff would be entitled to recover for a seizure of it in this State, unless the defendant showed a better title in himself or in some person whose right he legally represented. To prove this title he is forced to assail the validity of this assignment. The burden of proof is on him to show the invalidity of it, and, as the invalidity rests upon its illegality, and this depends upon the proper construction of the law of the place of contract, he assumes the responsibility of showing what that law is and how this transaction opposes it. But the Appellant answers this position by the not very satisfactory appeal to the principle of presumption already adverted to, to wit: That the law of the forum is to be taken to be the law of the place of contract, and calls upon the Respondent to show that it is different. We are not satisfied that the rule invoked is properly applicable to such a state of facts as this; that to rebut an inference of title from possession acquired in a foreign country, a party can refer to a local statute of the forum, and demand, as a presumption of law, that the contract under which his adversary claims was made subject to its provisions. But, as the facts are all before us, probably the principle is not important enough to the decision to require us to consider it at length, or to pass upon it; for, when all the facts are before the Court, and they are undisputed, it is not very material upon which party rests the onus of proof. The solution of this difficulty is attempted by the Respondent, who asserts, in answer to this argument, that the real lex loci, quoad this transaction, is the common law of England, that law, in effect, having been established by the treaty between the United States and China, of July 3d, 1844, negotiated by Mr. Commissioner Cushing, and by the Act of Congress passed on the 11th of August, 1848, for the purpose of carrying into effect the provisions of the treaty. This leads us to an examination of the extent and validity of this regulation, since it is claimed to exercise an important, if not controlling, influence over this litigation. It is provided in this treaty that questions between citizens of the United States in China shall be subject to the jurisdiction and be regulated by the authorities of their own government. And this principle seems to be the same which obtains as to British subjects domiciled in that empire. It seems that American citizens residing for the purpose of trade in the ports of China are not regarded as subjects of that government, but that for purposes of government and protection, they constitute a kind of colony, subject to the laws and authority of the United States. An interesting letter from Mr. Cushing to Mr. Calhoun, then Secretary of State, dated September 29, 1844, was written in illustration of this treaty. He says: "The Consuls of Christian States, in the countries not Christian, still retain, unimpaired, and habitually exercise, their primitive function of municipal magistrates for their countrymen; their commercial or territorial capacity in those countries being but a part of their general capacity as the delegated administrative and judicial agents of their nation. * * * In China I found that Great Britain had stipulated for the absolute exemption of her subjects from the jurisdiction of the Empire, while the Portuguese attained the same object through their own local jurisdiction at Macao. I deemed it, therefore, my duty, for all the reasons assigned, to assert a similar exemption on behalf of the citizens of the United States.

---

Forbes et al. v. Scannell.

---

---

Forbes et al. v. Scannell.

---

This exemption is agreed to in terms by the letter of the treaty of Wang Hija; and it was fully admitted by the Chinese in the correspondence which occurred contemporaneously with the negotiation of the treaty. By that treaty, thus construed, the laws of the United States follow its citizens, and its banner protects them even within the domain of the Chinese Empire.

* * * In extending this principle to our intercourse with China, seeing that I have obtained the concession of absolute and unqualified extritoriality, I considered it well to use in the treaty laws of such generality in describing the substitute jurisdiction, as while they held unimpaired the customary, or law of nations, jurisdiction, do also leave to Congress the full and complete right to define, if it please to do so, what offices, with what powers, and in what form of law, shall be the instruments for the protection and regulation of the citizens of the United States."

Mr. Cushing, (Opinion of Attorney-General, Vol. 7, 501,) shows that the treaty, besides conferring on American citizens in China extritoriality in commercial matters, provides, in respect to civil matters: 1. That questions arising between citizens of the United States, in China, shall be subject to the jurisdiction and regulated by the authorities of their own government. 2. That in controversies between a citizen of the United States and China, the authorities of the two governments are to have concerted action. 3. That in controversies between the United States citizen and other persons, not Chinese, the adjustment is to be regulated by the international relations of the United States and the Government or State of that other person.

To give effect to this treaty, the Act of August 11, 1848, was passed by Congress. The "authorities" of the United States, were by this Act directed in respect to their duties and the manner of performance, and the new jurisdiction regulated and defined. The system of administration was constituted by: 1. The laws of the United States, so far as suitable to carry the treaty into effect. 2. The common law, in all cases where the laws of the United States are not adapted to the subject, or are deficient in the provisions necessary to furnish suitable remedies. 3. Decrees and regulations, by the Commissioner, which shall have the force of law, and supply such defects and deficiencies as still remain to be supplied, and the regulations, orders, and decrees, made by the Commissioner, with the advice of the several Consuls, must be transmitted to the President, "to be laid before Congress for its revision, but to be binding until annulled or modified by Congress." The first three sections of this statute give to the Commissioners and Consuls the judicial authority necessary to execute the provisions of the treaty, without, however, distributing it among them; but according to Mr. Cushing, this duty of distribution was left to the regulation of the Commissioner and Consuls, under the general power in the statute to which we have referred. These undistributed powers embrace the general doctrine and scope of what, in our system, constitutes equity jurisprudence, and some matters of more special jurisdiction — as insolvency — habeas corpus, etc. On the second of October, 1854, Robert M. McLane, being the United States Commissioner to China, with the advice of the United States Consul, issued a decree distributing the judicial power, by which jurisdiction was vested in the Consular Court over equity matters, trusts, etc. After enumerating the heads of jurisdiction, this regulation proceeds: "As to trusts, equity will superintend and protect the creation of trusts, whether vesting in the Trustee real or personal estate, and take jurisdiction of trusts, whether resulting from an express deed or the force of circumstances and the situation of the parties, which latter are implied trusts." It will thus be seen that the Commissioner and Consuls constitute a judiciary for the government of the citizens of the United States in China, and as such, and when so acting, are governed by the law of nations, the laws of the United States, the common law, and the decrees and regulations of the Commissioner, until the latter are modified or annulled by Congress. There having been no express modification or change of the common law, in respect to any rule applying to this matter, by the laws of Congress or otherwise, the rules of the general system known as the common law would seem to prevail over this subject.

---

---

It is suggested, though no great stress seems to be laid upon the objection, that Congress had no constitutional power to provide a system so organized and for such objects. But we are not disposed so to hold. It would require an extremely clear case of repugnancy to the Constitution of the United States to justify us in holding unconstitutional such a power of protection to American citizens — a power alike essential to the maintenance of friendly relations with a State like China and to secure the rights of our people there, and one, moreover, so long recognized as well by our own government in other instances, as by other christian powers in their intercourse with such nations.

---

---

The general authority given to Congress to regulate commerce with foreign nations could, probably, find no more useful or appropriate means of exercise than in treaties and laws withdrawing our citizens domiciled in unchristian nations from the jurisdiction of such governments, and confiding their rights of property and person to judicial officers of their own country, administering, under responsibilities to a common government, laws, with the general spirit and principles of which those citizens are familiar. That government would be weak, indeed, which could not, in this peaceful and unobjectionable mode, with the assent of the foreign power, exercise this wholesome protection and restraint over its own citizens abroad. The case of Dred Scott, (19 How. 449,) maintains no such doctrine as that it is cited to sustain; but the general principles there declared seem carefully to exclude the construction given, and to limit their operation to the territories "within the dominion of the United States." In The People v. Gerke, (5 Cal. 381,) this Court, in giving effect to the treaty with the kingdom of Prussia, which had direct effect on property in this State in opposition to its laws of descent, went further than it is necessary to go to uphold the treaty and laws in question. Mr. Justice Bryan said in this case: "So far as the authority of the Federal Courts is concerned, they appear to have uniformly administered the law upon the meaning given by construction to the language of the treaty, seeming never to have, in any respect, doubted the power of the General Government to provide by treaty with a foreign power for the mutual protection of the property belonging to the citizens or subjects of each in the territory of the other. The treaty-making power of the Federal Government must, from necessity, be sufficiently ample so as to cover all of the usual subjects of treaties between different powers. If we were to deny to the treaty-making power of our government the exercise of jurisdiction over the property of deceased aliens, upon the ground of interference with the course of descents or the laws of distribution of a State where property may exist, by parity of reasoning we should not make commercial treaties with foreign nations, because, it might be said, some of their provisions would injure the business of a portion of the citizens of one of the States of the Union.

---

Forbes et al. v. Scannell.

---

If the treaty-making power which resides in the Federal Government is not sufficient to permit it to arrange with a foreign nation the distribution of an alien's property, then that power resides nowhere, since it is denied to the States, and we must confess our system of government so weak and faulty as to be incapable of extending to its citizens in foreign lands that protection which is most common among a majority of modern civilized nations."

In Siemssen v. Bofer, (6 Cal. 250,) the doctrine of People v. Gerke was doubted by the late Chief Justice; but the decision has not been expressly overruled. Numerous cases sustain the general principle and reasoning upon which Gerke's case rests. (See 4 Wheaton, 453, and the other cases cited in Respondent's brief.)

In the second place, it is urged with much earnestness that this assignment is void, because no means of enforcing the trusts against the assignees exist in the local jurisdiction. It is said that the only ground upon which assignments for the benefit of creditors are supported is, that Courts of Equity can compel the fair and faithful execution of the trusts they create. But as Huth & Co. English creditors, could not go before the American authorities, they would be without any relief. As this is a matter of local law, pertaining to the lex loci contractus, the Appellant should show, as against an assignment seemingly otherwise authorized, the existence of this cause assigned for its invalidity. It is not to be presumed a priori, that any system of jurisprudence could be so defective as to withhold some remedy for so flagrant a breach of duty, as the refusal to comply with the obligations of such a trust. We think the point is not sustained. So far as these Consular Courts exist at all, as such they are Courts of the United States, into which, by the general law, an alien friend may enter for redress against a citizen of the country of which the Court is an appendage. Mr. Cushing places this subject in a very clear light. He says: "The Chinese will go into the United States Consular Court as plaintiff, and that Court will take jurisdiction of the defendant as an American; and where the demand is by an American against a Chinese, the former must, of necessity, be content with such judicial or executive action of the Chinese Government in the premises as appertains to their institutions, and as, by application, may be required on the part of the United States.

---

Forbes et al. v. Scannell.

---

As to the other cases, that of controversies occurring in China, between citizens of the United States, and subjects of any other (christian) government, the treaty provides that the same 'shall be regulated by the treaties existing between the United States and such governments, respectively, without interference on the part of China.' (Art. 25.)

Now, we have no special treaty with any of these governments on this point, nor is any needed, or necessarily required, or intended by stipulation under consideration. With all we have treaties of amity, or of ordinary commercial and social intercourse, and that suffices to meet the exigency.

By the tenor of those treaties, as they are construed by the law and usage of nations, an Englishman has the right to sue a resident of America, or an American a resident Englishman, as alien friend, in all places wherever, respectively, the jurisdiction of the other country exists locally, and is complete as to subject matter, persons, and remedial forms. (Foslix, Dr. Intern, Priv. Tit. 11, Ch. 2.)

The jurisdiction of the United States is complete, as to their citizens in China, and the jurisdiction of Great Britain is complete as to her subjects in China. That the jurisdiction in each case is extraterritorial — that in China it is excepted from the local territoriality, and that it is outside of the territoriality of either Great Britain or the United States — is a fact wholly immaterial to the question. It is a question free of all doubt on principles of international right, and subject only to the single inquiry whether the given country, each proceeding in established legal forms, by whatsoever authority such forms be established, has conferred on its Courts of justice in China jurisdiction ad hoc, or whether that remains to be done.

Here, again, the statute is explicit and ample. It confers on the Consular Courts jurisdiction of 'all civil cases arising under said treaty.' A demand of an Englishman against an American is a civil case arising under the treaty, as we see.

---

---

Therefore a suit may be brought by the Englishman against the American in the Consular Court of the United States, as, undoubtedly, in the Consular Court of Great Britain, it may, consistently with public law, be brought by an American against an Englishman.

If the Englishman were within the territorial jurisdiction of the United States, he might sue, but would also be subject to suit, in the local Courts, as the American might and would be in England. (Fœlix, Ubi Supra.) Nay, a suit would lie in the Courts of Great Britain or the United States, between residents, both being aliens in the country. (Fœlix, Ubi Supra.)

The regulations adopted by the Consular Courts of the United States are made part of the case. The second rule provides that "when a citizen of the United States, who is a resident in China, or any subject of the Emperor of China, or the citizen or subject of any other State or nation, may have a right to bring suit against a citizen of the United States, in the United States Consular Court in China," etc., etc. If Huth & Co. being Englishmen by residence, wished to sue such of these assignees as were Englishmen, residing in China, in respect to this assignment, we presume there would be no doubt that the local jurisdiction of Great Britain in China, which seems to be similar to ours, would be competent to afford adequate relief.

Having reached the conclusion that the law governing this assignment, and determining its validity, is the common law, it remains to consider the objections urged against it in connection with that system. We understand by the "common law," as used in the Act of Congress, and applied to the arbitrament of controversies between citizens of the United States, that general body of law, which, as Judge Marshall expresses it, is constituted "by those general principles and those general usages which are to be found, not in the legislative Acts of any particular State, but that generally recognized and long established law which forms the substratum of the laws of every State," i. e. every State carved out of the British Colonies. We may look to American as well as English books, and to American as well as English jurists, to ascertain what this law is, for neither the opinions nor precedents of judges can be said, with strict propriety, to be the law — they are only evidence of law. Mr. Cushing, in the same opinion from which we have quoted, (Vol. 7, 504, Opinions of Attorney-General,) says: "By 'common law,' (in the Act of 1848,) is intended that law which is to be found in the decisions of the Courts of Justice of the United States, both Federal and State, as distinguished from that law which is found in the statute law of the United States and of the States." And this language is incorporated in the Regulations by Commissioner McLane.

---

Forbes et al. v. Scannell.

---

The Appellants claim that the assignment by this common law is void upon its face, for several causes which will be examined hereafter. But the Respondents say, by way of answer in limine, that this matter is foreclosed, because the Consular Courts at Canton passed upon this question in a controversy there pending, in which case the Consul, Mr. O. H. Perry, held that the assignment was valid. It is urged that the decision of this Court is as conclusive of the questions of local law decided as would be that of any other Court as to the law of its jurisdiction. There would be more force in this argument if the Consular Court were the highest judicial Court of the jurisdiction, but it seems that an appeal lies from the Consul to the United States Commissioner. And we are not aware that the rule which accords the force of definitive exposition of the local law to the decision and judgment of the Courts of the local jurisdiction has ever extended so far as to give that sanction to the judgment of a subordinate tribunal of the municipality or territory. The decision of the Consul is, doubtless, entitled to some weight, but we are not prepared to hold it as conclusive of the general question adjudicated by him. We proceed to consider the objections to this instrument:

1. That it is not the deed of Nye, or Nye Brothers & Co. but it is the paper of the Consul, Nye merely signing his name in attestation of the act of the Consul.

We think there is no weight in this objection. In order to make a trust it is enough that the trust be declared by the party to be charged and signed by him — this seems to have been done.

2. "That it is the act of G. Nye, Jr. alone." But it purports

---

Forbes et al. v. Scannell.

---

to be the act of the firm, and is signed in the firm name. It is urged that there was no delivery shown. But this may be inferred from the acts done and the nature of the transaction, the claim made under the trust, the possession of the paper and of the property. This is not a deed; it is a mere parol assignment and trust. We are not aware of any rule requiring a delivery, as in formal deeds, as necessary in such cases. The making of the trust and its acceptance are sufficient, especially if accompanied or followed by the possession of the property. As no conditions are imposed on the creditors, an acceptance by them is presumed upon the general principle that a party is presumed to assent to acts done for his benefit. (Nicholl v. Mumford, 4 John. Ch. 522; Burr. on As. 308.)

3. It places the individual creditors of Nye on a par with the firm creditors in the distribution of the firm assets."

We do not so construe the paper. It is true the assignment is of the property of G. Nye, and of the firm, for the payment of his individual debts and the debts of the firm. But the assignment must be taken and the property administered in reference and according to the rules of law prevailing in the place of contract, and one of the rules of equity jurisprudence is, that the individual property must go to the individual creditors in priority to the firm creditors, and firm assets must go to the firm creditors in priority to the individual creditors of a partner; and there is nothing in the language of this deed which, when taken in connection with the principle, indicates or would give effect to a contrary construction. Nor do we concede that the misdirection of the property, which might be corrected in equity, would ipsa facto vacate the deed, though it is not necessary, nor do we decide the point.

4. Nor is the trust void, as alleged, because it is not more fully or particularly declared. A trust of assets or property for creditors of itself suggests specific and well defined duties, and imposes specific and well defined obligations upon the Trustees. They are to hold and take care of, sell, and dispose of the property, so as to convert it, with convenient speed, into money, and distribute and pay the proceeds over to those entitled. This duty and this responsibility would not have been more plainly enjoined or created by express language, giving in detail, the course of management and direction of the subject of the trust. What is vague in the contract is made certain by the law, and both are to be taken together.

---

Forbes et al. v. Scannell.

---

5. We think the objection that the assignment was revocable is not well taken. After the assignees had taken possession of the property, the title and trust became fixed and executed, and it was not in the power of the assignors to defeat or affect it.

6. The objection to the style of designating the Trustees is not well founded. The Trustees must be designated, but whether by a firm name, or the individual name is not material, if the language used be such, as with certainty, to indicate the persons who are nominated as Trustees. It is not necessary that all the Trustees should assent to act as such. The presumption is of assent, and the assent of one is enough to give effect to the trust, though the rest expressly repudiate. (2 Kent's Com. 533, Notes and Cases there cited.)

7. The want of a schedule of the property is sometimes regarded as a circumstance of fraud, but the absence of a schedule has never, we believe, been held sufficient of itself to avoid a conveyance of this sort.

8. The next proposition is, that the deed is inoperative because one partner has no power to make an assignment of the firm property without the assent of the other partners.

It seems that G. Nye, Jr. was the only resident partner at Canton, and on the eve of some protested bills returning from London, made this assignment without consulting his associates. It is not easy to reconcile all the authorities upon this subject, and able jurists seem divided in opinion in regard to it. We think the weight of authority is in favor of the power. The case of Harrison v. Sterry, (5 Cranch, 289,) expressly affirms it, and the facts of that case are very analogous to this. In Anderson v. Tompkins, (1 Brock. 458,) Ch. J. Marshall reaffirms the doctrine. Deckard v. Case, (5 Watts, 23,) is the same way. The reasoning of Mr. Justice Rogers states with great clearness the principle on which the doctrine rests. He says: "It is a general principle of the law of partnership that the partners are bound by what is done by each other in the course of the partnership business. They are considered as virtually present at and sanctioning the contracts they singly enter into in the course of trade, and each is vested with the authority to act at the same time as principal and as the authorized agent of his copartner.

---

Forbes et al. v. Scannell.

---

Among the powers most ordinarily exercised by partners is the jus disponendi, or the power which each partner has individually of disposing of the joint stock or merchandise. When the assignment is bona fide, I cannot doubt the power of one partner to transfer the whole as well as a part of the partnership effects." This doctrine was reaffirmed by the same Court in Hennessy v. State Bank, (6 Watts & Serg. 310.) The able and learned author on Contracts and on Mercantile Law and Partnership, after collecting all the American cases on this question, concludes: "If necessary for the protection of creditors, an assignment of all the personal property to a Trustee for their benefit by one partner, if his copartner is absent and cannot be consulted in season, and has, either expressly or by implication, left to him the sole management of the business, is valid." (Parson's on Mer. Law, 175, Note 1.)

It seems to us that the proof tends in this case to establish this precise state of things. Situated in a foreign country, at a great distance from the other partner residing there, we can scarcely conceive a condition in which the implication of the largest discretion ever confided to a partner would more properly result. The other partners do not seem to complain. Indeed, there is some evidence of their subsequent express assent, and the particular exigency existing appears to be sufficient to have authorized the action of the acting partner.

We have already extended this opinion to such length as forbids a detailed examination of other points. We have examined those not especially noticed, and must content ourselves with merely announcing the conclusions to which we have arrived, which are in accordance with those of the Judge below.

The last point to be noticed is, the charge of fraud in fact. The Judge has passed upon those matters of proof, and we see nothing to restrain us to reverse his judgment upon them.

The appointing of Nye, Jr. as Agent, with some compensation — the allotting of some furniture to the wife — the want of a schedule, and the control, such as it was, exercised over the joint affairs by Nye after the assignment, do not, in the absence of any proof of original fraudulent design, raise even a presumption of fraud, in fact, when all the circumstances are considered. Some of these suspicious circumstances are explained — the schedule was subsequently made; there would seem nothing very suspicious in getting a partner conducting a large firm, whose business was extensive and complicated, to assist assignees in bringing the assets to profitable account; to aid in collections and settlements and explaining the affairs; and the compensation was necessary, probably, to get the services of a bankrupt who seems to have surrendered all his property; the compensation seems not extravagant; the furniture was allowed the wife at the instance of many, perhaps the majority, of the creditors, and there is no proof that these subsequent acts, of benefit to Nye or his family, by the assignees were promised, or even contemplated, at the time of the assignment. We could not, upon such evidence, infer a fraud which is not presumed to exist by the law, much less do we feel disposed to overturn the decision of the Court below upon the facts on such proofs.

Curtis v. County of Sacramento.

It is unnecessary to criticise the findings. Enough is found to which we see no good exception, to justify the conclusion, viz.: the validity of the deed; the possession of the assignees; no fraud in fact; the levy and seizure by the defendant, and the value.

Judgment affirmed.

CURTIS v. THE COUNTY OF SACRAMENTO.

Prior to the Consolidation Act, the Recorder of the City of Sacramento was entitled to collect the same fees as a Justice of the Peace for services in criminal cases; but he was bound to pay them over to the City Treasurer. Such Recorders are not within Art. 6, Sec. 2, of the Constitution inhibiting judicial officers, except Justices of the Peace, from taking fees. The Constitution, when it exempted Justices from the operation of this restraint meant to exempt, also, those by whatever name called, who are intrusted with the duties assigned by the law to those officers.

Under the Consolidation Act of 1858 — query: What becomes of the indebtedness of the County of Sacramento to the City of Sacramento for the services of the Recorder in criminal cases under the laws of the State?

APPEAL from the Sixth District.

From April, 1853, to April, 1856, the defendant acted as Recorder of the City of Sacramento, and during the interval there were had before him one thousand nine hundred and thirty-seven convictions for criminal offenses, prosecuted for and in the name of The People of the State of California. Upon the judgments, executions issued against the defendants for costs, and, upon such executions, there were returns of nulla bona. The defendant claimed three dollars fee on each of said convictions against the County of Sacramento, and presented his claim for allowance to the Board of Supervisors, and they rejected it.

Judgment for defendant — plaintiff appeals.

P. L. Edwards, for Appellant.

1. Appellant acted under express statutes, and was, pro hac vice, a Justice of the Peace. (Comp. Laws, 966, Sec. 35.) 'Recorders of cities are magistrates. (Id. 436, Sec. 103.) For definition of magistrate and peace officer, see p. 511, Secs. 685, 686. 2. As Justice of the Peace, Appellant was entitled to the fees claimed. (Comp. Laws, 512, Sec. 692-694; 512, Sec. 688; 728, Sec. 33; Wood's Digest, 452, 453, Sec. 14.) 3. There is a broad distinction between acts done by a municipal officer in his municipal capacity, and those done by him ex officio as Justice of the Peace. All fees collected by him under an ordinance, are paid to the city. (Comp. Laws, 964, Sec. 29.) The city paid Appellant for services as Recorder, but not for his services to the State as Justice of the Peace. (Bright v. Supervisors of Chenango, 18 Johns. 243; Mallory v. Supervisors, etc. 2 Cow. 531; Double-day v. Supervisors, etc. Id. 532; 4 Bac. Ab. 166; Bouvier Law Dic. Title, Fees and Costs.) As to the constitutional question, although the Appellant was Judge of a Municipal Court, he was more, for he was, virtute officii, also a Justice of the Peace as to criminal cases arising in the city.

R. F. Morrison, District Attorney, for the Respondent.

1. By the act of 1853, a Justice of the Peace, Mayor, or Recorder, can claim compensation in criminal cases, where they have power to render final judgment, only while acting as Examining or Committing Magistrates. (Comp. Laws, 511, Sec. 688.) The services for which compensation is claimed, are not provided for in this section. They were not cases wherein the Recorder was to examine and discharge, or hold the defendants to answer, but cases in which he had final jurisdiction, with power to render judgment of fine and imprisonment. 2. The act of 1855, giving Justices of the Peace three dollars for trying as well as examining each criminal case, does not apply to Recorders. (Wood's Dig. 440, Sec. 17.) 3. The compensation of Recorders is to be fixed by the charter, or when not so fixed, by the government of their respective cities, to be paid by such cities. (Wood's Dig. 156, Sec. 76.) And all fees must be paid to the city. (Wood's Dig. 325, Sec. 695.) Again, the Court of which the Appellant was a Judge, was a Municipal Court, contemplated by the Constitution, and he, being a judicial officer, cannot claim any fees against the county. (Constitution, Art. 6, Secs. 1, 2.)

---

BALDWIN, J. delivered the opinion of the Court—TERRY, C. J. concurring.

The Appellant was Recorder of Sacramento City, and as such, claims that the county is indebted to him for fees due him for convictions made by him of divers criminals, prosecuted under the laws of the State. The only question presented by the record is, whether he is to be considered as a Justice of the Peace in respect to this claim, and is entitled, as if he were, to the fees.

It seems that the charter of the city of Sacramento, (C. L. 966, Sec. 35,) provided that the Recorder "should exercise all the powers of a Justice of the Peace in regard to offenses committed within the city limits, subject to all the rules governing Justices of the Peace, and have power to administer all oaths known to the law."

The general Act, (C. L. 512, Sec. 693,) declares, "The fees allowed to Justices of the Peace, and other officers having the jurisdiction of Justices of the Peace, * * * shall, when the defendant is convicted, be considered and recovered against him as costs in the suit, and be collected in like manner as costs in civil cases." The next section seems to be equally indicative of the legislative construction, that Recorders were embraced within the purview of the statute allowing fees to Justices.

By the Act of the 10th April, 1855, a Justice is allowed a fee of three dollars, for services and proceedings before him in criminal action or proceeding, whether on examination or trial. (Wood's Dig. 452, Sec. 14.)

Curtis v. County of Sacramento.

---

By another Act, (C. L. 728, Sec. 33,) it is provided that where a fee is allowed to one officer, the same fee shall be allowed to the other officers for the performance of the same services when such officers are allowed by law to perform such services, and the compensation is not specifically fixed.

The Act of 1858, (C. L. 511, Sec. 688,) provides "that the magistrate, if he be a Justice of the Peace, or a Mayor, or a City Recorder, may receive for all the proceedings before him to, and including his decision upon, the question of discharging the defendant, or holding him to answer, three dollars; for taking bail after a commitment by another magistrate, one dollar. By section 693, of the Act of 1853, (C. L. 512,) "the fees allowed to Justices of the Peace, and other officers having the jurisdiction and authority of Justices of the Peace, Clerks, Peace Officers, and District Attorneys, shall, when the defendant is convicted, be considered and recovered against him as costs in the suit, and be collected in the same manner as costs in civil cases."

Section 694. "The fees allowed a Sheriff, * * Magistrate, etc. in cases where the defendant is acquitted, or where, being committed, he is unable to pay the costs, shall be county charges, and shall be audited and paid in like manner as other charges against the county."

By Section 695 it is said: "Whenever any officer, except District Attorneys, mentioned in this Act, receives a salary, he shall account for, and pay to the Treasurer of the city of which he is an officer, all fees collected by him under the provisions of this Act."

It is contended that under the 688th Section of this Act, the charge of three dollars could only be made when the defendant was discharged or held to bail, not when he was convicted. We do not so understand it. We can see no reason for such discrimination, which seems, moreover, to be denied by the 694th Section, and the whole Act must be taken together. Nor do the words require so unnatural a construction. The charge was designed to comprehend the fee for all proceedings on the trial, and to leave no room for doubt as to the services comprehended, the words were added, "including his decision upon the question," etc. But these words did not limit the fee to cases in which the decision on discharging or holding to bail was made. The trouble was at least as great for convicting as discharging or bailing, and the charge was to be for the proceedings, however they resulted.

Curtis v. County of Sacramento.

---

The point is made that the Recorder is a judicial officer, and the Constitution inhibits him from taking fees. But we think the Constitution did not contemplate this class of officers as subjects of this inhibition. As a mere subordinate officer of the corporation, to carry into effect its by-laws or ordinances, he is less in dignity than a Justice of the Peace, and cannot be comprehended by a provision which expressly excludes Justices; and we think that the mere addition of the duties of Justices in respect to criminal matters, has no effect in depriving the office of the same qualities in this respect as that of Justice. Besides, as to all this matter, he is really, and in fact, a Justice of the Peace; and the Constitution, when it exempted Justices from the operation of this restraint, meant to exempt all those, by whatever name called, who are intrusted with the duties assigned by the law to those officers.

It is difficult to see why officers of the peace, exercising all the civil and criminal jurisdiction of Justices, should be allowed to take fees, and subordinate officers to Justices should not, when they exercise a portion only of the powers of Justices. Indeed, under the old charter, the Recorder was no more than a Justice of the Peace, administering the local ordinances of a municipal body, except for this addition to the power and dignity of his office, given in the section quoted.

We have no doubt that this is the proper construction of the law. But we do not see that it can be of any substantial benefit to the Appellant. For by Section 695 of the Statute it is expressly provided that the officers mentioned in the Act, (which includes the Recorder,) except District Attorneys, when they receive salaries, shall account for, and pay to the Treasurer of the city, the fees received. The Recorder was a salaried officer of the city. If he received these fees, he held them only in trust for the city, to be paid by him into its treasury. Really, the money belongs to the city, and the officer was only its agent for collection and payment. An ingenious argument has been made by the counsel for Appellant to show that this section does not apply to the fees received by the Recorder as Justice, but only to such fees as he received by virtue of his municipal office. But we see no reason for the distinction. These duties are imposed by the law creating the office; a salary is fixed for the whole services to be rendered; the law makes no qualification, but is general in its terms, those terms embracing in their natural meaning the entire subject. The section is found in the law providing fees for these very services. We see no provision for any fees to be paid to the Recorder except these, and Section 695, expressly exempting one officer, would seem to imply very strongly that none others were to be exempted.

Riddle v. Baker.

The effect of the whole Act is to give this charge in favor of the city against the county, in consideration of the officer paid by the city doing this service for the county. A curious question now arises: What is to become of the indebtedness of the county on this score to the city? The Consolidation Act of 1858 destroys the old city corporation, and vests its rights of property in the consolidated government.

The beneficial right not being in the Appellant, we see no use in remanding the case, for, under the circumstances, it would seem, if he were entitled, at this late day, to receive the money as agent of the old city government or as Trustee for it, the city, through her present representatives, might insist on the right to retain the money, or secure the funds in their own hands. We, therefore, affirm the judgment, without costs to either party.

RIDDLE et als. v. BAKER et als.

An appeal lies from an order setting aside a final decree in equity and granting a rehearing.

To obtain the aid of Chancery to vacate a judgment a party must show that he has exhausted all proper diligence to defend in the suit in which judgment was rendered. If he relies on fraud and deception practised on the Court in managing, procuring, and giving evidence, he must show that, by such practices, he was defrauded of his opportunity to defend, and that his defense would, otherwise, have been effectual.

And the sureties on a bond, given by the party in the original suit, to perform any decree that might be rendered therein stand in no better position. They are not parties to said suit, but are bound absolutely by the decree, subject to the single exception — that, if the decree be procured by collusion between plaintiff, their principal, and the defendant, they are not bound.

The matter relied on in the bill in this case could be availed of only by bill of review, with proper averments.

APPEAL from the Fourth District.

---

Riddle v. Baker.

---

The facts are sufficiently stated in the opinion.

The bill was filed by Bartol, Riddle & Eaton, against Baker, Lockwood, Baldwin & Jenkins. Subsequently, by consent, others were made parties as having some interest in the decree sought to be set aside. Bill prayed an injunction against enforcing the judgment in Baker v. Riddle, and new trial in Baker v. Bartol. Baker demurred, for want of facts to constitute a cause of action, and that the Court had no jurisdiction of the subject of the action. Subsequently he answered, denying the allegations of fraud, etc.

The case was sent to a referee by stipulation, who reported a judgment to the effect that plaintiffs were not entitled to any relief and that the injunction originally granted, restraining defendant, Baker, from enforcing the judgment obtained by him against Riddle and Eaton, be dissolved.

Shafters, Park & Heydenfeldt, for Appellants: 1st. The order granting a new trial was revisable. (Prac. Act, Sec. 187; 6 Cal. 83; 4 Id. 122.) 2d. This suit is an attempt to review a decree of the Supreme Court, which cannot be done without permission of that Court. (Prac. Act, Sec. 358; 3 Cal. 214; 5 Id. 192; 6 Id. 145; Stafford v. Bryan, 2 Paige, 45; Southard et al. v. Russel, 16 How. 576; 8 Cal. 32.)

III. The complaint does not state facts sufficient to justify the relief sought.

This is not an original bill to impeach a decree for fraud; such bill lies only where the party has, by some finesse, been deprived of his day in Court. (3 Barb. 619; 2 Peere Wms. 74.) It is a bill, "not original" to review a decree where the party has had his day in Court. The bill does not ask a new trial on the ground of newly discovered evidence. In such bills the evidence and the names of the witnesses must be stated, with their affidavits annexed. (3 Graham on New Trial; Perry v. Cochran, 1 Cal. 180; Rogers v. Huie, Id. 429.)

No surprise is alleged, nor could there be any, for the complaint, in Baker v. Bartol, averred the goods to be worth forty thousand dollars, giving Bartol full notice that plaintiff, in that suit, would attempt to prove the very point now complained of, to wit: The excessive value put by Lockwood & Baldwin on the goods. (Turner v. Morrison, 11 Cal.) When new trials have been granted in equity, on the ground of surprise at evidence, the evidence has related to some point not definitely raised by the pleadings. (3 Gra. 1531, 962, 967; Smith v. Morrison, 3 A. K. Marsh. 81; Burr v. Palmer, 23 Vt. 254; 6 Cal. 228.)

---

Riddle v. Baker.

---

Affirmatively, the bill claims a new trial on the ground of perjury by subornation. This is no ground, for two reasons: 1st. It is not charged that the witnesses have been convicted of perjury. (3 Gra. 1469, Note; Respass v. McOlanahan, Hard. Ky. 346; Brewer v. Bowman, 3 J. J. Marshall, 493; Attorney-General v. Woodhead, 2 Price, 3, Ex.; Harrison v. Harrison, 9 Id. 34, Ex.; Smith v. Lowey, 1 John. Ch. 330.) 2d. Perjury of the witnesses is no defense to the original suit—Baker v. Bartol. It simply impeaches their credit, and this is no ground for new trial. (16 How. 547; Livingston v. Hubbs, 3 John. Ch. 125.) Again: 3d. It is not averred that the original decree has been performed. (Wise v. Blackly, 2 J. Ch. 490; Williams v. Mellish, 1 Ves. 117; Markly v. Rand, 12 Cal.) 4th. No excuse is given for not moving for a new trial in Baker v. Bartol, or for the non-production of the evidence on the trial of that suit. (3 Gra. D. W. on New Trials, 1485, 1486; Phelps v. Peabody, 7 Cal. 60.)

IV. Interest on the part of the witnesses, Lockwood and Baldwin, is no ground for new trial. (Tovey v. Young, cited in 1 J. Ch. 323; Turner v. Plaite, 1 Term Rep. 717.) Besides, the witnesses were not proved to be interested. (1 Green. Ev. Sec. 390; Ten Eyck, 5 Wend.) Again, the bill does not state, nor does the proof show, any diligence at the trial to test the competency of the witnesses by examination on the voir dire, or by cross-examination. (1 T. R. 717.)

1st. Riddle & Eaton were not parties to the suit of Baker v. Bartol, and consequently are not in a position to ask a review of that decree, so far as the parties are concerned. 2d. They do not ask to review the judgment obtained against them at law, but they ask that, for reasons which came to their knowledge after judgment against them, Baker be enjoined from enforcing that judgment.

Riddle v. Baker.

It is questionable whether, if they had known the facts when the suit was brought against them, they could have set up this defense to an action at law. But the facts were not known to them, and if they had been, they were not obliged to make the defense at law. (Lorraine v. Long, 6 Cal. 452.)

A party has a right to a day in Court; these plaintiffs, Riddle & Eaton, have not had theirs. They are not chargeable with Bartol's laches in the original suit. The plaintiffs were mere sureties for Bartol in the original suit, and only liable as such to the extent of sureties for a receiver, or any other naked surety. They are not bound by the decree against Bartol. They had no opportunity to defend the original suit. They had no power to call witnesses and conduct the trial, and the moment they ascertained the facts they filed their bill. (Carmack et als. v. The Commonwealth, for use of Boggs, 5 Binney, 184; see also McKeller et al. v. Howell & Campbell, 4 Hawks, 34; Douglass v. Howland, 24 Wend. 53, and cases there cited; see cases cited on page 55; also cases cited from Virginia and Ohio; Beall v. Beck, 3 Harr. and McHenry, Md. 242.)

Here was a fraud committed by the obligee upon the obligor of a bond, and it being a fraud practiced upon them when they were not in a position to guard against it, they should be relieved. If Bartol and the plaintiff, in the original suit, had conspired together to fix a false liability upon the sureties, any judgment or decree, rendered in pursuance thereof, would be set aside. Besides, the obligation of the surety would be void, independent of any trial between debtor and creditor. (Pidcock v. Bishop, 3 B. & C. 605, reported in 10 Eng. Com. Law Rep. 276; Stone v. Compton, 5 Bing. N. C. 142; see also Middleton v. Lord Onslow, 1 P. Wms. 768; Cecil v. Plaistow, 1 Anst. 202; Nerot v. Wallace, 3 T. R. 17; Knight v. Hunt, 5 Bing. 142; Jackson v. Mitchell, 13 Ves. 581; Cockshatt v. Bennett, 2 T. R. 768; Jackson v. Lomus, 4 T. R. 166; Stark v. Mawson, 1 Bos. & P. 286. See observations of Buller, J. and Lord Tenterden, C. J. in Jones v. Yates, 9 B. & C. 532; Leicester v. Rose, 4 East, 372, overruling Friz v. Randall, 6 T. R. 146.)

Again: the decree against Bartol did not fix the liability of the sureties. Suppose they had just after the decree against Bartol discovered the fraud they now allege, and had defended

---

Riddle v. Baker.

---

upon that ground, could it have been urged that they were concluded by the decree against Bartol, and because he had been guilty of laches they could not make a defense which was a direct fraud upon them? They undertook only upon the ground that both parties would act in good faith toward them, and the decision against Bartol cannot affect their rights.

Again: this is not a bill of review, and it was not necessary to apply to the Court for leave to file it or show its performance. They were not parties, and could not apply for a review. But it is an original bill filed for the purpose. (Sanford v. Head & Merrill, 5 Cal. 298; 1 Sandf. Ch. 120; Reisal v. Wood, 1 John. Ch. 401; Carneal v. Wilson, 3 Littell, 90; Story's Eq. Pl. Sec. 426; Comyn Dig. Ch. Chap. 2, Vol. 2, p. 36; Id. T. 7, Vol. 2, p. 109; Id. 3 M. Vol. 2, p. 225; Id. 3 N. 1, Vol. 2, p. 229; Id. 3 W. Vol. 2, p. 257; Welsh v. Barrett, 15 Mass. 379.) Per curiam. "A new trial is granted; it appearing that the interest of the witness was not known to the plaintiff until after the trial, and that it was known to the defendant, who produced him." If good at law when discovered while the case is in fieri, why not good in equity when discovered, after the law side of the Court has lost its power to correct the wrong? (Dobson v. Pearce, 2 Ker. N. Y. 156.)

We refer to the following authorities to show that the fraud in procuring a judgment, is not limited to fraud in depriving a party of his day in Court, or indeed to any particular fraudulent contrivance; but, as in all other questions of fraud, depends upon the circumstances of each particular case—the circumstances constituting fraud being as various as are the devices of ingenious and covinous men. (Willard's Eq. 347; 2 Story's Eq. Juris. Secs. 875–877, 880–887; Countess of Gainsborough v. Gifford, 2 Peere Wms. 424; Huggins v. King, 3 Barb. 616; 7 Paige, 451–459; 19 Conn. 84–88; Carneal v. Wilson, 3 Littell, 90; Reed v. Perry, 1 Monroe, 256; Fish v. Lane, 2 Haywood, 342; Ambler v. Wild, 2 Wash. Virg. 36–41; Barnsby v. Powell, 1 Vesey, 289; Chesterfield v. Jansen, 2 Vesey, 155; Mitchell v. Harris, 2 Vesey, Jr. 135; Bradish v. McGee, Ambler, 229; Massell v. Morgan, 3 Brock. C. C. 74; Mitford's Pl. 73, 237, et seq.)

The complaint in this case is not founded on surprise. Neither is the perjury of witnesses, the foundation of our bill.

Riddle v. Baker.

---

False swearing does not necessarily give jurisdiction; but where the truth is suppressed, or a falsehood stated by interested witnesses, acting in concert with the party, and the opposite party, being ignorant of the combination, is injured by such covinous suppression or falsehood, equity will give him relief. Until the fact is ascertained, the subject of the fraud cannot take advantage of it; whenever discovered, the party wronged may ask the aid of equity, and he cannot be guilty of laches, if he makes the appeal upon the first opportunity. It has been said that Bartol had abundant opportunity pending the trial, to have contradicted the witnesses — Lockwood and Baldwin. All that appears on this subject, is the fact that time was given to Bartol to bring forward witnesses, but who can say, that when Lockwood and Baldwin, the Clerks in the establishment, had thus sworn, it was at the time practicable for Bartol to contradict them. The presumption is, that he attempted to do so, but not then having the cue to the true relations of these witnesses, and being ignorant of the conspiracy against him, he was disarmed.

On the hearing the Respondent moved to dismiss the appeal, on the ground that the granting of a rehearing in equity was not the subject of review. The position was conceded, but on the cross-motion to dismiss for want of equity, the whole case was considered. Without discussing the question we still insist that the appeal must be dismissed for the cause assigned, and again refer to the decision of this Court in Gray v. Eaton, (5 Cal. 448); Dominguez v. Dominguez, (7 Id. 426); Still v. Saunders, (8 Id. 286.) It was within the discretion of the Court below to grant a rehearing, either upon petition, or of its own motion. The rule in equity is, that the cause shall go to final decree before review on appeal.

Shafters, Park & Heydenfeldt, in reply:

The bill is a bill of review. The amended bill asks for a new trial in terms. It seems to be conceded that if Bartol was the sole plaintiff, no relief would be due him on the facts alleged, other than a review in the original suit. The question then is, does the fact that Riddle & Eaton have joined in the suit because they are debtors in a dependent judgment, enlarge the right of Bartol as against the principal judgment? The question suggests its own answer. The dependent judgment neither adds to, nor detracts from, the strength of the principal judgment. It gives to the alleged perjury of Lockwood and Baldwin no additional point, either in law or morals. If the perjury assigned, in itself considered, is a ground merely for new trial, it can make no difference whether the relief on the basis of it is asked by one or a dozen plaintiffs. The reasoning upon the other side, goes upon the assumption that the plaintiffs, Riddle & Eaton, have an equity distinct from the equity of Bartol, and personal to themselves. But they unite with Bartol in asking that that judgment be reviewed, and a new trial granted on the ground of the perjury alleged in procuring it. The question made is controlled by the maxim accessorium non ducit sequitur suum principale. Riddle & Eaton count on Bartol's right — they claim through him, and they are affected with his laches, they take him cum onere, and they can claim no relief except such as can be claimed by him, viz: a review. Sureties in replevin and attachment bonds, and in bonds like that given by Riddle & Eaton, are bound by judgments rendered against their principals. We cannot reason from one class of surety contracts to another. Every contract is to be enforced according to its own terms. By the contract of Riddle & Eaton, they agreed to respond, personally, to any judgment that might be obtained against Bartol. When such judgment was obtained, the casus faderis had arisen.

Riddle v. Baker.

This bill contains no charge of collusion between Baker and Bartol; so that Douglass v. Howland, (24 Wend. 53,) has no application. So of the other cases cited. The bonds there were not to pay any judgment that might be rendered; but that, if the officer should be guilty of neglect, the sureties would pay all damages, etc.

BALDWIN, J. delivered the opinion of the Court — TERRY, C. J. concurring.

A preliminary motion is made by Respondent to dismiss this appeal. The ground is, that the order appealed from is not a final judgment or order, disposing of the merits of the case, but is only a rehearing in equity, which is not appealable matter,

---

Riddle v. Baker.

---

A decree, final in form and effect, was entered for the Appellants on the coming in of the referee's report; and this decree was, on motion of the Respondents, set aside. The effect of this order was to give the Respondents a new trial. There is no substantial difference between a rehearing in an equity case which opens a decree and places the case before the Court for trial de novo, and a new trial in a case at law, tried and decided by the Court. The mode of trial is the same, and the effect of the order the same in both cases.

For convenience and uniformity, we have held that the Practice Act, regulating proceedings in civil cases, applies as a general rule, as well to equity as common law suits. The statute gives a right of appeal from orders granting or overruling motions for new trials; and this is substantially, if not literally, such a motion.

The questions involved in this dispute grow out of this state of facts: Cronin & Markley, once merchants of San Francisco, in 1851 made an assignment of goods to Bartol & McVickar; the assignors owed one Pendleton; he assigned his claim to one Baker, defendant in this suit, who held for himself and one Jenkins. Baker, in 1854, filed his bill against Bartol — McVickar then being dead — charging fraud in the assignment, and that these assignees had received over thirty thousand dollars from the assigned property — goods — over and above all incumbrances, etc. which sum, it is charged, was, or should be, subject to the claim of the plaintiff. This claim had been reduced to judgment. Bill prayed appointment of receivers. The Court, by its order, directed Bartol to submit to the appointment of a receiver, or to give bond to perform any decree that might be rendered against him. Bartol gave the bond, and plaintiffs here, Riddle & Eaton, were his sureties. This case was tried in November, 1855. Lockwood and Baldwin were witnesses on the trial, and swore for the plaintiffs, fixing, by their testimony, the value of the goods assigned at forty thousand dollars. The case was decided for plaintiffs. Defendants appealed to Supreme Court; decree affirmed. (See 6 Cal. 483.) No stay of proceedings was had, and Baker, soon after the decree, sued Riddle & Eaton on their bond; got judgment. Case appealed to Supreme Court; judgment there affirmed. (7 Cal. 551.) After this affirmance the plaintiffs filed this bill, alleging that the decree was obtained on the testimony of these two witnesses, Lockwood and Baldwin; that this decree was procured by conspiracy, fraud, and perjury; that the defendants secretly conspired together to obtain the decree, well knowing that there was no legal or equitable foundation for the same; that fraud, deception, and imposition, were practiced upon the Superior Court in the managing, procuring, and giving, the evidence upon which the decree was obtained; and, in this connection, the plaintiffs allege some facts not material, as to the manner of the obtaining of this claim by Baker; then that Jenkins, Lockwood, and Baldwin, were Clerks of Cronin & Markley; that they were to get, for being witnesses, a part of the recovery; that they were to swear falsely to the value of the goods; that they did so swear; that a judgment was obtained on their testimony; and that the plaintiffs only knew of these facts after the judgment was affirmed in the Superior Court on the bond. The bill prays for an injunction.

Several very formidable points of exception are taken by the defendants to this proceeding—to some of which it has vexed the characteristic ingenuity of the counsel for the Respondent to give a plausible answer. But it is not necessary to consider these questions, as, in our judgment, another point, arising on the proofs, is clearly fatal to the whole case.

Upon the trial of the case of Baker v. Bartol, before Judge Shattuck, these facts appear: That the case was continued several times at request of defendant; when called for trial and the evidence closed on the part of the plaintiff the defendants procured a postponement to get in evidence; after this period elapsed, and the defendant not appearing, one or more adjournments were had before Bartol arrived; when he arrived he said that he had evidence which would explain and contradict the evidence that had been introduced by the plaintiff, and that he must have it there; the case was again adjourned. No such evidence, after all these delays, was procured, and the case was decided after being fully argued.

It seems that the only matter of controversy was the value of these goods. There appears to have been no insuperable difficulty to procuring full proofs on this subject, for, even on the trial of this suit below, occurring a long time after the first, various witnesses, who seem to have had knowledge on the subject, gave testimony in respect to the value, and their estimates differ very much as to what that value was. Lockwood and Baldwin were not examined on their voir dire, or otherwise, as to their interest, nor was any attempt made to discredit them. The question arises on this state of facts: Could Bartol, under the circumstances, at this late day, after all the litigation and all these opportunities for litigating these questions, file a bill to set aside the decree thus rendered and thus affirmed on the ground of fraud recently discovered, as to the mode or circumstances in which the testimony was procured against him on the trial? We are at a loss to see upon what principle. Chancery would only interpose to vacate a solemn judgment (alleged only to be wrong in part, too,) upon the ground of irreparable injury done to a party who had no other means of relief against it. But a party, to obtain the aid of Chancery must show that he has exhausted all proper diligence to defend at law, or to defend in Chancery if the first suit was in that form. The fraud or practices of the other party are no excuse to him for not attempting to counteract them. He must show that he was defrauded of his opportunity to defend, and that his defense, which, but for the practices of his adversary, would have been effectual, was, by such practices, rendered unavailing.

Riddle v. Baker.

To hold that a party may stand by, and, discovering improper practices, or illegitimate arts, in the management or conduct of his case by his antagonist, neglect to countervail them when in his power, or when he sees incorrect or even perjured testimony offered, refuse to go further with the case, and then rely upon the fact that this course has been pursued as a ground for avoiding the judgment, would make litigation perpetual. The very object of a trial is, to afford each party an opportunity of contesting fully all the proofs and all the principles of law relied on by the other side; and if false testimony be introduced, it must be met and combatted, when that is practicable, at the trial, or as soon after as possible — if the falsity is not, and could not, with all proper diligence, be discovered before. In this case no such efforts appear to have been made. The defendant, Bartol, had full notice by the pleadings of what was alleged and what would be attempted to be proven against him. The issue of fact was extremely simple. It involved the value of certain goods. The knowledge of this value did not lie exclusively with the plaintiffs' witnesses. By the showing made years afterwards, it appears that evidence on this subject could have been obtained from other sources. These assignors were merchants, whose business and stock were known to their customers and to their competitors in trade. The Court extended unusual liberality and indulgence to the defendant. Long delays intervened after he was fully apprised of the precise case made against him. He did not even cross-examine the plaintiffs' witnesses as to their relations to the case; nor did he seek to contradict them by other proofs. The case was tried and decided — appealed, and decided again. That, upon these facts, the defendant could not, if, under any circumstances he could, have filed a bill like this to vacate this affirmed judgment, can scarcely be contended. The ready answer to his application would be, that he had not done all he could to avoid that which he now, without such efforts, seeks to annul. Indeed, this matter would not be sufficient ground for a motion for a new trial, for newly discovered evidence, in an ordinary case.

Riddle v. Baker.

---

But it is urged that these plaintiffs, his sureties, to answer the decree, stand on better ground. We do not think so. We admit, that if there had been collusion between Bartol and the plaintiffs to get and suffer this judgment, the case might, and probably would, be different. But there is no pretense of such collusion. It has been observed that the obligation of these sureties is to answer the decree of the Superior Court. The decree was for the payment of the money sued for. They contested their obligation in the Court below, and lost the case, and then, on appeal, lost it again.

There liability was collateral to the main suit; but it was made by the terms of their obligation to depend upon its issue. They were not parties to the original litigation, any more than a surety on appeal is a party to the suit in the Appellate Court. They had no rights in Court as contesting parties. They assumed the responsibility of a contestation by other parties, and of the result of a controversy which they could not control. If the suit were mismanaged, if — for example, not otherwise — incompetent counsel had been employed, if the defendant neglected or made default, or mismanaged his case, they had no right to retry it, or to deny the obligations of their undertaking. They chose, in plain language, absolutely to bind themselves in a given event; the event happened, and they are charged. To hold otherwise would be to hold that the surety in an appeal bond or undertaking, could demand a retrial of everything tried in the suit, or, what is the same thing, in effect, that a party giving such an obligation, could, in the name of the surety, hold himself practically absolved from the judgment, at least, without further trial. It would be the interest of a party to make mistakes and be guilty of negligence, since this would afford a pretext for opening the judgment and trying anew the suit decided against him. In order to hold so dangerous a doctrine, we would have to interpolate new conditions in the bond, and to expunge the terms therein written. We think the surety in such a bond stands in the shoes of his principal, so far as the definitive force of the judgment is concerned, subject to the single exception, that if the judgment be procured by collusion between the plaintiff and defendant, he is not bound.

Several other points we think equally fatal to the Respondents; but this one is enough. We think that the matter relied on in the bill could only be availed of by way of bill of review, and that this bill is fatally defective as such. But it is not necessary to elaborate this point, or to refer to any others; for what we have said is conclusive of the merits.

The order granting the new trial is reversed, and the decree dismissing the bill reinstated.

Ordered accordingly.

BENSLEY et al. v. THE MOUNTAIN LAKE WATER COMPANY.

WHERE a bill avers that plaintiffs are the owners, and in possession of a tract of land, that defendants are insolvent and threaten to, and will, enter upon said land, and, by excavations, embankments, and diverting valuable springs and streams thereon, despoil it of the substance of the inheritance, and create a cloud upon plaintiffs' title, injunction lies.
Before private property, condemned for public use, can be taken from the owner, just compensation must be paid or secured to him.

---

Bensley v. The Mountain Lake Water Company.

---

- A party, after procuring an order for the condemnation of property to public use, cannot lay by for four years without complying at all with those requirements of the proceeding which are of service to the owner, and then without notice, give effect to the previous and initiatory acts, through which he derails his title.
- He who relies for title upon an extraordinary mode of acquisition given him, not by the will of the owner, expressed or implied, but against his will and by the mandate of the law, must show strict compliance with those statutory rules from which his title accrues.
- No title, nor any right of possession, comes from the mere condemnation of private property for public use. Just compensation actually made, or secured according to law, is a condition precedent.
- And such compensation must be made within a short period, or the privilege of taking the property under the condemnation will be deemed abandoned.
- A bona fide purchaser of land, without notice of proceedings pending for its condemnation, at the time of purchase, no notice of lis pendens being filed, is not affected by the proceedings.

APPEAL from the Fourth District.

The case is sufficiently stated in the opinion of the Court.

The Court below first granted a preliminary injunction restraining the Sheriff from putting defendants in possession of the premises in dispute under the order or judgment of June 29th, 1857; and further ordering, that, if the Sheriff had already executed the writ of possession, the defendants should surrender the premises to plaintiffs.

The bill was filed on the 8th day of August; defendants entered on that day, and the injunction being served, the premises were surrendered to plaintiffs.

At the hearing the injunction was made perpetual, and the order of June 29th, 1857, vacated. The injunction issued against plaintiffs was dissolved. Defendant appeals.

Thos. C. Hambly and Elisha Cook, for Appellant.

1. The decree of Court adjudging to us the land was conclusive upon plaintiffs, because made on notice to them. Notice of this proceeding was made upon Holland, the Attorney on record of Emerson. Notice to one was notice to both tenants in common. (5 Esp. N. P. Cases, 196.) Notice to one is deemed evidence that it reached the other, (7 East, 155.) so that it must be inferred that his notice reached and included Bensley as well as Perkins. In such a case no lis pendens could legally be filed; this was not a proceeding which affected the "title," only the possession of the land; as it is only when the money is to be distributed that any question of ownership arises. The sole counsel for the company on record was William G. Wood, and George C. Bates appeared there adversely to the company and for the city of San Francisco, and others who were claiming the land as against the Mountain Lake Water Company. 2. The dismissal order was made on the application of Bates, who had no authority, and had this order been made "in the matter of the Mountain Lake Water Company," instead of the other suit, it would not have discontinued it. But, further, this order of the Judge, so far as discontinuance goes, is wholly extrajudicial and of no effect. He had no right to embody any such language in the order. 3. The withdrawal of the money from Court would not dismiss the proceeding. The possession of the property does not depend upon the payment of the money. The petition, survey, and report of the jury, give the possession, and not the payment of the money; therefore, the withdrawal of the money would not dismiss the proceeding; to do that they must appear clearly the intention. (Bloodgood v. Mohawk & Hudson Railroad, 14 Wend. 51; Lovering v. The Philadelphia, Germantown, and Norristown Railroad, 8 Watts & Serg. 459; The Borough of Harrisburg v. Crangle, 3 Watts & Serg. 460; Acts 1850, Secs. 17, 18; Davidson v. The Boston and Maine Railroad Company, 3 Cushing, 92.) 4. There never was any abandonment. Abandonment is a question of fact for the jury. (Whitcomb v. Hoyt, 6 Casey's Penn. 411; Hurd v. Curtis, 7 Met. 94; Arnold v. Stevens, 24 Pick. 106; 14 Eng. L. & Eq. 412; Heath v. Biddle, 9 Barr, 273; Wilson v. Watterson, 4 Id. 214; Pickard v. Bailey, 6 Foster, N. H. 166.) 5. Injunction does not lie. (14 Ohio, 353; 5 Geo. 576.)

McDougal & Sharp, also, for Appellant, said: If the effect of the order of December, 1853, be as contended for, it involves the following positions as true: 1st. That a Court, of its own motion, may dismiss proceedings of this kind without notice to the corporation, and without its being represented. 2d. That an order made in one suit or proceeding may operate an efficient order or judgment in another, between different parties. 3d. That an Attorney of an adversary interest may control the right to which he is antagonistic, by his own suggestion.

The question of abandonment is one of law. There is no foundation here for this pretense, as the amount of work done and the one hundred and fifty-thousand dollars expended, show.

Bensley v. The Mountain Lake Water Company.

---

Shafters, Park & Heydenfeldt, for Respondent.

There are four grounds, upon either or all of which the jurisdiction of a Court of Equity to grant the relief prayed for may be maintained:

1. Considering the plaintiffs as parties in possession, and further considering that the trespasses contemplated and threatened, were in legal contemplation irreparable in damages, and further, considering that the defendants were insolvent, we have a case within the equity jurisdiction. (Merced Mining Company v. Fremont, 7 Cal. 317, and the cases there cited.)

2. A Court of Equity has jurisdiction to restrain railway companies, and other like corporations, from entering upon and appropriating private lands, where there has not been a full and exact compliance with all the conditions made by the statute prerequisite to the right. Here, it is true, the purpose was not to do irreparable damage by cutting down, or digging out and carrying away, things which are deemed of the substance of the inheritance; but the purpose was more comprehensive, viz: the dispossession of the citizen from the whole of his inheritance, and a definitive appropriation of it by the corporation to its own use. (Stone v. The Commercial Railway Company, 18 Eng. Chan. 122; Agas v. Regent's Canal Co. Coop. 77; River Dan Navigation Co. v. North Midland Railway Co. 1 Railw. Cases, 153, 154, and in Kemp v. London and Brighton Railway, 1 Id. 504; Bonaparte v. The Camden and Amboy R. R. Co. 1 Bald. C. C. 232.)

3. The defendant company were claiming title to the land by virtue of certain judicial proceedings terminating in the judgment of June 29th, 1857. The plaintiffs as owners and possessors for the period of more than four years, were in a position to test the validity of that judgment by proceedings in Chancery, and on the well understood principle of quia timet.

4. Courts of Equity have jurisdiction to set aside judgments and decrees where the Courts by which they were rendered have exceeded their jurisdiction, or where the judgment was procured by fraud upon the jurisdiction, or upon the res, if the proceeding was in rem or quasi in rem, or where it takes on the character of what is popularly known by the name of a "snap judgment." (Sto. Eq. Pl. Sec. 426.)

But the general question, in which all others center, is: Did

---

Bensley v. The Mountain Lake Water Company.

---

the company at the filing of the bill, have a then subsisting right of entry on the "Emerson Tract," derived from the judicial proceedings manifested in the pleadings and proofs, and under which alone the defendants claim?

1. If the proceedings were regular so far as they went, then it is insisted that they were dismissed by the Court on the 17th of Dec. 1853, while they were yet inchoate—the final "rule" spoken of in the Act of 1851, not at that time having been entered up and recorded in the office of the County Recorder.

2. But if the order of December 17th, 1853, did not work a dismissal of the proceedings in condemnation, then it is insisted that on that day, or thereafter, and before the final order, taken June 29th, 1857, the proceedings were voluntarily abandoned by the company. The point is made that "abandonment" is a question of fact. In some of the cases it has been so treated, and in others it has been treated as a question of law. But there is a distinction that harmonizes all the cases, and which is in fact recognized by them all. Where the evidence is in conflict, or if not in conflict, if the facts proved or given are ambiguous or indecisive, the question is for the jury under instructions. But if the facts proved or given are clear, uniform, and decisive, and are on the principles of right reason wholly incompatible with the truth of any other hypothesis than that of abandonment, the question then becomes one of legal conclusion. But so far as this case is concerned, it matters little whether it is treated under the one aspect or the other. We are in chancery, and the facts as well as the law are alike with the Court. (Green et al. v. Covillaud et als. 10 Cal. 317. On the general question of abandonment we cite Van Loan v. Kline, 10 John. 180; French v. The Braintree Man. Co. 23 Pick. 216; Phillips v. Shaffer, 5 Serg. & R. 214; Davis v. Butler, 6 Cal. 510.)

3. That payment of the money assessed as damages for the land is a condition precedent to the right to take possession. (See Constitution of the State of California, Art. 1, Sec. 8; San Francisco v. Scott, 4 Cal. 114; McCann v. Sierra Co. 7 Id. 121; and McCauley v. Weller, 12 Id. 500.)

4. Or if the appropriation was successful and valid as against Emerson, then it is insisted that it is at least invalid as against the plaintiffs, his successors in the title, because they are bona fide purchasers, without notice of the proceedings. It is charged in the complaint that there was no lis pendens filed, and the answer admits it. Emerson deeded the whole tract to Perkins, October 22d, 1860. Perkins conveyed two-thirds undivided to Bensley & Wright, May 16th, 1854. Both of these conveyances are alleged, and neither of them is denied. It is alleged that both deeds were on valuable consideration, and that averment is not denied. The matter of the Mountain Lake Water Company presented a case fully within the terms of the Practice Act, Sec. 27. The action "affected the title to real property," and no lis pendens having been filed, "the pendency of the action was not constructive notice to a subsequent incumbrancer or purchaser." No notice, in fact, is proved by the defense.

---

Bensley v. The Mountain Lake Water Company.

---

It is no answer to the objection now under consideration that the proceeding was in rem. It was an action "affecting the title to real estate," and, therefore, notice of lis pendens was due to third persons, even though it was in rem. But the argument proves too much, for all actions affecting the title to real property are in rem or quasi in rem — more in rem than they are in personam, and hardly in personam at all, except it be in the matter of damages and costs. The result of the reasoning is an utter nullification of the statute.

There may be a distinction taken, perhaps, between actions brought to vindicate an existing title to real estate (Practice Act, Sec. 263) and actions brought to perfect or transfer, or create such title, as in cases of foreclosure, partition, or condemnation, as here. In this last class of cases that notice of lis pendens is necessary in order that bona fide purchasers may be bound, there can be no question. True, there is no such provision in the Act of 1851, but it is found in the general rule. (Practice Act, Sec. 27.)

As to the objection that defendants were put in possession by the Sheriff under the order of August, 1857, and that the Court could not dispossess them by preliminary injunction, we say: 1. If the company had acquired the possession of the premises without judicial intervention, by their own unaided act, there might be doubt as to the power of a Court of Equity to turn them out by injunction, though there would be none as to its power to restrain them from committing waste or doing irre-

---

Bensley v. The Mountain Lake Water Company.

---

parable damage while in. But if we are right in our main positions, or right in any of them, the first usurpation of judicial power is found in the order turning us out and putting the company in, and the victims in that first usurpation may well oppose it to the complainings of the alleged victims in the second. The possession, which they wrested from us under color of judicial proceedings, was of four years' standing. It had been peaceable; obtained by contract and conveyance from Emerson, whom the company have accredited as the owner of the title. 2. But there are cases in which a Court of Equity has power to compel a party to surrender possession of land. (Champion v. Brown, 6 Johns. Chan. 401.) It has it, or it has not. If it has it, and can turn us out now by virtue of it, even if the main question of right is with the plaintiffs, as defendants seem to claim, then the Court below had the same power by parity, and did not misapply it in foreing the company to surrender. But if the Court below did not have the power to expel the defendants, then this Court cannot have the power to expel the plaintiffs, but must leave the defendants to their remedy at law by ejectment. But should the Court enjoin us to evacuate, still if the Court holds that the plaintiffs are in the right on the principal questions presented by the case, the defendants should be restrained from committing any waste or damage on the premises. Besides, defendants should have appealed from the order. (Practice Act, Sec. 336.)

BALDWIN, J. delivered the opinion of the Court — TERRY, C. J. concurring.

The plaintiffs below, Respondents here, filed this bill, averring that they are the owners of certain lands, lying in San Francisco County, and situate at the mouth of Lobos Creek; that their title comes from one Emerson, who originally held the same, and that the plaintiffs have jointly possessed these lands since the 16th day of May, 1854; that the defendants, on the 29th day of June, 1857, obtained an order or judgment in the Fourth District Court, for the condemnation of these lands for the use of defendants. It is alleged that this judgment of condemnation is void, or should be so declared. The plaintiffs say that this judgment was irregular, and they assign the particular grounds, which, they say, avoid it. They aver that the proceedings were dismissed before this final order, thus assailed, was made; that they were voluntarily abandoned before this time; and the bill charges that the company threaten to enter under the order, that they will, unless prevented, proceed to make excavations, embankments, and structures, on the land, and divert valuable springs and streams thereon, and that the company, and Scannell, the Sheriff, acting under the order, are insolvent. An injunction was granted, according to the prayer of the bill. The plaintiffs claim to be in possession, and they assert, as the natural consequences of the act they seek to enjoin, besides that a cloud upon their title is created, irreparable injury, by insolvent persons entering upon their property and despoiling it of the substance of the inheritance. They say that this is an irreparable damage, and that the remedial principle of equity jurisprudence, which makes this a matter of chancery jurisdiction, applies in full force to such a case. If this state of facts be maintained, there seems to be no doubt in reason and on authority of the propriety of the equitable interference. (See Stone v. Commercial R. R. Co. 18 Eng. Chan. 122; Agas v. Regent's Canal Co., Cooper, 77; Bonaparte v. The Camden and Amboy R. R. Co. 1 Bald. C. C. 232.)

---

---

It is necessary to a proper understanding of the questions involved in this issue, to consider the facts shown by the record. That the title to this property was in Emerson is conceded; for the defendants claim to have a right of entry by virtue of proceedings condemning it as his. The only question, then, is whether they have so proceeded as to subject it legally to their use or dominion. It is not necessary to question the right of the State Government, by virtue of its eminent domain, to take private property for public use in an authorized manner, nor, as a corollary or consequence of this general governmental power, to authorize its agents, whether corporate bodies or individual, to exercise this high sovereign prerogative. But it is just as indisputable that this right can only be exercised in pursuance of law, and in conformity to the Constitution. A citizen is entitled to hold his property free of any interference, except through the taxing power, from the government, or his fellow — subject to this one qualification — that when it is necessary for the purposes of the public, it may be taken from him, provided the government so taking, or authorizing others to take it, shall make the owner just compensation; which must be paid or secured to him before he is deprived of his possession. This has been decided in many cases, and recently by this Court in the case of McCauley v. Weller, 12 Cal. 500.

The defendant in this case is a corporation organized under the Act of April 22, 1850, for the purpose of introducing fresh water into the city of San Francisco, from the Mountain Lake, situated in the vicinity of the city. One Merrifield was authorized by a city ordinance to introduce the waters of the Lake into the city for the period of twenty-five years ensuing the first day of January, 1853, and by that day the work was to be done. Afterwards, Merrifield assigned his rights to this company. The city authorities extended the period for the completion of this work from time to time, until September, 1857. After this time, it is charged in the bill, and not denied, that the work, not having been completed, the Board of Supervisors passed a resolution declaring the privileges at an end.

On the 15th of June, 1853, the company filed a petition in the Fourth District Court, to condemn the lands in question. Commissioners were appointed, June 24, 1853, who reported August 23, 1853, as to the value of the lands — among others, that the land of Emerson was worth, with crops, etc. $3,000.

On December 25th, 1856, the company, without notice to the plaintiffs, procured an order confirming the report of 1853. On the 29th of June, 1857, without notice to plaintiffs, the company procured a final order or judgment condemning the lands, and directing that defendants should be let in possession on payment of the three thousand dollars. Emerson was once the owner and in possession of a part of the lands sought to be condemned — this being that in dispute here. Perkins and Bensley, claiming through Emerson, have possessed the land jointly since October, 1853.

Before this final judgment of confirmation, viz: on 17th of December, 1853, an order was entered on the minutes of the Fourth District Court, reciting, that it appeared to the Court, that said company did not intend further to proceed to obtain possession of the lands named in their petition, and dismissing the action; and it is charged in the bill, and not denied, that, on the same day, the company withdrew the deposits of money theretofore made with the Clerk of the Court for the payment of the assessed damages, and, also, the collaterals deposited with the Clerk by the company, for the securing of the damages.

Some question is made as to the authority by which this order was made, and, also, whether it were made in or for this proceeding; but we regard these questions as not very important. It is very certain that the money paid into Court as damages for the land comprehended these three thousand dollars assessed by the Commissioners, for Emerson's land. It is just as certain that this money was received by the executive officer, or with the approbation of this officer of the company, and with knowledge of the source and authority of the repayment. Nearly four years passed without any action to restore the money, or further steps being taken to give effect to the appropriation of this property, or to perfect the title. The question then is, whether a party, knowing of an order purporting to show an abandonment of proceedings, for the condemnation of property, and giving effect to it by receiving benefits and advantages accruing through such order, can, after the lapse of several years, be heard to allege that such an order was unauthorized, and the fact it recites untrue. But to steer clear of any disputed facts, the broader question may be made, whether the party, after procuring an order for the condemnation of property, to public use, can lay by for four years without complying at all with those requirements of the proceeding which are of service to the owner, and then without notice give effect to the previous and initiatory acts, through which he deraigns his title. This statutory power of taking property from the owner, without his consent, is one of the most delicate exercises of governmental authority. It is to be watched and guarded with jealous scrutiny. Important as the power may be to the government, the inviolable sanctity, which all free constitutions attach to the rights of property of the citizen, constrains the strict observance of the substantial provisions of law, which are prescribed as modes of the exercise of the power, and to protect it from abuse. All statutory modes of divesting titles are strictly construed, and to be strictly followed. He who relies for a title upon an extraordinary mode of acquisition given him, not by the will of the owner, expressed or implied, but against his will and by the mandate of the law, must show for his warrant a strict compliance with those statutory rules from which his title accrues. Accordingly, all tax laws are construed rigidly, and must be closely followed, in order to divest or vest title. It would be strange if a petty charge could not be laid upon property for its protection and the support of government, without strictly following the laws imposing the tax, and yet the whole property be taken by the law in fee and forever, without this same strict observance of legal rules. No Court has gone further than this in the doctrines asserted upon this subject, giving this salutary protection to private rights. (See 7 Cal. 4; McCauley v. Weller, 12 Cal. 500.)

Bensley v. The Mountain Lake Water Company.

---

It is a mistake to suppose that any title comes from mere appropriation of another's property, or from the taking of the legal proceeding to condemn it. The Constitution is express. Private property shall not be taken for public use without compensation. The compensation precedes the title. The compensation must be adequate. But adequate—when? Of course, when the property is so taken. The right to take on the terms adjudicated—which is a compulsory statutory sale—accrues from the legal proceedings—the petition—the report—the confirmation; then the price becomes fixed. But no right of entry—much less a title—accrues so far. The party condemning, the representative of a State, is then in a condition to be a purchaser; the other party is in a situation of a vendor making an agreement of sale on condition precedent, but retaining his title and possession until payment. The property is rated according to its cash value; the money is expected to be paid at once or within a short period. It cannot be pretended that a party thus trading with another without this latter's consent, can also fix the terms of the payment, any more as to time of payment than as to price. If this were so, all an insolvent company, having this right, need do, would be to condemn property prospectively valuable, and wait for years, until the property quadrupled its value, and then claim it under its first valuation. Even in respect to executory agreements, we held in Green v. Covilland, (10 Cal. 317) as had been held before, that the party seeking an enforcement of a contract of sale of real estate must be prompt in the compliance with his obligations, and that a delay of payment — in that case of twenty-two months — unexplained, was fatal to his right to enforce the contract. The rule in such a case as that cannot be more strict than in this.

Benaley v. The Mountain Lake Water Company.

---

If we were to hold that by force of these proceedings, in 1853, this company had a right to wait until 1857, and then insist upon giving them effect, we must necessarily hold that the property condemned need not be paid for according to its valuation or real value in 1857, the time when really taken, but may, in effect, be paid for according to its assessed value in 1853, when proceedings were first instituted, and be paid for, not in cash, but on four years' credit, without security. Nay, more, that it might be taken at the mere option of the company, without any sort of obligation on their part to take it, if they chose to decline, as, possibly, they might, if it deteriorated in value. It would be a unilateral contract, binding one party, but not binding the other; and, translated into plain English, would mean: "If we (the company) choose, we will take your (Emerson's) land four years hence, by paying for it what is now assessed as its value. You are to keep it for us, and not sell it, for all that time; but if it declines in value or we do not choose to take it, we will not do so." No sane man, if left to his volition, would make such a trade, and we think we have shown that the law is not so unjust or arbitrary as to make such a bargain for a citizen when it subjects him to its power.

The report and assessment of the Commissioners are only effectual to fix a price for the property, for the purpose of enabling the company to take it at that price at the time of, or within a short period after, the assessment and the confirmation of the report. To entitle the company to take the property on those terms they must avail themselves of the privilege within the proper time. The lapse of a reasonable time without availing themselves of the privileges was itself an abandonment of all claim to it. To say the very least, when a year had passed and no offer made, the proceedings were effectually discontinued. The assessment had become functus officio; just as if an offer had been made to the company by Emerson to take the property at a price agreed on, and no answer had been made by the company for that period. The company had no right in 1857 to revive the old initiatory proceedings of 1853, and claim to give effect to the attempted condemnation of the latter year. The payment of the money to the Clerk, and its subsequent withdrawal, left things where they were before the payment. A payment which, by the act of the party, is ineffectual, is, in law, no payment at all.

---

The argument which opposes these views is, that, by the mere fact of condemnation, a right of entry and possession accrued to this company without any payment or provision of payment, and several authorities from other States are cited to sustain this proposition. Perhaps it is a sufficient answer to state that, by the very terms of the order of 1857, possession was not to be taken except upon or until after payment. The authorities cited rest upon peculiar statutes or constitutional provisions of the States in which the cases were decided. There is nothing in the legislation of this State which gives any right of possession until the compensation is made, nor, if we may indicate our ideas of policy, should there be in any State. To all just ideas of individual rights there can be no doctrine more abhorrent than the notion that any free government had delegated to a private corporation a right to go upon the lands of a citizen and dispossess him of his freehold, and coolly inform him that after a while it will remunerate him for his property when it finds it convenient to pay him; but, in the meantime, he must content himself with being disseized and rely upon the faith and ability of the disseizor to make him reparation. (See 18 Wend. 9; 3 How. Misc. 240.)

2. It is said, too, that the company denies that Emerson has any title. If this be so, why was he made a party, and why are not only himself but his successors in interest sought to be affected by these proceedings? Why, at this late day, is the amount of damages assessed in 1853, offered to be paid to him or them? But is not possession in 1853, by Emerson, and subsequent deeds to, and possession under, them by his vendees, evidence of title as against those pretending to none, except through these proceedings against him?

We have held, upon the soundest authority, that the compensation must be first tendered or paid, or at least, satisfactorily provided, before any right to the property can be acquired, or any right of possession destroyed. And if isolated instances of departure from these conservative principles could be found, we should certainly regard them rather as warnings than as examples. But we feel confident that no well considered case can be cited which holds that, under a statute similar to our own, a corporation may take possession of a man's property, and put him off with a mere promise or undertaking that it will afterwards pay him for it. The authorities are all collected in the excellent work of Mr. Smith on Const. and Stat. Constr. 476, et seq. and the conclusion of the author is as we have given it.

---

Bensley v. The Mountain Lake Water Company.

---

3. Equally fatal is the other point — that the property had changed hands since the commencement of these proceedings; and that, so far as appears, these plaintiffs were purchasers without notice of any claim to the land on the part of the defendant, who had filed no lis pendens, and had by its conduct induced the idea that it had abandoned this attempted condemnation of the land. A notice of dismissal of the proceedings certainly was no notice of the existence of the claim.

Decree affirmed.

On petition for rehearing, the following opinion was delivered by BALDWIN, J. — TERRY, C. J. concurring:

The petition for a rehearing reviews several portions of the opinion, which constitute but little, if any, part of the controlling reasons of the conclusion. We attached no importance to the action of the Board of Supervisors, though their action was stated as one of the facts in the case.

We supposed, that, as the Commissioners assessed to Emerson three thousand dollars, for land in his possession and injury to the crops, and these three thousand dollars were alleged to have been paid into the Court, we might assume that the title was recognized to be in the tenant in possession, to or for whom compensation for the land was proposed to be made by the defendant.

When we spoke of notice to the plaintiffs, we spoke of legal notice — not of loose conversation on the street or elsewhere. If any notice is required to give effect to judicial proceedings, it is notice in that authentic shape which binds parties to the result of a judicial inquiry.

Bensley v. The Mountain Lake Water Company.

---

We supposed, too, when a man deposits so large a sum as three thousand dollars in Court, that he is, of course, to be considered as aware of the fact that he has deposited it, and if it be withdrawn by order of Court that he knows of the withdrawal; and that it must be presumed, if nothing more is heard of the money for four years, when he makes another tender of the same sum, that he has received back the money first deposited; and, especially, if he does not deny a specific allegation that he did withdraw it, that this presumption is conclusive.

The main principle upon which we went in the opinion is this: that, after proceedings for a condemnation, which proceedings result in an assessment of damages, the money must, within a reasonable time, be paid or deposited; and if four years intervene before such an act is done, the proceedings must be held to be discontinued; and that a deposit does not mean merely formally putting the money into Court and then withdrawing it.

That a party is not bound to wait, after a deposit and withdrawal of the money for years to see whether the party seeking to condemn it intends completing the process by which alone he can get title. This proposition is wholly independent of the question whether the value of the property rises or falls in the meantime; though, if it be stationary, the difference is the difference between money and four years' credit and the difference between an immediate forced sale on the terms the law annexes, and a sale to take place at the convenience of the person condemning the land.

We did not overlook the point that the injunction order restored the plaintiff to the possession.

This was irregular. But the case was tried on the merits, and the plaintiff then, according to our view of the case would have been entitled to an order of restitution of a possession improperly taken under color of these illegal proceedings.

This being so, the Court of Equity only erred as to the time of making this order; the whole record being before us in a chancery case, we would not reverse for an error which does no legal damage, merely because the Court did at first irregularly, what at last it would have been bound to do.

Rehearing denied.

Watts v. White.

WATTS v. WHITE.

GENERALLY a party seeking to rescind a contract, must restore the other party to the condition in which he was before the contract was made.

Plaintiff and defendant were partners in the purchase of mining claims. Defendant was the active partner, and acquainted with the value of a certain claim owned by the firm, plaintiff being ignorant of its value. Plaintiff sold his interest in this claim to defendant for greatly less than its value. Held: that in a suit by plaintiff against defendant, to set aside this sale for fraud and for an account, etc. an averment that defendant is indebted to plaintiff, on the account, in a sum greater than that paid by defendant for the mining claim, is, in effect, an offer to place defendant in statu quo, as per the rule of law.

Where a suit for real estate is brought in the wrong county, a motion to change the venue, and not demurrer, is the proper remedy. And in such case there is no discretion in the Court, the change being matter of right.

The right to try particular cases in particular counties is a mere privilege, which may be waived. It is not matter in abatement of the writ. The privilege must be claimed, by motion to change the venue, at the proper time and place.

The Court is not bound of its own motion to change the venue. Vallejo v. Randall overruled so far as it conflicts.

The late Superior Court of San Francisco had no jurisdiction of a suit affecting real estate situated outside the city limits. If this point arose on the complaint, it would be fatal. And, probably, if the fact that the property was beyond the city, appeared anywhere in the record, it would be fatal.

Mining claims are real estate within the Practice Act defining the venue of civil actions.

The Superior Court of San Francisco had jurisdiction of a suit to settle the accounts of a partnership formed for the purchase of mining claims, where both parties resided in said city: but could not by its decree affect the title to, or any interest in, the claims themselves.

The Superior Court not having jurisdiction, the Fourth District Court taking the case, by operation of law, from the former Court, possessed no greater powers in the case than the Superior Court.

APPEAL from the Fourth District.

For case, see opinion.

The Court below first having overruled the demurrer, sent the case to a Referee "to take an account of the value of the interests in certain mining claims which were sold by the plaintiff to the defendant, as mentioned in plaintiff's complaint, at the time of such sale; also, the excess of such value over and above the price paid by the defendant for the same mining interests; also, to take and state an account of the dividends declared from such mining interests, which plaintiff was entitled to receive and collect, and which were due and unpaid to the plaintiff at the time of such sale."

Upon the coming in of the report, finding one thousand five hundred and twelve dollars and fifty-eight cents due plaintiff, and upon the hearing of the cause, the Court decreed that the sale mentioned in the complaint was fraudulent, and that in consequence thereof, plaintiff was entitled to recover damages as per report of Referee, with two hundred and thirty dollars and fifty-six cents costs.

After motions to set aside report of Referee, and for new trial, were overruled, defendant appealed.

S. H. Dwinelle, for Appellant.

I. The Superior Court erred in overruling the demurrer to complaint. (Hunt v. Silk, 5 East, 449; 1 T. R. 133; Weston v. Downs, Doug. K. B. 23; Story on Sales, Sec. 427; Tisdale v. Buckmore, 33 Maine, 461; Coolidge v. Brigham, 1 Met. 549, 550; Jennings v. Gage, 13 Ill. 610; Burton v. Sewart, 3 Wend. 236; Kimball v. Cunningham, 4 Mass. 502; *Conner v. Laws, 741, Sec. 19; Id. 743, Secs. 33, 34; 1 Blk. Com. 44; Hilliard on Real Prop. Vol. 1, 51; Lord Culler v. Rich, Bullers Nisi Prius, 102.)

II. Neither that Court nor the Fourth District Court had jurisdiction of the subject matter of the action. (Pr. Act, Sec. 18, and cases cited.)

III. The Superior Court ought not to have proceeded with the trial after it appeared that the subject matter was real estate in Yuba County.

S. M. Bowman, for Respondent.

I. The right to work a mine is a privilege; it implies no right to the soil. The Legislature has treated it as personal property. (Act 1857, 347; McClintock v. Dryden, 5 Cal. 97; Hicks v. Bell, 3 Id. 227; Irwin v. Phillips, 5 Id. 140; Stokes v. Barrett, Id. 36; Tartar v. Spring Creek Co. Id. 395.) But the Court below did not act upon the title to the claim. It simply compelled defendant to account.

S. H. Gray, also, for Respondent.

1. This is a bill in equity to settle a partnership and to annul a bill of sale which was void ab initio for fraud, and not an action

---

Watts v. White.

---

for the recovery of real estate, and no tender was necessary, the allegations of the bill being equivalent to a tender.

2. The miner's interest is but a franchise, and a franchise is not real estate. The action, therefore, is not local. (5 Cal. 97; 3 Id. 227; 5 Id. 140, 36, 395; 1 Hilliard on Real Prop. 8; 2 Black. Com. 20; 2 Sandf. Sup. Ct. 560.)

BALDWIN, J. delivered the opinion of the Court — FIELD, J. concurring. TERRY, C. J. also concurred, except as to that portion of the opinion which overrules Vallejo v. Randall, 5 Cal. 461.

This was a bill, filed in the late Superior Court of San Francisco, to set aside a contract of sale made between plaintiff and defendant for a certain mining claim in Yuba County. The bill charges that plaintiff and defendant were engaged as partners in the purchase of mining claims; that the defendant was the active and managing partner, to whom the business was intrusted; that he became acquainted with the value of the claim, of which plaintiff was ignorant, and that defendant made false representations of the value to plaintiff, upon the faith of which the plaintiff sold to him at a price greatly below the real value. The bill further charges that profits and moneys properly belonging to the partnership came to, and are in, the hands of defendant, to an amount exceeding the sum — some four hundred dollars — paid by defendant to the plaintiff. Bill prays cancellation of the deed to the claim, account, etc.

The defendant demurred on two grounds:

1. That there was no tender to defendant of the sum received on the sale sought to be set aside.

2. That this being an action affecting real estate, the San Francisco Court had no jurisdiction.

The first point is not well taken. The general principle that a party seeking to rescind a contract must restore the other party to the condition in which he was before the contract was made is unquestionably correct. But we understand the bill offers in effect to do this. It alleges that the defendant is indebted to the plaintiff in a greater sum than that paid by the defendant. This money, in the hands of the defendant himself, is as good security to the defendant for this sum due him as the defendant could desire. The plaintiff risks his case upon the issue of the investigation and settlement of the accounts; but, if he is right in his allegation, a Court of Equity would not require him to pay money to a party who owes him in order to enable him to wage his rights against his debtor.

Watts v. White.

---

2. Assuming, as we do, and as, in principle, we have held, that mining claims are real estate within the meaning of the Practice Act defining the venue of civil actions, a demurrer would not be the proper mode to take advantage of the error in bringing the case in the Court of the wrong county. If this suit had been originally brought in the Fourth District Court, it would not then have been a question of jurisdiction at all—though some dicta, probably, may be found in previous decisions to that effect. District Courts are Courts of general jurisdiction in all matters given them by law, wherever those matters may be locally situated, or wherever the parties may reside; but, for convenience, parties have a right to a trial of particular cases in particular counties. This is a mere privilege, which may be waived by those entitled to it. It must be claimed at the proper time and in the proper way. It is not, by our statute, matter in abatement of the writ, but a mere privilege of trial of the suit in the given county. The party desiring a change of venue should move the Court to change the place of trial, and then the Court, in the proper case, has no discretion to refuse the motion. It seems to be made by the statute a matter, in such cases as this, of peremptory right. We think the Court is not bound, of its own motion, to change the venue, and overrule so far the case of Vallejo v. Randall, (5 Cal. 461,) if that case is to be so construed. It is, however, urged, that the Superior Court of San Francisco had, by the law creating it, only jurisdiction of cases affecting real estate lying within the limits of the city. And so the Act expressly declares; for this is an enabling Act, creating a Court, which owes its whole life and powers to the statute. It has just such jurisdiction as the Act gives—no more. The grant of jurisdiction of cases of real estate in the city is equivalent to an exclusion of jurisdiction over real estate situated anywhere else. This point arising on the complaint, was so far fatal to it. Indeed, the fact appearing anywhere on the record would probably be fatal, for the Court had no authority or power over the subject.

Patten v. Green.

3. As the parties, plaintiff and defendant, resided in San Francisco, we do not see why the Superior Court had not jurisdiction of the settlement of this partnership account. But it could not, by its decree, affect the title to this mining claim, or any interest in it, by setting aside the sale or affirming the title of the plaintiff to be untouched by it. Nor was it proper to decree to the plaintiff the real value of the mining claim. The fraud vitiated the sale, but it did not create another sale, or make the defendant take the property at its true value.

The objection, moreover, arose upon demurrer, and, if well taken, the defendant had a right to insist that it should be passed on correctly before he was put to answer, or stand on his defense. The main and leading object of the bill evidently was to set aside this deed for fraud; the settlement of the partnership accounts, if not auxiliary to this purpose, was a secondary matter. The averment as to the state of the account, indeed, seems to be incidentally made. We have already seen that the mining claim was beyond the jurisdiction of the Court. The Superior Court not having jurisdiction, the Fourth District Court, taking the case by operation of law from the former Court, possessed no greater powers in the case than the Superior Court. It did not pretend to act by virtue of its original jurisdiction, but only as the successor of the Superior Court. These views are conclusive of the questions on the record.

As the plaintiff may amend his bill and seems to have a good cause of action in the forum below for a portion of his claim, we reverse the decree and remand the case to be proceeded in according to the principles of this opinion.

Ordered accordingly.

PATTEN v. GREEN.

AN assessment of land as "balance of land on Rancho Arroyo de San Antonio, ten thousand and ninety acres, at four dollars per acre, forty thousand three hundred and sixty dollars," is sufficient; it appearing on the roll that the part of the ranch not assessed was comprehended within the plat of a town, certain lots in which were assessed on the same list to the same owner. The Board of Equalization has no power to raise the valuation of land as fixed by the Assessor, without notice to the owner. The general notice, of the sitting of the Board, by publication, does not amount to the notice required. If the Board raised the tax without proper notice to the owner, their action is void, and the assessment remains in full force.

APPEAL from the Seventh District.

Bill for injunction against the collection of taxes. The injunction was granted after notice. On the trial it was dissolved, and the complaint dismissed. Plaintiff appeals.

Crockett & Crittenden, and Shattuck, Spencer & Reichert, for Appellants.

I. An injunction is the proper remedy. (Black. on Tax Titles, 567-571; Burnett v. Cincinnati, 3 Ham. 73; Bank of U. S. v. Osborn, 9 Wheat. 738; Anderson v. State of Mississippi, 23 Miss. 459; Lyon v. Hunt, 11 Ala. 295; Dyer v. Branch Bank of Mobile, 14 Id. 622; Palmer v. Boling, 8 Cal. 388.)

II. The proceedings of the officers charged with the assessment were fatally defective, and the Sheriff had no authority to sell any land of the Appellant's. (Ferris v. Coover, 10 Cal. 632; Powell v. Tuttle, 3 Comst. 401; Hughey v. Howell, 2 Olm. 231; Isaacs v. Wiley, 12 Vt. 607; Brown v. Veazie, 25 Maine, 362; *Watcher v. 1st. There was no sufficient description of the land in the original assessment roll. (Lafferty's Lessee v. Byers, 5 Ham. 458; Lessee of Massie's Heirs v. Forsyth, 13 How. 18.) 2d. The act of the Board of Equalization in increasing the assessment was void. If the Board could have considered the question of value at all, there being no sufficient description, and hence no valuation, they could only do so upon complaint, and after notice, and upon proof, and the regularity of their proceedings must appear of record. (Rex v. Cook, 1 Cowp. 26; Gilbert v. Columbia Turnpike Company, 3 John. Cases, 107; Davison v. Gill, 1 East, 64; Smith v. Hillman, 1 Scam. 323; Sharp v. Spier, 4 Hill, 86; *Atkins v. Commonwealth v. Coombs, 2 Id. 490; Commissioners, etc. v. Clau, 15 J. R. 537; Whitney v. Clinton, 14 Conn. 72.) A portion of the tax being thus illegal, the whole was so, and the Sheriff had no authority to collect any part of it. (Clark v. Strickland, 2 Curtis C. C. R. 439; Stetson v. Rempton, 13 Mass. 272; Bangs v. Snow, 1 Id. 181; Dillingham v. Snow, 5 Id. 547; Libbey v. Burnham, 15 Id. 144.) 3d. There was no description of the property in the duplicate assessment roll delivered to the Sheriff. That roll was his only authority to collect any tax from the Appellants, or to sell their property. The authorities above cited established that an execution so levied, is levied on nothing, and that under such a levy the Sheriff could sell nothing.

Jackson Temple, for Respondent.

1. Plaintiff's remedy was certiorari to correct the action of the Board of Equalization in so far as the Board had exceeded its jurisdiction. The proper corrections could be made, and the Board directed to charge the parties with the tax really due. (8 Cal. 58; 19 Wend. 56.) The description of the land assessed is sufficient. (Palmer v. Boling, 8 Cal. 384.) Appellants are estopped from denying the correctness of the description. The assessment is presumed to have been made in the usual way, i. e.—the Appellants gave a list of their property. (Wood's Dig. 615, Sec. 3.) The return was made within the time required by law, and the assessment roll was delivered to the Clerk of the Board of Supervisors, and kept by him in his office open to public inspection. (Wood's Dig. 617, Sec. 7.) Appellants did not go before the Board to have it corrected.

2d. The Board had power to change the valuation. (Wood's Dig. 695, Sec. 12; 693, Sec. 6; 617, Sec. 8.) Errors made by the Board, in their judicial capacity—they having jurisdiction—will not vitiate the assessment. (Henderson v. Brown, 1 Caine, 92; Easton v. Calendor, 11 Wend. 91; The People v. Collins, 19 Id. 56; Haynes v. Meeks, 10 Cal. 110.) They acquire jurisdiction of the person, by giving the notice, and by the law fixing the meeting of the Board. Every person listed is brought into Court. (Hambleton v. Dempsey, 20 Ohio, 168.) But if the assessment was illegally raised, the only effect is, perhaps, to render the members of the Board personally liable. (Livingston v. Hollen-

Batten v. Green.

---

beck, 4 Barb. 10; People v. Supervisors Alleghany, 15 Wend. 198.) The tax is a debt due from the tax payers to the State. (Moore v. Patch, 12 Cal.) A portion of the amount claimed is acknowledged to be due—the collection should not be enjoined, until a tender has been made. (Robinson v. Gaar, 6 Cal. 273; Hardenbergh v. Kidd, 10 Id. 402; Weber v. San Francisco, 1 Id.)

BALDWIN, J. delivered the opinion of the Court—TERRY, C. J. and FIELD, J. concurring.

Bill filed to enjoin the collection of taxes on a tract of land in Sonoma.

Two grounds are mainly insisted on:

1. That the property was so imperfectly described on the assessment roll as to be incapable of identification.
2. That the Board of Equalization increased the valuation of the land taxed, by more than one-half, without notice to the owner.

The facts raising the first of these questions are, that a number of lots in the town of Petaluma were listed and assessed as the property of Appellants, plaintiffs below, by the Assessor of Sonoma County, on the assessment roll of 1858. The lots were separately assessed. Then follows a further assessment of the property, to the Appellants, in the following words: "Balance of land on Rancho Arroyo de San Antonio, ten thousand and ninety acres, at four dollars per acre, forty thousand three hundred and sixty dollars." The town is on a part of this ranch. Before the assessment, the Appellants had sold, not only a great many town lots, but several parcels of land lying outside of the town. The whole ranch contained originally four leagues, or some seventeen thousand seven hundred acres. Is this a sufficient description? Considering the description given to amount to this, "ten thousand acres of land being the remainder of a ranch called Arroyo de San Antonio, originally containing seventeen thousand seven hundred and ninety acres; that part not assessed being comprehended in the plat of the town of Petaluma," it would be sufficient in a deed to pass the title; and, within the case of Palmer v. Boling, (8 Cal. 388,) properly taxable by this description. We do not feel disposed to disturb that decision. The fourth section of the Act, (Wood's Digest, 616,) quoted by the Appellants, refers only to public lands, outside of a city, town, etc. as the context shows.

Patten v. Green.

The other question is more difficult. The eighth section (p. 617) provides: "The Supervisors of the County shall constitute a Board of Equalization, of which Board the Clerk of the Board of Supervisors shall be Clerk. The Board of Equalization shall meet on the second Monday in August, and shall continue in session, from time to time, until the business of equalization presented to them is disposed of; provided, however, that they shall not sit after the second Monday in September. The Board of Equalization shall have power to determine all complaints made in regard to the assessed value of any property, and may change and correct any valuation, either by adding thereto or deducting therefrom, if they deem the sum fixed in the assessment roll too small or too great, whether said sum was fixed by the owner or the Assessor." We think it would be a dangerous precedent to hold that an absolute power resides in the Supervisors to tax land as they may choose, without giving any notice to the owner. It is a power liable to a great abuse. The general principles of law applicable to such tribunals, oppose the exercise of any such power. The publication of notice of the sitting of the Board amounts to no protection to the owner; for the sessions of the Board are, or may be, from the first Monday in August until the second Monday in September, and it could scarcely be expected that every tax-payer is to wait upon the Board all this time to see if his taxes are to be increased. The words of the statute seem to require a complaint, or some proceeding analogous to this; at least, that there is to be something, however informal, in the nature of a controversy or contestation, or in the nature of a judicial inquiry. There can be no considerable difficulty in giving this notice, and we think the best interests of the State require it. We are not disposed to hold these tribunals to any great strictness of procedure; but any degree of strictness, probably, would be better than to give such arbitrary power to a Board, as would authorize it, without notice or evidence, or opportunity to the tax-payer to be heard, to increase his taxes indefinitely, without any right of appeal. The case in 20 Ohio, 172, seems to be against this view, but the ruling of the Court on this point was not necessary to the decision of the case, and the decision was influenced by other statutory provisions than the one which seems analogous to that in our Act. The Act of Ohio, too, appointed a single day as the time of the meeting of the Board. But according the weight of a direct adjudication to this decision, (which, however, is without explanation, and merely the conclusion of the Court,) we think it stands opposed to reason, justice, and sound policy, and to those general principles which allow a party a reasonable opportunity to be heard before his rights of property are affected by the action of any tribunal.

We hold, therefore, that the action of the Board is void in raising the tax. This leaves the assessment in full force, and we perceive no difficulty in the Tax Collector's proceeding to collect the tax. The other questions have been either determined by us before, or are not considered necessary to the decision.

The order dissolving the injunction is reversed, and the case is remanded, with directions to the Court below to dispose of the case in pursuance of this opinion.

GLADWIN et al. v. GLADWIN et al. GARRISON et al. INTERVENORS.

AN outstanding liability as surety or indorser for another, together with an express promise by such surety or indorser, to the principal, that he will make the debt his own and pay it, is a sufficient consideration for an express promise to pay an equal amount on demand.

APPEAL from the Twelfth District.

For case, see opinion.

Defendants were insolvent. The case was tried by the Court; the defendants, Gladwin, Hugg & Co. not answering, the contest was between plaintiff and intervenors. Judgment was entered for plaintiff against defendants, and that the intervenors take nothing by their intervention. Intervenors appeal.

Crockett & Crittenden, for Appellants, cited (McKenty v. Gladwin, Hugg & Co. 10 Cal. 227; Taafe v. Josephson, 7 Id. 352; Ryan v. Daly, 6 Id. 238.) The antedating of the note sued on — the manufacture of a present cause of action out of debts not due — the converting of an accommodation contingent liability into a debt due — the agreement that plaintiff should sue out attachment by way of securing the debt; these facts, appearing without explanation, were a fraud in law upon the other creditors. (1 S. & P. 139; 9 Porter, 39; Chenery v. Palmer, 6 Cal.; 5 Cow. 548; 4 John. 356; 15 Id. 458; 8 Ala. 694; 7 Id. 142; 14 Id. 537; 9 Id. 704; 21 Vt.; 6 Wash. 599, and Cases; ex parte Foster, 2 Story, 131; Id. 340; Watts & Serg. 138; In the matter of Hunt, 7 Wend. 240; 6 Rob. 101; 7 Id. 61; Cheever v. Hays, 3 Cal. 471; Groschen v. Page, 6 Id. 138.)

Hall McAllister, for Respondents.

The case of McKenty v. Gladwin, Hugg & Co. is not in point. That whole decision turned upon the fact that McKenty had taken a note on the 16th June, 1857, antedated to the 4th June, 1857, and drawing interest, from date, at the rate of two and one-half per cent. per month, until paid; that there was no consideration for the interest, and that McKenty included said interest in the note knowingly, and with the intention of enforcing said note according to its terms.

An outstanding liability as surety or indorser for another, together with a contract, or express promise, by such surety or indorser to the principal, that he will make the debt his own, pay it, and relieve the principal therefrom, is a good consideration for a promissory note by the principal, payable on demand, for an equal amount. This proposition settles the case. (Little v. Little, 13 Pick. 426; Cushing v. Gore, 15 Mass. 69; Hazeltine v. Guild, 11 N. H. 390; Brewster v. Bours, 8 Cal. 501; *Dana v. TERRY, C. J. delivered the opinion of the Court — FIELD, J. concurring.

Defendants, Gladwin, Hugg & Co. gave to the plaintiff a note to cover the amount of liabilities incurred by plaintiff by indorsements made for the accommodation of Gladwin, Hugg & Co. At the time of executing the note, Gladwin, Hugg & Co. were about to fail, and the note was given for the purpose of enabling plaintiff to secure himself by attaching property. The consideration of the note was the liability incurred by plaintiff as the indorser for defendants, and his express promise to assume and pay such liabilities. The note, which was dated the 17th of May, was delivered to plaintiff on the 18th, and an attachment issued on the same day, which was levied on the property of Gladwin, Hugg & Co. Subsequently, an attachment issued at the suit of Garrison & Co. against Gladwin, Hugg & Co. and was levied on the same property. Garrison then intervened in this action, and seeks to acquire precedence over plaintiff's attachment, on the ground that the note given to plaintiff is within the statute of frauds and void as to the conditions of the maker.

It appears from the evidence and finding of the Court below, that there was no actual fraud in the transaction, and the question involved is, whether the promise of plaintiff to assume and pay certain liabilities which he had incurred as indorser for defendants, and which were not at the time due, was a sufficient consideration to support a promissory note on demand.

We think the case is within the principle announced by this Court in Dana v. Stanford, (10 Cal. 269.) In that case an insolvent, in order to secure a sum due, and, also, to protect his grantee against outstanding liabilities incurred as accommodation indorser, executed a mortgage upon his entire property. This mortgage was held to be good as against the creditors of the insolvent, and we can see no reason why a party who may create a lien on his property to secure a creditor or surety may not execute a note which will enable the party to acquire a lien by legal process.

But the precise question here presented has been passed upon in the highest Courts of our sister States. The case of Little v. Little, (13 Pick. 426,) is in all respects analogous to the one at bar. A note on demand was executed in favor of plaintiff to cover the amount of outstanding liabilities incurred by plaintiff for the accommodation of the maker. These liabilities were not at the time due, and the note was executed to enable the plaintiff to secure himself by attachment. A subsequent attaching creditor contested the validity of the note, and plaintiff was nonsuited. Upon appeal the Court said:

"In many particulars the case resembles Cushing v. Gors, (15

Gladwin v. Garrison.

Mass. 73.) We think the fair deduction from the principles laid down in that case is, that an outstanding liability as surety or indorser for another, together with a contract or promise, express or implied, by such surety or indorser to the principal, that he will make the debt his own, and pay it, and so indemnify the principal, is a good consideration for an express promise to pay an equal amount on demand."

The case of Cushing v. Gore, was much stronger than the case at bar. It was a suit upon a promissory note for five thousand dollars, and a check upon one of the banks in Boston for two hundred. The note was given on the 18th day of January, 1817, and was ante-dated January 5th: the note was intended to cover the amount of liabilities incurred by the payee as indorser for the maker, and was given to enable the payee to secure himself by attachment. On the same day on which the note was executed suit was instituted, and an attachment issued, which was levied on the goods of defendant. Subsequently, the same goods were attached by other creditors, upon demands which fell due before either of the three notes so indorsed by the plaintiff became due, and the defendants contended that this operated as a fraud upon the other creditors, giving an undue advantage and preference to the plaintiff. And the defendant, Gore, who alone appeared to defend, held himself bound, in justice to those other creditors, to take this ground of defense to the present action. On this point the Judge instructed the jury "that the defendants, when they were enabled to pay all their debts, might, by our laws, give a preference to any one creditor, by paying or giving him security; and that as they might do this by assigning to the plaintiff any of their goods, so they might do it by giving a note to anticipate the day of payment, and so enable him to attach their goods." Upon appeal, Parker, C. J. in delivering the opinion of the Court, said: "It is objected by the counsel for the defendants, that there was no legal consideration for this note; there being merely a liability on the part of the plaintiff to pay the notes which he had indorsed. We think, however, that such a consideration is good, and sufficient to support an express promise.

Whether the plaintiff should be called upon, or eventually be obliged to pay, was contingent when he indorsed the defendant's

Gladwin v. Garrison.

---

notes; but, there is no doubt, if he had refused to indorse them without receiving a promissory note of the defendants, to enable him to secure himself when danger should be apprehended, the defendants would be prevented from denying the validity of their promise. In the present state of the mercantile world, it would excite great surprise if we were to decide that a note deliberately given to an indorser, for the very purpose of enabling him to secure himself against the effect of his indorsement, would not answer the purpose for which it was intended. * * * But if there were any doubt of the principle, to the extent mentioned, we think that when an indorser has, either expressly or impliedly, undertaken to pay the note by him indorsed, there can be no question that such an undertaking is a good and valuable consideration for a promissory note."

The case of Haseltine v. Guild, (11 N. H. 390) is to the same effect, and we have seen no decision to the contrary. The cases cited by Appellant differ in several important respects from the one at bar. In Ryan v. Daly, (6 Cal. 238,) it was admitted that the judgment was confessed for the purpose of preventing the collection of plaintiff's demand. In Taaffe v. Josephson, (7 Cal. 353) attachment was issued upon several promissory notes, one of which was not due, and this fact was held to vitiate the judgment. In McKenty v. Gladwin, 10 Cal. 227, a note bearing interest at two and one-half per cent. was executed for the amount of the debts not due and bearing no interest. The note was antedated for the purpose of receiving a larger amount of interest upon it. The Court said, "In this case it was only necessary to determine two questions:

1st. Was there any consideration for the interest secured to be paid by this note? If there was no legal consideration for this interest, and the note should be enforced according to its terms, it would unjustly take from the other creditors and give to the plaintiff the amount.

2d. Was this result knowingly intended by the plaintiff?

In regard to the first question, the proof is conclusive. The plaintiff himself was examined as a witness by the intervenors, and Mr. Hugg, one of the defendants, was examined as a witness for the plaintiff, and, from their testimony, it was clear that the entire consideration for which the note was given was composed of certain known and specified items, not one of which was due, and not one of which drew interest. And, as to the second question, we cannot see how there could exist a doubt. If we take it to be true, for the sake of the argument only, that the plaintiff intended to collect this interest, knowing at the time that none of the demands he held against the plaintiff drew interest, and therefore that he was not entitled to any, it is difficult to conceive how the intervenors could more conclusively prove the fact of such intention than they did by the testimony of the plaintiff himself and the defendant, Hugg. The eight different items constituting, together, the entire principal sum for which the note was given, were clearly known to plaintiff, who added them together and himself drew the note. It must have been known to plaintiff that none of these items were due, and that none of them drew interest. That he intended to collect the interest and appropriate it to himself is clear from his own testimony: "I do not know why I dated it on the 4th of June, except that I would receive ten days' interest on the amount.

---

Whitney v. Butterfield.

---

* * * I do not know that I had any other motive for antedating than that I should receive interest for ten days." And, when suit was brought upon the note, the prayer of the complaint was for judgment, including principal and interest.

In this case the parties seem to have acted with perfect good faith. The plaintiffs had incurred large liabilities by indorsements for the accommodation of defendants. The defendants were naturally anxious to secure plaintiffs against loss on account of such liabilities, and for that purpose executed the note sued on, upon the express promise of plaintiffs to discharge the liabilities incurred on behalf of defendants, and which promise, it appears, had been complied with.

This, as we have seen, constitutes a sufficient consideration to support the promise to pay on demand and to enable plaintiffs to recover upon the note. Judgment affirmed.

WHITNEY et al. v. BUTTERFIELD et al.

In the service of process the Sheriff is responsible only for unreasonably, or not reasonably, executing it. He is not bound to start on the instant of receiving a writ to execute it, without regard to anything else.

Whitney v. Butterfield.

Reasonable diligence in the execution of process depends upon the particular facts; whether, for instance, the writ be for fraud, or because defendant is about to leave the State, or remove his property, and the like.

A writ placed in the Sheriff's hands on Sunday cannot be officially received by him on that day. It can only be considered officially in his hands when Sunday has expired.

Where one writ of attachment was placed in the Sheriff's hands on Sunday, and another against the same defendant was placed in the hands of a Deputy at a quarter past twelve on Monday morning, the Sheriff not knowing the fact, and the first levy was made under the last writ at one o'clock Monday morning, the Sheriff was not guilty of negligence in executing the first writ — no special circumstances being shown.

The mere omission of Deputy to inform the Sheriff of having process in hand is not such negligence as to charge the Sheriff, in case a writ last in hand was executed first.

The Sheriff and his Deputy are one person in law, so far as to make the former responsible for the acts of the latter, but not so far as to require of the Sheriff impossibilities, or to impose unconscionable exactions.

APPEAL from the Fourteenth District.

Suit against a Sheriff and his sureties for damages in not levying an attachment with due diligence.

On the 4th of April, 1857, plaintiffs sued out a writ of attachment, in the Twelfth District Court, against Abbott & Edwards, residents of Nevada City. On the next day, Sunday, between the hours of nine and ten, P. M. the writ was placed in the hands of defendant, Butterfield, the Sheriff, with instructions to levy, as soon as possible, on certain property of said Abbott & Edwards, which was named. About fifteen minutes after the hour of twelve, A. M. of Monday, the 6th day of April, 1857, Clark & Co. brought suit, by attachment, against said Abbott & Edwards in the Fourteenth District Court, in and for Nevada County, and put the writ in the hands of one Bidwell, a Deputy of Butterfield. This writ was levied on all the property of Abbott & Edwards in Nevada City and County, about one o'clock, A. M. of said 6th day of April.

The attachment of plaintiffs was levied at eight o'clock in the morning of the same day.

Subsequently, plaintiffs and Clark & Co. obtained judgments in their respective suits; the property attached was sold in due course of law, and the proceeds being more than the judgment of plaintiffs, but less than that of Clark & Co. were paid over to the latter upon their execution.

In September, 1857, plaintiffs issued execution, which was returned nulla bona by Boring, the then Sheriff. They also issued another execution, and placed it in the hands of Butterfield, ex-

Sheriff, with directions to levy upon any property in his hands belonging to Abbott & Edwards, or to be found in said county, etc. Butterfield returned that he had no property in his possession or under his control belonging to them.

At the date of the levy of said attachments and said executions, Abbott & Edwards had no property other than that seized.

In July, 1857, they applied for a discharge in insolvency.

The answer denied negligence.

The case being submitted to the Court upon an agreed statement of facts, plaintiffs had judgment for the amount of their judgment against Abbott & Edwards. Defendants appeal.

C. L. 270.)

TERRY, C. J. delivered the opinion of the Court — FIELD, J. concurring.

This question touches the liability of the Sheriff for not levying an attachment put in his hands on Sunday; the goods of defendant having been seized by his Deputy on Monday, though the last writ came to his hands early on the same day, and was levied on the property which was disposed of by the last writ — so that the first remained unsatisfied. The principles which determine this case we think somewhat different from those argued at the bar.

The Sheriff's liability rests on his breach of official duty. As he is bound to perform his duty, so is he responsible to every one who may be injured by his failure to discharge it. In respect to the execution of process these official duties are well defined by law. The law is reasonable in this, as in all other things. It holds public officers to a strict performance of their respective duties. It tolerates no wanton disregard of these duties. It sanctions no negligence; but it requires no impossibilities and imposes no unconscionable exactions. When process of attachment or execution comes to the hands of the Sheriff, he must obey the exigency of the writ. He must, in such cases, execute the writ with all reasonable celerity. Whenever he can make the money on execution, or secure the debt by attachment he must do it. But he is not held to the duty of starting on the instant after receiving a writ, to execute it, without regard to anything else than its instant execution. Reasonable diligence is all that is required of him in such instances. But this reasonable diligence depends upon the particular facts in connection with the duty. If, for example, a Sheriff has execution against A, and has no special instruction to execute it at once, and there is no apparent necessity for its immediate execution, it would not be contended that he was under the same obligations to execute it instantaneously as if he were so instructed, and there were circumstances of urgency. So in respect to an attachment. If an attachment were sued out on the ground of a defendant's fraud, or his being in the act of leaving the State, or removing his property, the very fact of the issuance of the attachment, or the making of the affidavit, would seem to indicate to the officer the necessity of immediate action. But, generally, in the absence of special circumstances, an attachment issued for the security of a debt, under the old statute authorizing such a process, does not stand upon a more favorable footing, so far as regards the necessity of immediate service, than an execution.

Whitney v. Butterfield.

---

It is true the statute, (Wood's Dig. 183, Sec. 125,) directs that the Sheriff "shall execute the writ of attachment without delay;" but this was not intended to introduce a new rule. The expression, "without delay," does not mean that the Sheriff shall, the instant he receives process of this sort, lay aside all other business and proceed to execute it, unless some special reasons of urgency exist. The rule is thus stated by the Supreme Court of New York, in Hinman v. Borden, (10 Wend. 367): "A Sheriff is bound to use all reasonable endeavors to execute process." It is true that some authorities hold the rule with more strictness. In Lindsay's Executors v. Armfield, (3 Hawks, N. C. R.) the Sheriff was held liable for not levying from 7th October to 1st November, following—no explanation being offered for the failure. Mr. Justice Hall says, "The law declares it to be the duty of the Sheriff to execute all process which comes to his hands, with the utmost expedition, or as soon after it comes into his hands as the nature of the case admits," and cites Bacon Abridg. Sheriff N. That author holds the doctrine in the same language as that quoted. Mr. Justice Henderson, in the case in Hawks, states the doctrine a little different. He says, "The Sheriff should proceed with all convenient speed to levy the execution." The learned American editor of Bacon cites, in support of the doctrine of the text, several cases, which we have examined. None of them sustain the rule in its strictness, even if we are to regard the doctrine of Bacon as laying down a different rule so far as the liability of the Sheriff is concerned, from that held in Wendell and other cases; for Bacon says, in the next sentence to that quoted, that the "Sheriff must not show any favor, nor be guilty of unreasonable delay." In Kennedy v. Brent, (6 Cranch, 187,) C. J. Marshall holds that the Marshal is bound to serve the process as soon as he reasonably can.

Whitney v. Butterfield.

---

The question of unreasonable delay, is a mixed question of law and fact, each case depending on its own circumstances; for, as we said before, the speed with which the Sheriff must proceed may depend upon the apparent necessity for quick action. But we have found no case which holds that the mere delay of a few hours, without some showing of special urgency has been held sufficient to charge the Sheriff. If we suppose, then, that the process reached the hands of the principal Sheriff at one o'clock on Monday morning, we do not perceive that the Sheriff would have been liable — nothing else appearing — for failing to levy it before. But the particular facts of this case make it stronger for the Sheriff. The attachment of plaintiff was placed in the principal Sheriff's hands on the night of Sunday, between nine and ten o'clock. But it did not legally come to his hands as Sheriff and for service until twelve o'clock. Fifteen minutes after twelve the other attachment came to the hands of the Deputy; of this, it seems, the Sheriff had no notice; and the Deputy levied it at or about one o'clock. It seems, then, that the laches of the Sheriff in delaying this levy for an hour at midnight, is the foundation of his liability. This would be too harsh and unreasonable a requisition. It is plausibly argued that the Deputy and his principal are the same person in law; and that the attachment in the hands of the defendants is, in legal effect, in the hands of the principal; and, consequently, the case is that of an officer having a senior writ and levying a junior writ on the property of the defendant. But the answer to this argument is, that here the question is one of diligence; and that it cannot be contended that the mere omission of the Deputy to inform the principal of his having process is such negligence as to charge him.

We have seen that the Sheriff is not absolutely responsible for not executing process of this sort. He is responsible for unreasonably or not reasonably executing such process. But the test is, was a failure, in the absence of any special circumstances, to execute this process, unreasonable, or did it subject the Sheriff to responsibility for the debt? We may, in this connection, leave out of question this discussion as to the day, (Sunday,) on which the writ of the plaintiff was received. It is certain that for all judicial purposes, Sunday is no day at all. The Sheriff need not, on that day, indorse on the writ the fact of its reception. If given to him on that day, he did not receive it as an officer, but as the mere agent of the plaintiff. He could do nothing with it on that day. He might, if he chose, recognize the receipt of it, but it imposed on him no higher or other duties than if he had received it on the next day. He, for all practical purposes, so far as respects this writ, was not the Sheriff at all on Sunday. But we may safely concede, for all the purposes of this suit, that he received the process on the next day, and even at the beginning of that day. Was he bound, then, on this assumption, to go on and execute the writ, immediately after having received it, no peculiar necessity or apparent reason being shown why he should do so? No authorities have been cited to show that a Sheriff is bound to quit everything else, immediately on receiving an attachment or execution, and proceed to levy.

Whitney v. Butterfield.

---

The Deputy had received Clark & Co.'s attachment early in the morning of Monday; perhaps at the very instant which marked the period which separated Sunday from Monday in the computation of time. But though Whitney's writ was in the hands of the Sheriff before this time; yet the Sheriff could do nothing with it — did not legally even receive it in his official capacity before. His connection with the writ of Whitney, as Sheriff, commenced at the very time — at the utmost — when his Deputy had the writ of Clark. But if Clark had no writ, we do not see that the Sheriff would have been bound to go at once, on the instant, when Monday commenced, and levy on the property of the defendants in attachment. Nor was the Sheriff bound to the degree of diligence which required him to communicate to his Deputy the intelligence that he had received the writ of Whitney before the Deputy levied the process of Clark. Attachments do not bind the property of the defendant from the time of the issuance, but only from the time of the actual levy, and the attachment first levied, by our statute, has the priority.

But, probably, we might put this case on a broader ground. The Sheriff could no more officially receive a writ on Sunday for service on Sunday than he could execute it on Sunday. Both these acts are of the same general character, and equally within the prohibition of the statute. Not receiving it then as Sheriff, he received it as the mere agent of the plaintiff. He so received it, not to execute it on Sunday, or to deal with it as a writ coming to him on that day as an officer. He might have been bound, as an agent, to deliver it to the Sheriff, or to treat it as delivered when he could act. But this was a personal, not an official, contract; it was a mere bailment which bound him, probably, as a man, but did not bind him as a Sheriff, and, if he chose to disregard it entirely, we do not see that he would be bound as an officer. It is not necessary to press this point, for the reason that if he was bound to consider it as placed in his hands on Monday, at one o'clock, there was no such negligence in failing to execute it before, as to subject him to liability. It is true that it may be urged that the Sheriff and the Deputy are one person in law; true, so far as this, that the Sheriff is responsible for the acts of the Deputy; but no one would contend that if a Sheriff has a Deputy at a remote precinct of a county, and a writ is placed in his hands, and he executes it on property in his precinct, that the Sheriff would be responsible for this, if the consequence were to deprive B of the recovery of a claim, as the result of this levy — B having put a writ in the hands of the Sheriff at the county seat, an hour before the writ was placed in the hands of the Deputy. Whitney trusted the Sheriff to consider that the writ would be in his hands on Monday, and to receive and execute it as if it were handed to him on that day; but even if it had been, the Sheriff was not bound to get out of his bed, (no special circumstances existing,) on the morning of that day, at one o'clock, and immediately proceed to the execution of the writ. It would be unjust to hold the Sheriff to this degree of diligence, and, we think, illegal.

---

We reverse the judgment and remand the case.

THE PEOPLE ex rel. BLANDING v. BURR et als. CONSTITUTING THE BOARD OF FUND COMMISSIONERS UNDER THE ACT OF APRIL 20, 1858.

THE Legislature may authorize a municipal corporation to pay claims invalid in law, but equitable and just in themselves.

The only limitation upon the taxing power of the Legislature is the provision for equality and uniformity found in the 13th Section, of Article 4th, of the Constitution.

The Legislature can impose a general tax upon all the property of the State, or a local tax upon the property of particular political subdivisions, as counties, cities, and towns. The cases in which its power shall be exercised, and the extent to which the taxation in a particular instance shall be carried, are matters exclusively within its own judgment, subject to the qualifications of equality and uniformity in the assessment. And, except as especially restricted, its power of appropriation of the moneys raised, is co-extensive with its power of taxation. It may appropriate them to claims which have no legal obligation, and are founded only in justice. The power of appropriation which the Legislature can exercise over the revenues of the State for any purpose, which it may regard as calculated to promote the public good, it can exercise over the revenues of a county, city, or town, for any purpose connected with their present or past condition, except as such revenues may, by the law creating them, be devoted to special purposes. In creating the law imposing the tax, it can prescribe the objects to which the money raised shall be applied. It is only for the convenient administration of the government that the State is divided into counties, cities, and towns.

The powers of a municipal corporation may be increased, restricted, or repealed, by the Legislature at will, saving only vested rights.

The fact that the Legislature has once exercised its powers in limiting the extent of taxation in municipal corporations, under the 37th Section, of Article 4th of the Constitution, does not prevent the Legislature from again exercising its power by enlarging the authority to tax.

The Act of April 20th, 1858, authorizing the issuance of bonds by the city and county of San Francisco, is valid.

The clause in the Act, requiring the action of the Board of Examiners to be submitted to a vote of the people in a contingency, does not make the Act any the less a law. The Act took effect as a law immediately, and was not dependent on the action of any other body.

Laws may be absolute, dependent upon no contingency, or they may be subject to such conditions as the Legislature, in its wisdom, may impose. They may take effect only upon the happening of events which are future and uncertain; and among others, the voluntary act of the parties upon whom they are designed to operate.

THE case is stated in the opinion of the Court.

Hoge & Wilson, for Appellants.

I. The Act of April 20, 1858, is constitutional.

1. The 37th Section, of Article 4th, of the Constitution, is not a limitation upon the power of the Legislature. (Grant v. Courter, 24 Barb. 240; Cook v. City of Rochester, Id. 487; People v. Mayor of Brooklyn, 4 Comst. 440.)

2. The act is a mere exercise of the taxing power. (Thomas v. Leland, 24 Wend. 66; Town of Guilford v. Supervisors of Co.* 12 Gill & Johns. 436, affirmed in 3 Howard, 534.)

II. The municipal government of San Francisco is a mere creature of the Legislature, subject to the entire control of that body. The State is divided, in the administration of government, into counties, towns, cities, and incorporated villages. To these various political subdivisions the State, for the purpose of government, delegates many of her powers. They all bear the same relation to the State, and are equally within her control. (C. W. & Z. R. R. v. Comm'rs Clinton Co. 1 Ohio, 89; People v. Morris, 13 Wend. 337; People v. Mayor of N. Y. 25 Wend. 680; People v. Draper, 25 Barb. 370.)

III. The whole subject of taxation belongs to the Legislature alone. Its exercise cannot be controlled by the Courts. In the absence of constitutional restriction, the taxing power is unlimited and reaches the whole property of the State. The Legislature may levy and apportion a tax upon any particular locality or division of the State, and is the exclusive judge of the propriety and justice of its own actions. It may recognize claims which cannot be enforced at law, and may provide for their payment by taxation upon any of the political subdivisions, according to its own notions of justice and of public benefit.

IV. As to the assumption that the Act of 1858 is not in itself a law, but a mere proposition, to be submitted to the people, as to whether it should take effect or not as a law, we say, the assumption is not true. The Act is not submitted to the people at all, nor is any provision of it, nor is its validity in any way made to depend upon a vote of the people. It is the report of the Board of Examiners that is to be submitted to the people, if demanded. The question whether bonds should be issued in accordance with the report of the Board of Examiners, and no other, may be submitted to a vote. This particular law, therefore, is not within the principle contended for by the counsel. But there is nothing in the point itself. (Grant v. Courter, 24 Barb. 242; Clark v. City of Rochester, Id. 468; Moers v. City of Reading, 21 Penn. 202; Cinn., Wilm. and Zanesville Railroad v. Comm'rs of Clinton Co. 1 Ohio, 87; Hitchcock's Opinion, 20 Ohio Append.; Stack et al. v. Mayor and Lexington R. R. Co. 13 B. Mon. 23; People v. Reynolds, 5 Gil. 10.)

Wm. Blanding, also, for Appellants.

I. The Act in question is substantially a Funding Act, such as has been sanctioned in England and America, and particularly in California. (Washington v. Page, 4 Cal. 389; People ex rel. Tallant v. Board of Supervisors of San Francisco, 12 Id. 300; People ex rel. Tallant v. Tillinghast, 10 Id. 584; People ex rel. Lane v. Bond, Id. 563; People ex rel. O'Donnell v. Board of Supervisors San Francisco, 11 Id. 206.)

II. The Legislature has power to levy a tax to pay these bonds. (McCulloch v. The State of Maryland, 4 Wheat. 316; Nogues v. Douglass, 7 Cal. 65; Town of Guilford v. The Board of Supervisors of Chenango Co. 3 Kern. 143; Shaw v. Dennis, 5 Gil. 405; Thomas v. Leland, 24 Wend. 65; City of Bridgeport v. Hous. R. R. Co. 15 Conn. 475.)

Yale, for Respondents.

I. The Act of the 20th of April, 1858, was not in itself a law, passed by the Legislature; nor was it merely to take effect upon the happening of an event, dependent upon a certain condition; but was a mere proposition, to be submitted to the people under a certain condition, as to whether it should take effect or not as a law. (Barto v. Himrod, 4 Seld. 483; Johnson v. Rich, 9 Barb. 680.)

II. The terms of submission to the vote of the people were accompanied by an illegal condition. The submission was made to depend upon the will of five hundred electors, whose names should be found upon the assessment-roll as tax-payers. This is, in effect, submitting the question to five hundred men.

III. The main ground of refusal rests upon the illegality of the claims passed by the Board of Examiners upon which bonds are demanded, and the want of power in the Legislature to render them valid against the corporation or against the tax-payers.

1. It was made the duty of the Legislature, under the Constitution, to restrict the corporation of San Francisco from the creation of a debt beyond the amount limited in the charter. (Const. Art. 4, Sec. 37.)

2. The Legislature performed that duty, and it then became as obligatory as a constitutional provision, incorporated in the Constitution. (Charter of 1851, Art. 3, Sec. 5; Charter of 1855, Sec. 32.)

3. All debts contracted beyond the sums fixed in the Charters as the maximum, are absolutely void, under the Constitution and Charter. And being void, the Legislature could not make them valid. (Ketchum v. City of Buffalo, 4 Kernan, 356, 376, 379; Moore v. Patch, 12 Cal. 265; People v. O'Donnell, 11 Id. 206; People v. Johnson, 6 Id. 499; Nogues v. Douglass, 7 Id. 65; Dennis v. Maynard et al. 15 Ill. 480.) The Legislature cannot dispose of the property of the Corporation, and vest it in the State. (Territt et al. v. Taylor et al. 9 Cranch, 52; Morse v. Smith, 2 Cal. 554; Hampshire v. Franklin, 16 Mass. 84; Newall v. The People, 3 Seld. 9; Wells v. City of Weston, 22 Missouri, 387. For English Funding System see McCulloch's Com. Dic. 689, and Encyclopedia of Commerce, Vol. 1, 763, Title Funds, by I. Smith Hamans.)

4. Upon general principles contracts in violation of a statute are void, so that all these claims certified to be bonded are independent of the constitutional restriction. (Rodman v. Munson, 13 Barb. 63; Newell v. The People, 3 Seld. 9; Bell v. Quinn, 2 Sand. 146.)

5. The provisions in the Constitution and Charters of 1851

---

Blanding v. Burr.

---

and 1855, limiting the creation of the debt, constituted a contract with the tax-payers, during the existence of those Charters, that they should not be called on to pay a larger tax for the city indebtedness than authorized by the Charters, which contract the Act of 1858 violates, by the imposition of an additional tax to pay for the excess. (See the general principle stated in New Jersey v. Wilson, 7 Cranch, 164; and State Bank of Ohio v. Knoop, 16 How. 369.) The law could not have a retroactive operation.

6. The operation of the Act of 1858, is to take the property of the tax-payers of the city, without due process of law, and to appropriate it to another for a private purpose.

FIELD, J. delivered the opinion of the Court — TERRY, C. J. concurring.

This was a proceeding to obtain a peremptory mandamus upon the Respondents, constituting the Board of Fund Commissioners, under the Act of April 20, 1858, to compel them, in compliance with the provisions of the Act, to issue to the relator bonds of the city and county of San Francisco for the amount of his claim, as allowed by the Board of Examiners. Two of the Respondents — the Auditor and Treasurer of the city and county — in their return to the alternative writ, avow their readiness to issue the bonds in conformity with the Act, but allege that the Respondent Burr, the President of the Board, refuses to sign them, and that they cannot be issued without his signature. The Respondent Burr, in his return, bases his refusal on the alleged illegality of the claims allowed by the Board of Examiners against the city of San Francisco, and the alleged want of power in the Legislature, by the Act in question, to give them validity, and to render them binding upon the corporation.

No objection is taken to the regularity of the action of the Examiners. It is admitted that they conformed in all respects to the provisions of the Act, and discharged their duties with strict impartiality and faithfulness. No claim was approved by them which was not evidenced in the required form, or founded upon a valuable or meritorious consideration. The illegality alleged is, that the claims were created in contravention of express prohibitions in the charters of 1851 and 1855. The charter of 1851 vests the government of the city in a Common Council, consisting of a Board of Aldermen and a Board of Assistant Aldermen; and in the 5th Section of Article 3d provides as follows:

“The Common Council shall not create, nor permit to accrue, any debts or liabilities which, in the aggregate with all former debts or liabilities, shall exceed the sum of fifty thousand dollars over and above the annual revenue of the city, unless the same shall be authorized by ordinance for some specific object, which ordinance shall provide ways and means, exclusive of loans, for the payment of the interest thereon as it falls due, and also to pay and discharge the principal within twelve years; but no such ordinance shall take effect until it shall have been submitted to the people and receive a majority of all the votes cast at such election; and all money raised by authority of such ordinance shall be applied only to the object therein mentioned, or to the payment of the debt thereby created; provided, that the present debt of the city, with the interest accruing thereon, shall make no part of the fifty thousand dollars aforesaid.”

The charter of 1855, in like manner, vests the government of the city in a Common Council, consisting of similiar Boards, and in its thirty-second section provides, that “the Common Council shall not create, nor permit to accrue, any debt or liability which, in the aggregate with all former debts or liabilities, exclusive of the funded debts, shall exceed the sum of twenty-five thousand dollars over and above the estimated annual revenue of the city at the time of incurring such debt or liability,” and contains various clauses intended to give effect to this prohibition.

These provisions are construed by the counsel of the Respondents as a legislative restriction upon the powers of the municipal government, fixing a limit beyond which it could not go in the creation of any debt or liability; and hence it is argued that all claims exceeding this limit are without legal obligation, and consequently incapable of confirmation by legislative enactment. It is not necessary for the determination of this proceeding to give a construction to these provisions, for, assuming the construction of the learned counsel to be correct, and that the claims were without legal obligation, we cannot perceive any constitutional objection to their recognition by the Legislature as a just debt to be assumed by the city. The claims approved were not created for purposes outside of the charters, but for objects warranted by them; and it is not pretended that they were not founded upon considerations which would be deemed valuable and sufficient as between individuals. The objection to the claims is not to their character, but to their amount. By the Act of April 20th, 1858, the Legislature has provided for a change in their form, and their ultimate payment by the city.

The Act provides that bonds shall be issued to the holders of the approved claims, (upon the surrender of such claims for cancellation,) in the name of the city and county, be signed by the Commissioners in their official capacity, bear date as of the first of January, 1858, draw interest at the rate of six per cent. per annum, and be redeemable and payable within thirty years from their date, and that an annual tax shall be levied for the payment of the interest, and after 1866 a further annual tax for the creation of a sinking fund for the extinction of the principal. The effect of the act is to give numerous outstanding claims a common form, and to convert a present liability, real or asserted, into a deferred debt, and to provide a fund for its extinguishment. The question presented, is not one of power in the Legislature to impose upon the corporation the payment of claims for which no consideration has been had, but of power to provide for claims meritorious in their character, for which an equivalent has been received, and from the payment of which the corporation could only escape upon strict technical grounds. That the Legislature can provide for the payment of claims, invalid in the forum of the law, but equitable and just in themselves, would seem unquestionable. It may become, for example, of the highest importance to a municipal corporation that counsel should be employed to defend its rights of property assailed by different parties, but its charter may not confer authority to employ the counsel or to meet his charges. Professional services rendered under such circumstances, would not constitute a legal charge upon the corporation, but that it would be competent for the Legislature to authorize the payment of the charge, and the imposition of a tax for that purpose, no one will deny. Or, take a still stronger case—a city has issued, in pursuance of law, its bonds — the annual interest is maturing, and the sources of revenue upon which it relied to pay the same have failed, and it has no power to borrow the money within the requisite time, but individuals possessing the means come forward, and at the request of its authorities, advance the necessary money to protect the honor and good faith of the city. A claim for reimbursement would not, under the circumstances, in face of positive prohibitions of the charter to raise money, except in a particular way, be valid and binding, but that the Legislature could authorize its payment, and the raising of the means by taxation without trenching upon any constitutional restrictions, is clear. The action of the Legislature in reference to the approved claims under the Act of April 20th, 1858, is of a similar character, and must rest for its validity upon similar grounds. There is nothing in the act compulsory upon the holders of the approved claims; they are not bound to surrender them and receive bonds in their place; this is entirely optional with them. The act, therefore, impairs no right which they may have possessed heretofore, even were the claims valid and binding upon the city. In that view the act is of a beneficial character to the holders in the available form of the claims it furnishes, and in the security it gives for their ultimate payment; much more so upon the assumption with which we are considering the case, that the claims never possessed any legal obligation. The question then, is, whether the direction to levy an annual tax for the interest, and, after 1866, for the principal of these bonds, was a legitimate exercise of the taxing power of the Legislature.

The only limitation upon this power is contained in the 13th Section of the 11th Article of the Constitution, which simply provides for equality and uniformity in the taxation. There is no restriction as to the amount of the tax which may be imposed, or the purpose to which the money raised shall be applied. The security against the abuse of the power of the Legislature is to be found in the wisdom and sense of justice of its members, and their relation to their constituents. It can impose a general tax upon all the property of the State, or a local tax upon the property of particular political subdivisions, as counties, cities, and towns. The cases in which its power shall be exercised, and the extent to which the taxation in a particular instance shall be carried, are matters exclusively within its own judgment, subject to the qualifications of equality and uniformity in the assessment. And, except as especially restricted, its power of appropriation of the moneys raised, is coextensive with its power of taxation. It may appropriate them to claims which have no legal obligation, and are founded only in justice. Of the propriety of the appropriation, as of the expediency of the taxation, it is the sole judge. With the exercise of the power in either case, the judiciary cannot interfere. The power of appropriation which the Legislature can exercise over the revenues of the State for any purpose, which it may regard as calculated to promote the public good, it can exercise over the revenues of a county, city, or town, for any purpose connected with their present or past condition, except as such revenues may, by the law creating them, be devoted to special purposes. In passing the law imposing the tax, it can prescribe the objects to which the moneys raised shall be applied. It is only for the convenient administration of the government, that the State is divided into counties, cities, and towns. These political subdivisions are mere instrumentalities, with powers more or less enlarged according to the requirements of the public. Their powers are subject to be increased, restricted, or repealed, at the will of the Legislature, according to the varying exigencies of the State; vested rights acquired thereunder, as under all laws, only, remaining unaffected. In directing, therefore, a particular tax by a municipal corporation, and the appropriation of the proceeds, the Legislature only exercises a power through its subordinate agent, which it could exercise directly. In creating the corporation, or by subsequent legislation, it could authorize specific taxes for specific purposes; as, for instance, for the salaries of its Mayor or Supervisors. The character of the purpose — when there is no constitutional inhibition — cannot affect the power. With the expediency or policy of the purpose the judiciary have nothing to do.

Blanding v. Burr.

---

The views we have expressed are fully sustained by numerous adjudications. The case of The Town of Guilford v. The Board of Supervisors of Chenango County et als. is one of them, and is directly in point. (3 Ker. 143.) The facts out of which that case arose are these: Certain persons, by the names of Cornell and Clark, were elected in 1838, Commissioners of Highways of the town of Guilford, and, as such officers, by direction of the voters of the town, commenced a suit against a certain turnpike company for entering upon and taking possession of a public highway and bridge in the town, without having the same appraised and paid for as private property. In the suit, the Commissioners were cast, and, in consequence, subjected to the payment of costs, besides the fees of their own counsel. They then presented their claim for the expenses incurred by reason of the suit, to the auditors of the town for allowance, but those officers refused to audit it. They then applied to the Court for a mandamus, but the application was denied, on the ground that they had a remedy by an action at law. They then brought their suit against the town and failed, the Supreme Court holding that the Commissioners did not possess authority, by virtue of their office, to bring the suit against the turnpike company; that the electors of the town could not, by resolution or otherwise, authorize the suit in the name of the Commissioners; that the resolution, if passed at a town meeting, did not bind the town; and that, as a consequence, the Commissioners could not sustain the action for the costs and expenses incurred by them. The Commissioners had thus failed to establish their claim at law, and were in the same position with that of the holders of the approved claims in the case at bar, assuming the position of the Respondent that such claims were without legal obligation. They accordingly applied to the Legislature for relief, and, in February, 1851, an Act was passed, submitting to the electors of the town to determine what amount of compensation, if any, should be awarded to them for the costs and expenses they had incurred.

Blanding v. Burr.

---

Under this Act the electors, by a large majority, decided against the claim. In the following year the Commissioners again applied to the Legislature for relief, and in February, 1852, another Act was passed, requiring the County Judge of Chenango County to appoint three Commissioners to take proof of and determine the amount of the cost and expenses which had been incurred in the suits with the turnpike company, and accruing from their non-payment; and to render an award thereon, and making it the duty of the Supervisors of the county to cause the amount of the award to be levied upon the taxable property of the town of Guilford, and to be collected for the benefit of Cornell and Clark, in the same manner as other taxes were collected by law. The award, under the Act, was rendered, and thereupon the town instituted suit to restrain the Board of Supervisors from levying and collecting the money, and to prohibit Cornell and Clark from adopting any means, under the Act of the Legislature, to enforce its collection, on the ground that the Act was unconstitutional and void. The Court, at a special term, decided the law unconstitutional and void, the proceedings under it of no avail, and directed a decree perpetually enjoining the parties from taking any steps for the collection of the award. On appeal, the Supreme Court, at a general term, reversed the decree, holding the law constitutional and valid. (18 Barb. 616.) Opinions were delivered by two of the Justices, Crippen and Gray. Mr. Justice Crippen, in his opinion, says: "There being no prohibitory constitutional restriction, the Legislature possesses the undoubted power to levy taxes upon particular districts, counties, towns, or other distinct localities, as may seem just and right, according to the benefits derived from the objects of such imposition. This principle is fully asserted and maintained by the Court of Appeals, in the case of The People v. The Mayor of Brooklyn, above cited. Also, see Thomas v. Leland, (24 Wend. 65.) It cannot be regarded as an open question since the decision of the Court of Appeals. The Legislature, acting upon the principle of these cases, passed the Act, on the 5th of February, 1852, for the purpose of affording relief to Cornell and Clark, against the manifest injustice to which they had been subjected by a refusal of the town to comply with a plain moral obligation resting upon it, but which could not be reached by the strict rules of the common law.

My conclusion is that the Act in question was eminently right and proper to reach the exigency of the case, and fully authorized by the fundamental law of the State. The Legislature possessed the right to pass the law, and the merits of the claim of Cornell and Clark furnish strong and palpable reasons for the enforcement of its provisions." Mr. Justice Gray, in his opinion observes: "The Court could not relieve them, (the Commissioners of Highways,) because the electors acted without statute authority, and hence there was no legal obligation on the part of the town, as such, to pay.

Blanding v. Burr.

---

The moral obligation was not, and could not be, passed upon, by the Court, for the reason that the whole question turned upon the construction of a statute. An appeal was then made to the Legislature, who were of opinion, upon the facts established before them, that Cornell and Clark had acted in good faith in prosecuting the suit brought by them for the benefit of the public, and because, by strict legal rules, no remedy could be had by them in Court, they authorized a public tax to be levied for their relief, and apportioned upon that portion of the State which instigated the litigation, and for whose benefit it was intended. * * I have never heard it doubted, that whenever a moral obligation exists on the part of the government to relieve one of its citizens, sufficient to support a promise, if the same state of things existed between individuals, the Legislature has the right to recognize the obligation, and discharge it by the imposition of a tax. The Legislature being the only department of the government that can provide the relief, and being unrestricted in the exercise of their taxing power, except as to the mere manner of passing bills for that purpose, must of necessity be the exclusive judges, when the interest or the honor of the government justify a tax, and of what portion of the State ought in justice to pay it."

The decision of the Supreme Court was taken to the Court of Appeals, and was there affirmed, Mr. Justice Denio, using in his opinion, the following language:

"The Legislature is not confined in its appropriation of the public moneys, or of the sums to be raised by taxation in favor of individuals, to cases in which a legal demand exists against the State. It can thus recognize claims founded in equity and justice in the largest sense of these terms, or in gratitude or charity. Independently of express constitutional restrictions, it can make appropriations of money whenever the public well-being requires, or will be promoted by it, and it is the judge of what is for the public good. It can, moreover, under the power to levy taxes, apportion the public burdens among all the tax-paying citizens of the State, or among those of a particular section, or political division. It is well settled that the authority to raise money by the exercise of the taxing power is not in conflict with the constitutional provisions protecting private property from seizure. The two principles co-exist in the Constitution, and it is not difficult to distinguish between them." (3 Kernan, 149. See, also, as illustrative of the same doctrine, the following cases: Thomas v. Leland, 24 Wend. 66; Shaw v. Dennis, 5 Gilman, 415; City of Bridgeport v. Hous. Railroad Co. 15 Conn. 492; Inhabitants of Norwich v. County Commissioners of Hampshire, 13 Pick. 60; Tuchalee ads. City Council of Charleston, 1 Nott & McC. 227; Wilson v. Leland, 2 Peters, 661, 662; Id. 412; People v. Mayor of Brooklyn, 4 Coms. 419; Morris v. The People, 3 Denio, 392; Grant v. Courter, 24 Barb. 237; Benson v. Mayor of Albany, Id. 248; Clark v. City of Rochester, Id. 446; Sharpless v. Mayor of Philadelphia, 21 Penn. 147 — particularly opinion of Judge Woodward; Moers v. The City of Reading, Id. 188, etc.; Cass v. Dillon, 2 Ohio, 613; Railroad Co. v. Commissioners of Clinton Co. 1 Ohio St. Rep. 89; Id. 184; People v. Morris, 13 Wend. 337; The People v. Mayor of New York, 25 Wend. 681; People v. Draper, 25 Barb. 344; The State, use of Washington Co. v. Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Co. 12 Gill and Johns. 436.)

The only clause of the Constitution to which we are cited by the Respondents is contained in the 37th Section of Article 4, which he enjoins upon the Legislature the duty to restrict cities and incorporated villages in their power of taxation and of contracting debts. By this clause it is contended that the Legislature, having once exercised its powers in limiting the extent of taxation in municipal corporations, is prohibited from conferring any greater authority to tax property. We do not perceive in the provision in question any restriction upon the actual control of the Legislature, over the whole subject of municipal taxation at all times. Certainly there is none in express terms, and none can be fairly implied from the end to which the action of the Legislature is by the provision to be directed — the prevention of abuses in assessments and in contracting debts. "The restriction contemplated," says the Supreme Court of New York, in speaking of the clause in the Constitution of that State, corresponding in exact language with the one in our own, "was meant to be exclusively under legislative discretion and control, and to be effected by statute, and not by the organic law. Where a duty in respect to a particular thing is enjoined by the Constitution upon the legislative branch of the government, and the mode of doing it is left exclusively to legislative discretion, even though the authority may have been previously exercised by the Legislature, no limitation is thereby set to legislative power, nor can an intention be implied on the part of the framers of the Constitution, or the people who adopted it, to restrict the law-making department in the manner of discharging the duty. No just or logical implication can arise that in the section under review it was intended to restrain the Legislature, when dealing with the subject of municipal power, from conferring upon municipal governments new and enlarged powers, in respect to taxation and the creation of debts, if, in its wisdom, good government and the welfare and interests of the community to be affected were to be thereby promoted." (Grant v. Courter, 24 Barb. 241; Clark v. The City of Rochester, Id. 487.)

Blanding v. Burr.

It only remains to consider the objection taken by the Respondent to the form of the Act. It is assumed that the Act is not in itself a law passed by the Legislature, but a mere proposition, to be submitted to the people under a certain condition as to whether it should take effect or not as a law. The objection was not urged upon the attention of the Court on the argument, nor is it taken in the return of the Respondents. It is put forth for the first time in the brief of the counsel, filed since the argument. We do not, however, for that reason, pass the objection by without notice, as, if true in fact, it is not merely technical, but one which goes to the entire efficacy of the Act. The clause in the Act upon which the objection rests is that which provides that if within the period intervening the publication of the report of the Examiners and the succeeding general election, a "petition in writing be presented to the President of the Board of Supervisors, signed by at least five hundred qualified voters, residents in said city and county, whose names are found in the assessment-roll as tax-payers, for the year one thousand eight hundred and fifty-eight, requesting that the question of issuing bonds, according to the report of said Board of Examiners, may be submitted to, and determined by, the qualified electors of said city and county, then such question shall be so submitted and determined at the next general election, to be held on the first Wednesday of September, A. D. one thousand eight hundred and fifty-eight, in such mode as the Board of Supervisors shall, by order or regulation, prescribe, and subject to the general laws regulating elections. If no petition signed by the requisite number of qualified persons be presented to the President of the Board of Supervisors as aforesaid, the assent of the people to the issuing of said bonds shall be presumed, and in that case, and also in case it be so determined by a majority of the electors voting at the general election, as aforesaid, then the said bonds shall issue as hereinafter provided."

Blanding v. Burr.

---

It appears from this clause, that the only question which was to be submitted to the people, if demanded, was that of issuing bonds according to the report of the Examiners. Of the many provisions of the Act, no other was, in any respect, made dependent upon the vote of the people, and this was only in effect a submission upon a certain contingency of the action of the Board. Upon that, if desired, the people might pass. The act itself took effect as a law immediately, and was not dependent upon any other body. Not so the act considered in Barto v. Himrod, cited by counsel, from 4th Selden, 486. The act in that case was made to depend entirely for its force upon the vote of the people. One of its sections, in terms, provided that the electors should determine, at the annual election, whether the act should or should not become a law.

The act in question authorized the issuance of the bonds upon the condition that objection to their issuance was not interposed in a specified manner. As an emanation of the legislative will, it was perfect in all its parts. The condition upon the exercise of the authority was imposed by the Legislature itself, and involved no delegation of legislative authority. Laws may be absolute, dependent upon no contingency, or they may be subject to such conditions as the Legislature, in its wisdom, may impose. They may take effect only upon the happening of events which are future and uncertain; and, among others, the voluntary act of the parties upon whom they are designed to operate. They are not the less perfect and complete when passed by the Legislature, though future and contingent events may determine whether or not they shall ever take effect. In anticipation of invasion, or insurrection, or local disturbance, or other emergencies requiring the exercise of special powers, Acts are constantly passed, and yet no one has ever questioned their validity as laws, because dependent in their operation upon occasions which may never arise. So the Legislature may confer a power without desiring to enforce its exercise, and leave the question whether it shall be assumed, to be determined by the electors of a particular district. The Legislature may determine absolutely what shall be done, or it may authorize the same thing to be done upon the consent of third parties. It may command, or it may only permit; and in the latter case, as in the former, its acts have the efficacy of laws. So in the present case the commissioners were required to issue bonds to the holders of the approved claims, subject only to the condition that objection was not taken to their issuance in a particular manner. The authority in them was ample, and the obligation perfect, subject, it is true, to be suspended only upon one event, which has never happened. We confess our inability to perceive the force of the objection taken by the learned counsel of the Respondent to the validity of the act in question; and the authorities cited by him do not support his position. "Half the statutes on our books," says the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, in noticing a similar objection to an Act of the Legislature of that State, "are, in the alternative, depending on the discretion of some person or persons to whom is confided the duty of determining whether the proper occasion exists for executing them. But it cannot be said that the exercise of such a discretion is the making of the law. New privileges, conferred on a public corporation, need not be absolute and peremptory, so as to force them on the members against their consent. When individuals or corporations are merely authorized to do a thing, the doing of it necessarily depends on their own will; and we can see no reason why the acceptance of a new power, tendered to a public corporation, may not be made to depend on the will of the people, when it is expressed by themselves, as well as when it is spoken by the mouths of their officers and agents." (Moers v. City of Reading, 21 Penn. 202.) And on a similar question, the Supreme Court of Ohio observes that the true distinction "is between the delegation of power to make the law, which necessarily involves a

Blanding v. Burr.

---

---

Snodgrass v. Ricketts.

discretion as to what it shall be, and conferring an authority or discretion as to its execution, to be exercised under and in pursuance of the law. The first cannot be done; to the latter, no valid objection can be made." (The Cincinnati, Wilmington, and Zanesville Railroad Co. v. Commissioners of Clinton County, 1 Oh. State R. 88; see, also, Grant v. Courter, 24 Barb. 242; Clark v. City of Rochester, Id. 467.)

From the conclusions to which we have arrived, it follows that the District Court erred, and its judgment must be reversed, with instructions to enter judgment for the relator on the demurrer, and to award a peremptory writ, commanding the Respondents to sign and issue bonds to the relator for the amount of the claims held by him, which were approved by the Examiners under the Act of April 20th, 1858, upon the surrender of such claims for cancellation.

Ordered accordingly.

SNODGRASS v. RICKETTS et als.

Upon plaintiff's statement of his case, the Court intimates that, conceding the facts, he cannot recover, and the plaintiff then offers to prove his allegations; whereupon defendant admits they could be proved, and demurs to the evidence. Held: that this is not a demurrer to the evidence. It is rather deciding the case on the demurrer, or as on demurrer to the complaint, or as on motion for nonsuit.

If one man makes a bargain with another for land, the latter claiming the title and the right to sell it, and this is done in the presence and at the instigation of a third party who has the title, the third is estopped from setting up the title as against the purchaser, and all persons in privity with such third person are likewise estopped, unless they are purchasers for valuable consideration, without notice.

All the title which a vendor of land has at the time of his deed passes to the vendee, as against volunteers or donees, even though the deed, under which the vendor holds, be unrecorded.

APPEAL from the Sixth District.

Horace Smith for Appellant.

I. Demurrer to evidence is abolished by the code of practice. (1 Whitaker's Practice, 735.)

II. Should this judgment be reversed, then Appellant is entitled to final relief without any further trial. A demurrer to evidence, unlike one to a complaint, is an admission of all the facts averred, not for a particular purpose, but for all the purposes of the case. The facts themselves, and not merely the statement thereof, are admitted, and that for all purposes.

---

Snodgrass v. Ricketts.

---

Heydenfeldt, on the same side.

C. A. Johnson, for Respondent, Seymour. 1st. Did Snodgrass purchase with notice of the defendant Margaret Seymour's title? If he did, that ends the case. 2d. If he did not purchase with such notice, still he is remediless in a Court of Equity, in the present form of the action. The title deeds were all duly recorded long anterior to the plaintiff's purchase. The defendant, Kleas, is not the plaintiff's vendor or grantor, but stands in the position of a third party, and the plaintiff, as against her pre-existing paper title, purchased and took with notice. (Wood's Dig. Art. 369.) Again, a vendor of real property, much less a third party, like Mrs. Seymour, in this suit, when the title is a matter of public record, cannot be guilty of fraud, either actual or constructive, in reference to title. (Woodman v. Freeman, 12 Shep. 25 Maine, 531; Fisher v. Boody et al. 1 Curtis Cir. Court, 206.)

BALDWIN, J. delivered the opinion of the Court — TERRY, C. J. concurring.

This case, when it came on for trial, was, after the plaintiff's statement of his case, summarily disposed of by the Court, by its intimation that, conceding the plaintiff's statement to be true — that is, that he could establish the facts stated in the bill — he was not entitled to recover. We do not consider this a demurrer to the evidence. It was rather deciding the case on the demurrer, or as on demurrer to the complaint, or as on a motion for a non-suit. We mention this for the purpose of saying that if we remand the case on the ground of error in the judgment below, it will be sent back for a new trial.

It is only necessary to look into the bill to see whether the plaintiff has any cause of action; for if he has, and could have introduced any legal proof to sustain the complaint, he was entitled to do so.

The bill states that in January, 1859, at request of defendant, Ricketts, and defendant, Margaret Seymour, (then Kleas,) the plaintiff contracted with and purchased from Ricketts a third of a lot in Sacramento City for one thousand eight hundred dollars, and Ricketts executed a deed accordingly. Before and at the time of this purchase of Margaret and Ricketts, they declared to him, in the presence of each other, that Ricketts was the owner of one-third and Margaret of the other two-thirds of this lot, and plaintiff acted and paid his money on this assurance; that, before this, one Gardner had levied an attachment for some four hundred dollars, due by note made by these defendants, on this property, and got judgment; that this judgment was a lien upon this property at the time the plaintiff bought from Ricketts, and plaintiff afterwards, at the request of these defendants, paid it off. This was a part of the consideration money paid by plaintiff to Ricketts for the property. Bill avers further, that in November, 1853, these defendants made a note to — — — for one thousand dollars, at six months, five per cent. per month interest, and a mortgage was executed to secure this debt on this property; on this, plaintiff paid five hundred and fifty dollars, as a part of the price of the land; and that the balance of this one thousand eight hundred dollars, due by plaintiff, was paid by him to Ricketts, and divided between him and Margaret. The bill proceeds to state that in January, 1856, plaintiff caused, for the first time, a search to be made of the records for this lot, and then first discovered that Ricketts and Margaret Seymour had "no regular title," from John A. Sutter or his grantees, to the east half of this lot; but the title to this lot was in one Mumford; that Ricketts had only an undivided one-half interest in the east half of the west half of said lot, and that the title to the east half of Lot Number One, and the west half of Lot Number Two, and this undivided half interest in the east half of the west half of Lot Number Two, was in Margaret; that prior to plaintiff's purchase, the said Margaret had made a deed to Ricketts for the same; that the deed was not recorded, and after the purchase redelivered to Margaret fraudulently, and then by them destroyed; that Margaret, after the plaintiff's purchase and payment for it, in September, 1854, conveyed the whole of her title to her daughter Elizabeth Kleas — made a defendant — to the east half of the Lot Number One, the west one-half of Lot Number Two, and the undivided one-half interest in the east

---

---

Snodgrass v. Ricketts.

---

one-half of the west one-half of Lot Number Two; and this deed was without consideration and in fraud of plaintiff — Elizabeth well knowing the declarations of Thomas and Margaret as to the interest of Thomas, made at the time of plaintiff's purchase. Margaret afterwards intermarried with one Seymour — made defendant.

It is not necessary to go into an examination of the precise relief to which the plaintiff would be entitled upon these facts, assuming that he can make them out. The only question is, whether he is entitled to any. The case is so narrowed down to this simple statement: If one man makes a bargain with another for land, the latter claiming the title and the right to sell it, and this is done in the presence and at the instigation of a third party who has the title, is not the third estopped from setting up the title as against the purchaser? We think he is, and that all persons in privity with such third person are likewise estopped, unless they are purchasers for valuable consideration, without notice. But there is another fact stated, to wit: that Ricketts had a deed from Margaret at the time of this purchase, for a portion of this property; this deed was not recorded, but this was immaterial, so far as these parties and their rights were concerned. The subsequent redelivery of the deed and its destruction by Margaret did not affect the rights of the plaintiff, who took his title before this redelivery. Whatever right Ricketts had at the time of the deed passed to plaintiff. The subsequent deed by Margaret had no force to convey the property to mere volunteers and donees. The plaintiff would seem to have a good remedy in Chancery to clear his title of these alleged fraudulent obstructions, and, by a decree of the Court, to have it secured to him free from the possibility of subsequent sale, by these grantees, to a future purchaser—as the effect of such alienation might be to deprive him of his rights, if the vendee had no notice of them. We repeat that we do not decide anything here as to the form or measure of the plaintiff's relief, but only that the complaint shows title to some relief. We intimate, of course, no opinion on the facts as they really are, but assume them for the purpose of this decision, as they are stated in the complaint.

Decree reversed and cause remanded to be tried de novo.

Ordered accordingly.

Steinbach v. Leese.

---

STEINBACH v. LEESE et als.

PENDING a suit by two joint owners of land to recover possession, one conveys his half to the other, taking back a mortgage for the purchase-money, conditioned to become due when the mortgagor recovers possession by the suit, or compromise, or when he parts with his title. Held: that the mortgage does not become due by a sale of half the land to counsel employed to recover the possession, together with sales of most of the other half to various parties.

Such sales do not render a compliance with the conditions of the mortgage impossible. A recovery of the property by the vendees would meet the terms of the contract and make the money due.

If the property in the hands of the mortgagor could be charged with the payment of the sum sued for only upon the happening of an event in future, there is no reason why it should be sooner liable in the hands of the vendee. The vendees of the mortgagor succeed to his rights in the property, subject to such conditions and burdens as attach to it in his hands, but to no other.

APPEAL from the Twelfth District.

For case see opinion.

D. W. Perley, for Appellant.

1st. The complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. 2d. The instrument purporting to be a mortgage, on which the action is founded, never did become a lien or legal or equitable charge on the land set out in the complaint. 3d. The action was prematurely brought, and before any personal liability attached against the defendant, Leese. 4th. If any decree or foreclosure could be properly made, it could only be of such portion of the land in controversy as Leese had sold and conveyed to parties in actual possession. 5th. If Leese had actually sold out and conveyed the whole premises to parties in possession, the demand of twenty thousand dollars would not, even then, have constituted a lien on the land, but only a personal demand against him.

The complaint is defective in the following particulars:

1st. It is not averred that Leese was successful in the suit then pending for the recovery of the property. 2d. It is not averred that he has effected any compromise with the opposing claimants for the said property. It fails to show that the money was due at the time the action was instituted; because it is not averred that Leese has entered into, or taken possession of, the premises, by virtue of the judgment of any Court; because it is not averred that he has obtained possession by virtue of any compromise with the opposing claimants to the said property; because it is not averred that he has consummated any compromise with the opposing claimants for the relinquishment of his or their claim, to the said property. (Jewell v. Thompson, 2 Litt. 52; 1 Salkeld, 65; Bowen v. Ogden, 3 Harr. 124; 1 Saund. on Ev. 202; 1 Chitty, 322; Story on Con. Sec. 32; Tartar v. Hall, 3 Cal. 263; 4 Id. 47; Shrove v. Adams, 5 Id.)

The vendees of Leese would occupy his place, become clothed with all his rights, and subject to all his liabilities, so far as the property itself is concerned.

Campbell & Pratt, for Appellant, Clark.

B. S. Brooks, for Respondent.

I. The frame of the complaint is simple. The ground of relief is a unit. We say that the debt was to become payable upon the doing of Leese of a certain act — realizing a certain benefit, entering into possession or compromising — and we aver that he has, by his own proceedings, precluded the possibility of the events ever happening; that he has deprived himself of the power of doing what he, in effect, undertook to do, viz: To prosecute the claim to effect, and to enter, when entry was given, or compromise. He cannot recover possession of the whole, because he has alienated one-fourth in severalty. He cannot compromise the whole, for he has alienated seven-eighths of the residue, and he does not now hold more than one-eleventh or one-twelfth of the original claim, and can neither compromise nor get possession of the whole. It being clear, then, that the money can never become due, according to terms of the instrument, in consequence of the acts of the promisor, the debt is due instanter. (Berwick v. Swindles, 30 Eng. Com. Law, 251; Chitty, 635, 636, 638; Sands v. Clark, 8 C. B. 751, 762; Newcomb v. Brackett, 16 Mass. 165; Williams v. The Bank of United States, 2 Peters Ch. 102; Delamater v. Müller, 1 Cowen, 75; Frost v. Clarkson, 7 Cow. 27; Hogan v. Shee, 2 Esp. 522; Giles v. Edwards, 7 T. R. 181; Raymond v. Bearnard, 12 Johns. 274; White v. Snell, 5 Pick. 425; 9 Id. 16; Moon v. Guardians, etc. 3 Bing. N. C. 814; 5 Rep. 3 Mod. 285.)

II. We might contend that the mortgage had become due by its terms, because the defendant, Leese, has made some compromises. The third contingency is upon effecting any compromise with adverse claimants. The reason is obvious, because when he has released to a party in possession his title to a specific parcel, the other contingency can never happen, for he cannot then recover any portion of that lot in ejectment. Now the bill shows, and the answer admits, that he has sold specific parcels by metes and bounds, and the parties to whom he sold, or those claiming under them, are now before the Court setting up their titles — their adverse titles — Alcalde grants.

---

Steinbach v. Leese.

---

III. The defendant's counsel contends, that admitting our construction of the contract to be correct, and that Leese cannot perform his contract, yet that his vendees may.

If he had assigned the whole interest it would even then have been questionable whether the contract would not have been broken. But this is not the case. He has sold out certain parcels in severalty. He has conveyed a large part of the residue in divers fractional interests to various parties, and he retains a small fractional interest in the residue. If he cannot perform certainly they cannot. There is no community of interest. They are not tenants in common with Leese, and cannot join with him in any proceeding to carry out the intention of the contract. If the position is correct that there must be a recovery of possession of the whole, it is just as impossible to his vendees now as it is to him.

The record imparted to these defendants full notice of all that we claim. The first vendee knew that by taking that conveyance he was defeating the object of the contract between Leese and Vallejo. He knew the legal effect of it, and that by that very act he made the whole mortgage due. Those who took conveyances from Leese subsequently to this, took notice of that also, for the deeds were all recorded.

Defendant's counsel takes the position that if the sales made by Leese to the defendants who are in possession can be regarded in the light of "any compromise," that then the mortgage could only become due as to those lots, and then in a pro rata proportion.

1. We are not informed what that pro rata proportion is, nor how it is to be ascertained. Whether it is to be regulated by the territorial proportion of those lots to the whole claim, or by the proportion of their respective values; nor if the first, how the territorial proportion is to be ascertained, for the lines of the grant do not correspond with the present survey of the city, and a large part of the claim necessarily takes in a part of the public streets. 2. But those were the first parcels alienated, and it is a rule of equity, that when property mortgaged is alienated in parcels, the mortgage is to be enforced upon them in the inverse order of their alienation.

---

---

TERRY, C. J. delivered the opinion of the Court—FIELD, J. concurring.

This is a proceeding to foreclose a mortgage on certain property in San Francisco.

The complaint alleges that Leese and Salvador Vallejo were joint owners of the premises, under a grant from the Mexican Government; that in August, 1850, Vallejo conveyed to Leese his moiety of the property, and at the same time, and as part of the same transaction, Leese executed the mortgage declared on; the condition of which is, that Leese shall pay to Vallejo the sum of twenty thousand dollars, "in the event that the said party of the first part shall be successful in a certain suit now pending for the recovery of said property, as above described, or in the event that he shall effect a compromise with the opposing claimants for the said property; the said sum of twenty thousand dollars to be paid when the said Leese enters into and takes possession of the said premises, by virtue of the judgment of any Court, or by any compromise that may be entered into by the said Leese and the opposing claimants to the said property, or when said Leese shall consummate any compromise with the opposing claimants or the relinquishment of his or their claim," and it was also agreed that "in the event the said Leese shall enter into any compromise with the opposing claimants to the aforesaid property, for the relinquishment of, or withdrawal of, his or their claim to the said property, then he is to become personally responsible to the said party of the second part for the said sum of twenty thousand dollars."

The complaint further alleges, that in August, 1853, Leese conveyed to Gregory Yale one-half of said property for the nominal consideration of thirty thousand dollars, but really in consideration of Yale's services in prosecuting his claims to the property; that Leese made other conveyances to different persons of portions of the same property, retaining but a small interest therein.

---

Steinbach v. Leese.

---

That, by reason of these conveyances, Leese has "entirely precluded himself from the possibility of performing his agreement or undertaking," and that the sum of twenty thousand dollars became due and payable to Vallejo, under the agreement, on the 17th of August, 1853 — the date of the conveyance to Yale; that the other defendants, grantees of Leese, have interest in the property, which is "subsequent and subject to the lien of the plaintiff," and prays for a sale of the property to pay this sum due upon the mortgage, and a personal judgment against Leese for any deficiency," etc.

To this complaint a demurrer was interposed, which was overruled, and, after a trial of the issues made by the pleadings, a judgment was rendered for plaintiff, pursuant to the prayer of the complaint.

It will be perceived, from the terms of the instrument, that the sum mentioned was to be paid only upon the happening of one of the contingencies expressed in the instrument. It seems that Leese and Vallejo were the joint owners of real property which was held adversely by others. Leese, in effect, agreed to assume all the risk and expense of the litigation necessary to recovery upon the title, and agreed to pay a sum to his cotenant if he succeeded in the litigation, or effected a compromise with the adverse parties, by which he secured the possession, or parted with his title to the premises.

It is not alleged that Leese has "succeeded in the litigation which was pending at the time of the contract," that he has "entered into possession of the premises by virtue of the judgment of any Court," or that he has "consummated any compromise with the opposing claimants for the relinquishment of his or their claim." Yet these were conditions precedent to plaintiff's right to recover. It is said, however, that having by his own acts rendered the performance of the conditions of the contract impossible, therefore the conditions are dispensed with and the contract is absolute; the premises being admitted, the conclusion is irresistible; but we think the assumption that the acts of Leese set out in the complaint, have rendered impossible a compliance with the conditions of the contract, is erroneous. It is difficult to understand how the conveyance to Yale could be construed into a breach of the covenant to Vallejo. It seems to have been made in furtherance of the very object of the contract. The consideration of the agreement, says the complaint, was the services of Yale in prosecuting the claim. The employment of counsel was absolutely necessary to the conduct of the litigation, and certainly the adoption of a mode of compensation which was calculated to stimulate the zeal of counsel, by making his compensation depend upon the success of his efforts, could not injuriously affect Vallejo.

Steinbach v. Leese.

---

Nor do we perceive that the other conveyances mentioned amount to a breach of the terms of the contract, or render it impossible that the event upon which the sum was to become due to Vallejo should occur. In construing a contract, it is necessary, in order to arrive at the meaning and intention of the parties, that we should consider the situation of parties, the motive which led to, and the object sought to be obtained by, such contract. Leese and Vallejo claimed title to valuable property, which was held adversely, and about which a suit was pending. The motive of Vallejo, in entering into the contract, was to avoid the risk and expense of doubtful litigation, and the object to be attained was the maintenance of the grant to Leese and Vallejo, the recovery of possession by the owners of the grant, and the payment to Vallejo of the price agreed on. It was not necessary that Leese himself should recover; a recovery by any one claiming under him would sufficiently meet the requirements of the contract.

The vendees of Leese succeeded to his rights in the property, subject to such conditions and burdens as attached to it in the hands of their vendor, but to no other; and if the property in the hands of Leese could be charged with the payment of the sum sued for, only upon the happening of an event in future, we see no reason why it should be sooner liable in the hands of the vendee.

It is not alleged that possession of the property has been acquired by any of the grantees of Leese, that the title has passed to the adverse holders, or that the efforts to establish the grant and recover under it, have been abandoned or suspended, in consequence of the conveyances from Leese.

---

---

We think the complaint does not contain facts enough to authorize a recovery, and that the demurrer should have been sustained.

Judgment reversed and cause remanded.

---

ORD v. STEAMER UNCLE SAM.

A SPECIFIC allegation of a contract, in a verified complaint, is not sufficiently controverted by an answer stating that defendant has no knowledge or information respecting the same, and therefore denies the same; and no evidence of the contract would be necessary.

A contract, under Section 817, Practice Act, for the transportation of passengers from San Francisco to New York is an entirety, whether the entire voyage is to be performed in one vessel or not.

And a breach of such contract at any point, as leaving the passenger on the Isthmus, renders the vessel liable.

State Courts have jurisdiction in such cases, as per Warner v. Uncle Sam (9 Cal. 697).

APPEAL from the Seventh District.

Action against the defendant for breach of contract alleged to have been entered into on the part of defendant, by her agents and owners, to transport the plaintiff and his family, consisting of his mother-in-law and two children, to New York via Nicaragua, averring a deviation—transportation to Panama and detention there for seventeen days. Also, that plaintiff suffered greatly through mental anxiety—expended large sums of money in board, lodging, etc. at Panama, and suffered greatly through loss of time; also, averring damage by reason of sickness suffered by his daughter, and expenditure of large sums of money caused thereby.

The deviation is charged to have been willful on the part of agents and owners of defendant. Plaintiff demands judgment for ten thousand dollars damages and costs.

The complaint is verified, and is answered on the part of the defendant by Charles H. Baldwin, agent to the contract, as follows:

“That as to the contract alleged and set forth in said complaint, the defendant has no knowledge respecting the same, nor any information respecting the same, and the defendant therefore denies the existence or the making of such contract, and controverts each and every allegation in the complaint in reference thereto.

---

Ord v. Steamer Uncle Sam.

---

And whether the said plaintiff, or his family, or any or either of them, took passage in the said steamer Uncle Sam, for San Juan del Sur, and were transported to Panama, as stated in said complaint, the defendant has no knowledge or information sufficient to form a belief, and therefore denies the same," etc.

Plaintiff, having introduced his proof, rested; when, on motion of defendant, a nonsuit was granted, on the ground that the contract was not proved as alleged.

Whitman & Wells, for Appellant.

The answer does not deny the contract liability. (Pr. Act, Sec. 46; Curtis v. Richards & Vantine, 9 Cal. 33; Humphreys et al v. McCall et al. Id. 59; San Francisco Gas Co. v. The City, Id. 453; Edwards v. Lent, How. Pr. 8, 28; Thorn v. N. Y. Central Mills, 10 Id. 19; Chapman v. Palmer, 12 Id. 37.)

Delos Lake, for Respondent. The question upon the sufficiency of the answer should have been made in the Court below, either by demurrer, as was done in the case of Curtis v. Richards, (9 Cal. 33,) or by motion to strike out the answer as sham or frivolous under Sec. 50 of the Practice Act.

The dictum to the contrary in Humphreys v. McCall, (9 Cal. 59,) is clearly wrong. (Sec. 68, Pr. Act.)

The fair interpretation of sections forty-six and sixty-five of the Practice Act, taken together, is that the general issue or a general denial, pleaded to a sworn complaint, is void. But the same consequences by no means follow when the answer contains a specific denial defectively stated. In such case, if the plaintiff elects to go to trial without objection to the error of mere form, he waives all objections to the sufficiency of the answer.

But, if the objection be available at the trial, the question remains whether the plaintiff can omit to notice it there and proceed with his proofs on the theory that the answer is sufficient, and for the first time spring the objection in the Appellate Court.

Now, although admissions in the pleadings may, under our system, be read as evidence to the jury, yet, it must appear that their attention was called to it in some way during the trial. (Wilks v. Forest, 2 Duer, 317.) But the denial in the answer is positive. The language is, "denies the existence or making of such contract." What precedes this positive denial is merely surplusage.

---

Ord. v. Steamer Uncle Sam.

---

This case was argued twice. The first opinion, delivered by BURNETT, J. — TERRY, C. J. concurring, is as follows:

This suit was brought to recover damages for the non-performance of a contract to transport the plaintiff and his family from San Francisco to New York. Upon the trial the plaintiff was nonsuited, from which judgment he appealed.

1. It is insisted by the counsel of defendant that there was a fatal variance between the contract alleged and that which was proved. But upon looking into the answer, there is no proper denial of the contract as alleged in the complaint. (Humphreys v. McCall, 9 Cal. 59; Curtis v. Richards, Id. 83.)

2. The second ground relied upon to sustain the judgment of nonsuit is that the contract declared on being for the entire transportation to New York, there was no lien on the Uncle Sam for the breach of it, and no suit could, therefore, be sustained against the vessel.

The code provides that "all steamers, vessels, and boats, shall be liable for non-performance or mal-performance of any contract for the transportation of persons or property, made by their respective owners, masters, agents, or consignees." (Sec. 317.)

It will be seen that under this provision the contract for transportation must be made with the "owners, masters, agents, or consignees," of the vessel. It is perfectly competent for the persons mentioned to make a contract for the transportation of persons or property from any one port to another; and the contract, when made, is an entirety, and must be enforced as such. The language of the clause is general, and not restricted to the single case where the entire voyage is to be performed by one vessel. If we give the clause the construction contended for, the logical result must be that no suit could be maintained against the vessel, unless, by the terms of the contract, that vessel was to make the entire voyage.

---

In this case the contract was entire, and a failure at any point was a violation of the contract, for which the vessel was liable. The contract itself was made with the agents of the owners, and they had as much right to bind the vessel for the entire contract as for a part.

In case the defendant was only liable for the mal-performance which might occur between the ports of San Francisco and San Juan del Sur, and the vessel on the Atlantic side only liable for a violation on that part of the route, who would be liable for a violation of the contract on the Isthmus? And if the contract had been violated on all these different portions of the entire route, then three different suits would have been necessary upon the same contract. In that case, the owners of the vessel might well complain that an entire cause of action had been split up into three different parts, to their injury.

3. The question of jurisdiction was decided by this Court in the case of Warner v. The Uncle Sam, (9 Cal. 697.)

Judgment reversed, and cause remanded for further proceedings.

The second opinion was delivered by TERRY, C. J. — FIELD, J. concurring.

This was an action for the breach of a passenger contract.

The Court below nonsuited the plaintiff, on the ground that the contract was not proven as set out in the complaint.

This was an error; the specific allegations of the contract in the complaint was not sufficiently controverted by the answer, and no evidence on this point was necessary under the rule announced by this Court in the San Francisco Gas Co. v. City of San Francisco, (9 Cal. 453.) The defendants can amend their answer so as to require further proof than was necessary under the answer as it now stands. Judgment reversed, and cause remanded.

Waterman v. Smith.

WATERMAN et al. v. SMITH.

On the 21st January, 1842, the Mexican Government granted to the Indian Chief, Francisco Solano, a tract of land called Suisun, covering four square leagues, within exterior limits, embracing about eight leagues. On the 4th of March, 1840, the same government granted to Armijo a tract of land called Tolenas, covering three leagues, within exterior limits embracing from twelve to twenty leagues. The maps referred to in both grants cover the land in controversy. Upon final confirmation and survey a patent was issued, January 18th, 1857, by the United States to Ritchie, successor in interest to Solano, for four leagues of land, with the specific description of the official survey by the United States. This patent covers the land in dispute. The grant to Armijo, from whom defendant traced title, was confirmed by the United States District Court, and stands on appeal to the Supreme Court. Assuming that Armijo occupied and claimed, from the entire quantity comprehended within the map referred to in his grant, three specific leagues covering the land in controversy. Held: that the patent is conclusive against the defendant, unless he shows title superior to the patent, under a confirmed Spanish or Mexican grant located under those governments, or under the government of the United States.

Held: that the grants to Solano and Armijo passed a present and immediate interest in the quantity of land specifically designated in their respective grants, to be afterwards surveyed and laid off within the exterior limits of the general tracts by the government; that such survey could only be made under the former government by its officers and could not be made by the grantees themselves; that the right of survey passed, with other public rights, to the government of the United States, and is to be exercised in pursuance of its policy, and in conformity with its laws; that by its legislation the subject of surveys is intrusted to the Executive Department; that the location of confirmed grants when the quantity granted is without specific boundaries, lying within a larger tract, rests exclusively with such department, and cannot be reviewed or corrected by the judiciary, but is binding and conclusive upon it in actions of ejectment, except only when the patent issued thereon conflicts with prior rights of third parties, and then in its inconclusiveness is maintained, only so far as may be necessary for the protection of such prior rights.

Occupation and cultivation can have no greater effect than a private survey. They were without binding effect upon the Mexican Government, and are equally inoperative under the new.

The location of the specific quantity may be made by a survey of such quantity, or by grants with specific boundaries of such parts of the general tract as will reduce it to such specific quantity. Either course will give precision to the claim of the grantee. So long as there remains within the general tract sufficient land to satisfy the quantity specified in his grant, the grantee is without remedy.

Where the dividing line between the two grants was fixed by an award between the parties, the award was conclusive until the action of the government. But the government having issued a patent to Ritchie of a portion of the land included in the general tract designated in the grant to Armijo, it does not lie in the mouth of the latter to complain, there still remaining of such general tract more than sufficient to satisfy the specific quantity granted to him. If the patentee accepted the land described in his patent as answering his claim, other persons cannot complain, even if a portion of the land thus taken was without the boundaries of his original claim.

The limitation of quantity was a controlling condition of the grants in question, and the delivery of juridical possession was an essential ceremony under the government of Mexico, to perfect the title of the grantees to the specific quantity designated.

The essential and substantive acts under the law of 1851, are the confirmation and survey. The patent is only evidence of the pre-existing title made perfect by these acts. Upon the original grant, final confirmation and approved survey, the plaintiffs might have relied, without reference to the patent.

The title of the parties claiming under Solano became perfect from the time of the approved survey of the United States. On the other hand, the title under the grant to Armijo did not attach to any three specific leagues; it constituted only an interest in such quantity, to be afterwards laid off by

Waterman v. Smith.

- competent authority. Such general interest cannot be set up as a defense to the claim of plaintiffs. The patent is conclusive evidence of the right of the patentee to the land described therein — not only as between himself and the United States, but as between himself and a third person, who has not a superior title from a source of paramount proprietorship.
- The survey having been made in July, 1855, Ritchie having died in July, 1856, the patent, dated January, 1857, is to be regarded as if it had received the signature of the president at the completion of the segregation of the land.
- The Act of Congress (May 20th, 1836) vesting the title of public lands, patented to a person, dead at the date of the patent, in "the heirs, devisees, or assigns of the deceased patentee," was intended to cover all cases where any rights belonging to the United States existed in lands which could be relinquished by patent, even though the lands were not strictly public lands.
- The third persons against whose interests by the 15th Section of the Act of 1851, the final confirmation and patent are not conclusive, are those whose title is at the time such as to enable them to resist successfully, any action of the government in respect to it. Parties holding claims which may be located without the boundaries of the patent, and still within the limits of the general tract designated in the grants to them, do not constitute such third persons, nor do parties who hold claims only upon the bounty of the government, nor do intruders, nor even settlers, having certificates of sale, unless the same ante-date the presentation of the claim of the patentee to the Board of Land Commissioners for California, to which period the patent takes effect by relation. The interests of the third persons, intended by the act, would have been as effectually protected without its provisions, as they are now by them. The section in question is only a legislative recognition of a principle of law and justice, applicable to all grants.
- The fact that a grant was not approved by the Departmental Assembly does not impair the title.
- Such approval simply discharges the grant from liability to defeasance by the Mexican Government, except for breach of its conditions subsequent.
- No law authorizes a forfeiture of any rights of property, under a Mexican grant, for any act or omission on the part of the grantee since the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo.
- The grant of Armijo, being of three leagues within a much larger area, and no survey having been made, gave him no title to any specific three leagues of land, which would enable him to defend against ejectment on a patent.

APPEAL from the Seventh District.

The Appellants, plaintiffs below, brought an action of ejectment against Respondent, as defendant, for a parcel of land lying in the county of Solano. The title relied on by the plaintiffs and with which they connected themselves, may be found in the case of The United States v. Ritchie, 17 How. S. C. 534-537, fully set forth. The chain of title commences with a petition of Francisco Solano to the Commandant-General, M. G. Vallejo, who was the Director of Colonization, for a grant "of the land of the Suisun, together with its known appurtenances."

The following is a copy of the petition:

"To the Commandant-General:

Francisco Solano, principal chief of the unconverted Indians, and born Captain of the 'Suisun,' in due form before your Honor, represents: That, being a free man, and owning a sufficient number of cattle and horses to establish a rancho, he solicits from the strict justice and goodness of your Honor, that you be pleased to grant him the land of the 'Suisun,' with its known appurtenances, which are a little more or less than four square leagues from the 'Portzuela to the Salina de Sacha.' Said land belongs to him by hereditary right from his ancestors, and he is actually in possession of it; but he wishes to revalidate his rights in accordance with the existing laws of our Republic and of the Colonization recently decreed by the Supreme Government.

He therefore prays that your Honor be pleased to grant him the land which he asks for, and procure for him from the proper sources the titles which may be necessary for his security, and that you will also admit this on common paper, there being none of the corresponding stamp in this place.

(Signed)

FRANCISCO SOLANO.

SONOMA, January 16, 1837."

Upon this petition the following order is made:

"SONOMA, January 18, 1837.

The undersigned grants, temporarily and provisionally, to Francisco Solano, Chief of the tribes of this frontier and Captain of the 'Suisun,' the lands of that name, as belonging to him by natural right and actual possession. Said land is comprehended between the 'Portzuela and the Salina de Sacha.' The party interested will ask from the government of the State the usual titles, in order to make valid his rights in conformity with the new order of Colonization.

(Signed)

M. G. VALLEJO."

On the 15th of January, 1842, Solano presented a petition to Governor Alvarado for a full grant of the same land, accompanying it with the petition above referred to, to the Director of Colonization, and the marginal decree made by that officer, stating in his petition to the Governor that he is in actual possession of the land known by the name of "Suisun," together with its dependencies, and asking for a perpetual grant of the same. That petition is as follows:

"[SEAL.]

To His Excellency, the Governor:

The undersigned a resident of Sonoma, respectfully appears

---

Waterman v. Smith.

---

before your Excellency, and representation makes, that in virtue of the rights which belong to him, as shown in the annexed petition and marginal decree, he is in actual possession of the land known by the name of 'Suisun,' together with its dependencies; and, in order to secure and legalize said ownership, he humbly petitions that your Excellency, in consideration of the document referred to, may be pleased to grant him the corresponding title of concession, perpetual and hereditary, of the aforesaid land in order that in no time may the petitioner or his heirs be molested in the pacific enjoyment of his property.

Wherefore, your petitioner prays that your Excellency will deign to grant him the favor which he asks for, he swearing that he is actuated by no malice, and such other oath as is required, etc. etc.

As Attorney of the petitioner,

(Signed)

JUAN ANTONIO VALLEJO.

MONTEREY, January 15, 1842."

On this petition the Governor makes the following order:

"MONTEREY, January 20, 1842.

In consideration of the petition at the beginning of this expediente, the report of the Commandant-General, and the merits and services of the Indian called Francisco Solano, rendered on the frontier of Sonoma, I declare him to be owner in fee of the place called 'Suisun,' in extent four square leagues, and with the boundaries shown in the corresponding map. The corresponding patent will be made out, and this expediente directed to the most excellent Departmental Junta for its approbation.

Juan B. Alvarado, Constitutional Governor of the Department of the Californias, thus ordered, decreed, and signed, of which I certify."

On the 21st of January, 1842, the title in form was granted him, and on the 3d of October, 1845, the grant was approved by the Departmental Assembly, upon the report of a committee made on the expediente, "formed at the instance of the Indian, Francisco Solano," as follows:

---

Waterman v. Smith.

---

" [SEAL.]

Juan B. Alvarado, Const'l Governor of the Dept. of the Californias:

Whereas, the aboriginal, Francisco Solano, for his own personal benefit and that of his family, has asked for the land known by the name of 'Suisun,' of which place he is a native, and chief of the tribes of the frontier of Sonoma, and being worthy of reward for the quietness which he caused to be maintained by that unchristianized people; the proper proceedings and examinations having previously been made, as required by the laws and regulations; using the powers conferred on me in the name of the Mexican nation, I have granted to him the above-mentioned land, adjudicating to him the ownership of it. By these presents, being subject to the approbation of the most excellent Departmental Junta, and to the following conditions, to-wit:

1. That he may inclose it, without prejudice to the crossings, roads, and servitudes, and enjoy it freely and exclusively, making such use and cultivation of it as he may see fit; but within one year he shall build a house, and it shall be inhabited.

2. He shall ask the magistrate of the place to give him juridical possession of it, in virtue of this order, by whom the boundaries shall be marked out; and he shall place in them, besides the landmarks, some fruit or forest trees of some utility.

3. The land herein mentioned is to the extent of four 'sitios de ganado mayor' (four square leagues) with the limits as shown on the map accompanying the respective expediente. The magistrate who gives the possession will have it measured according to ordinance, leaving the excess that may result to the nation, for its convenient uses.

4. If he shall contravene these conditions, he shall lose his right to the land, and it may be denounced by another.

In consequence, I order that these presents be held firm and valid, that a register be taken of it in the proper book, and that it be given to the party interested, for his voucher and other purposes.

Given this twenty-fifth day of January, one thousand eight hundred and forty-two, at Monterey.

“MOST EXCELLENT SIR:—

The Committee on Vacant Lands has ordered the expediente, formed at the instance of the Indian, (Indigena,) Francisco Solano, for the place known by the name of ‘Suisun,’ and being satisfied that the proceedings had in the said expediente were sufficient for the purpose that the Superior Government should have granted the said place, offers to the deliberation of your Excellency the following proposition:—

The grant made by the Supreme Government of the Department by a title legally issued, with the date 28th January, 1842, in favor of the Indian, (Indigena,) Francisco Solano, of the place known by the name of ‘Suisun,’ and situated in the jurisdiction of Sonoma, in accordance with the law of August 18, 1824, and Article five of the Regulations of November, 1828, is approved.

Hall of the Committee, in the City of Los Angeles, September 29, 1845.

(Signed)

FRANCISCO DE LA GUERRA.

(Signed)

MARCESO BARTOLA.”

“ANGELES, Oct. 3, 1845.

In session of this day, the proposition of the foregoing report was approved by the most excellent Departmental Assembly ordering the original expediente to be returned to his Excellency the Governor, for suitable purposes.

(Signed)

Pro Proo,
President.

(Signed)

Augustin Olona, Secretary.”

On the same day the proper copy was issued to the party interested.

The Appellants established by several mesne conveyances and other proof, their connection with the above mentioned grant to Solano, through Archibald A. Ritchie, deceased, and likewise offered in evidence a patent of the United States, bearing date the 17th day of January, 1857, issued to said Ritchie, covering the land in controversy. It was likewise in proof that the land sued for was in the county of Solano, and it was admitted that defendant was in possession of the same.

---

Waterman v. Smith.

---

The Respondent pretended to hold under a grant to one José Francisco Armijo, and to connect himself with it by proper mesne conveyances. From these documents, it appears that on the 22d of November, 1839, José Francisco Armijo presented to M. G. Vallejo, the Commandant-General and Director of Colonization, a petition asking for a grant of the place known by the name of Tolenas, which extends from the place so-called to the Ololatos Creek, containing about three leagues of land, more or less, "and joins with the rancho of Suisun." This is the language of the petitioner in the description of the land selected by himself, as appears from the petition which follows:

Senor Commandant-Generals

José Francisco Armijo, by birth a Mexican, before your Honor, in the manner which may be best for me in the law, say:

"That having four sons, natives of the same country, without owning any lands to cultivate, finding myself owner of about one hundred head of cattle, the product of which I annually lose, supplicate that your Honor will be pleased to concede to me the place known to me by the name of Tolenas, that in company with my son, Antonio Maria, I dedicate myself to the cultivation of my own land and the breeding of cattle, with the understanding that the land which I solicit is from the place already mentioned to Ololatos Creek, containing about three leagues of land, more or less, and it joins with the Suisun Rancho.

For this I pray that you will be pleased to decree as I have petitioned, for which I respectfully forward herewith the map.

This favor I shall perpetuate on my memory.

Does not know how to sign.

SONOMA, Nov. 22d, 1839."

On the same day Vallejo makes an order on the margin of this petition allowing Armijo to occupy the place of Tolenas, "which joins with" (lindra is the word used in response to the language of the petition) "the rancho of Suisun;" enjoining it upon him to take pains not to molest in any manner whatever the Indians who live there or the neighbors; to endeavor to win their confidence, and to give notice of any act of rebellion which may occur, or any sign of rebellion he may observe, and to communicate in every instance with the Chief of Suisun, with whom, by reason of his being in the immediate neighborhood, it will be convenient to advise whatever may conduce to the lives and tranquillity of the settlers.

---

Waterman v. Smith.

---

Here follows the marginal order or decree:

“SONOMA, November 22d, 1839.

The place of Los Tolenas, which joins with the Rancho of Suisun, can be occupied by the interested party, José Francisco Armijo, on account of its being vacant, and not being private property.

The interested party shall also take pains not to molest, in any manner whatever, the Indians who live there nor the neighbors. He shall try to attract the former without violence, inspiring them with confidence. He shall give immediate notice to the military commander of the frontier if any act of rebellion should occur, or should he observe any sign of rebellion among the wild Indians, and he shall communicate in every instance with the Chief of Suisun, to whom, by his being in the immediate neighborhood, it will be convenient to advise whatever may conduce to the lives and tranquillity of the settlers.

Apply with this decree to the political authority, that it may serve him as a legal step, and that the grant be made to him, unless there should be some other obstacle to his obtaining the necessary title.

M. G. VALLEJO.”

Subsequently, Armijo presented a petition to the Prefect of the First District, asking for a grant of the same land in accordance with the law of colonization. This document is without date. It is as follows:

“ [SEAL.]

Señor Prefect of the First District:

José Frasn<sup>o</sup>. Armijo, by birth a Mexican, before your Honor, in the manner which may be best for me in the law, say: that having permission from the Commander-General to occupy the land which I indicate in the accompanying petition, solicit the ownership of said land in accordance with the laws of colonization, by which, and under its auspices, I believe myself entitled to.

I supplicate that your honor will give the necessary directions to this, my petition, for which I shall always be grateful, swearing it is not through malice and whatever is unnecessary, etc. etc. I do not know how to sign."

On the 29th February, 1840, the Prefect, Castro, made the following order on this petition:

"MONTERREY, 29th February, 1840.

The party interested in this petition having resorted to the prefecture under my charge, let it be carried up to his Excellency, the Governor of the Department, with the corresponding report.

CASTRO."

The prefect accompanies this order with the following report:

"Most Excellent Señor Governor:

The prefecture being informed of the petition which José Francisco Armijo makes in claiming the land which he indicates, and of the order of the Señor Commander-General, no obstacle is found to the concession which the government ought to decree, provided the party interested obtains the necessary requisites to be attended to, and that the place which he solicits is found to be entirely vacant.

JOSE CASTRO."

The Governor made a grant to Armijo on the foregoing documents, which grant was offered in evidence by the Respondent in the Court below. It bears date the 4th of March, 1841. The land granted is stated to be three leagues, (see 4th condition,) as shown by the map which accompanies the expediente. The map here referred to, was presented with the petition to the Commandant-General. This grant contains the conditions usually found in the grants, (see Fremont's Case, 17 How. 545; Fossat's Case, 20 How. 426; and Ritchie's Case, 17 How.) and the unusual one that "through no motive whatever shall he molest the Indians, who are there located, nor the immediate neighbors with whom he adjoins."

The following is the grant:

Waterman v. Smith.

---

" [SEAL]

Juan B. Alvarado, Constitutional Governor of the Department of the Californias:

As the citizen, José Francisco Armijo, has claimed for his personal benefit and that of his family the land known as Tolenas, adjoining the Suisun Creek, to the estuary of Julpines, to the Ololatos Creek, and to the mountains. The necessary forms and investigations having been previously attended to, according to what is determined by the laws and regulations by virtue of the authority in me vested, I have, in the name of the Mexican nation, ceded to him the mentioned land, by these presents, declaring it his property, subject to the approval of the most excellent Junta Departmental, and on the following conditions:

1st. Through no motive whatever shall he molest the Indians who are there located, nor the immediate neighbors with whom he adjoins.

2d. He can fence it in without damage to the trails, roads, and by-ways; he shall enjoy it freely and exclusively, appropriating it to the use or cultivation which may best suit him, but he shall within one year build a house which shall be inhabited.

3d. He shall request the proper Judge to give him juridical possession by virtue of this dispatch, by whom the boundaries shall be marked out; within which limits, in addition to the landmarks, he shall plant some fruit trees or some useful wild ones.

4th. The land referred to consists of three leagues as shown by the map accompanying the expediente. The Judge who may give possession shall cause it to be measured according to law. the overplus to remain in possession of the nation for such uses as may be convenient.

5th. Should he not comply with these conditions he will lose his right to the land and it may be denounced by another. Therefore, this title being as firm and valid, I order that it be registered in the proper book, and that it be delivered to the party interested for his security and other ends.

Given in Monterey on the fourth of March, eighteen hundred and forty.

JUAN B. ALVARADO.

---

Waterman v. Smith.

---

Notice taken of this dispatch in the Book of Records for the adjudication of vacant lands on the first page succeeding.

His Excellency, the Governor, has ordered that notice of this title be taken in the prefecture of the first district."

The Respondent connected himself with this title through conveyances from José F. Armijo to one D. K. Berry and from Berry to himself.

The grant to Armijo was not authenticated by the signature of the Secretary, nor was it approved by the Departmental Assembly.

It was proven that Solano lived within the bounds of the Suisun Rancho up to the time of his death. He had a rancheria of Indians there of the Suisun tribe. Solano died in 184-. Armijo lived within the map of the rancho of Tolenas until his death, in 1849. Antonio Armijo, his son, resided within the same bounds until his death, in 1850 or 1851. The Armijos did not reside on the same spot within the bounds of the map of Tolenas; he resided first at a spot some two miles south of the Rancheria Tolenas, then removed to a spot one and a half miles east of the first settlement, where he died, which latter spot is in the neighborhood of the locus in quo. The Rancheria de Tolenas is near the forks of the creeks coming down from the mountains and forming the Suisun Creek, or about three miles above the dry gulch.

It was established by the evidence of a practical surveyor, Swan, that the deseño of Suisun contains some eight or nine leagues of land, (only four leagues were granted to Solano,) and it was likewise shown by a practical surveyor who had made an estimate of the superficial area, that the deseño of Tolenas contained twenty leagues, of which three were conceded to J. Francisco Armijo. Swan also states that there are in the deseño of Tolenas twelve leagues.

It appears from some documentary testimony offered in the court below by the Respondent, that some time in 1847, or previously, a controversy had arisen between M. G. Vallejo, (who was at that time owner of the rancho of Suisun,) and Armijo the grantee of Tolenas, which resulted in the institution of an action of trespass by Vallejo against Armijo before Alcalde L.

---

Waterman v. Smith.

---

W. Boggs. The Respondent's counsel formally offered this evidence by calling Boggs, to prove that such a transaction took place before him in 1847, and that Prudon, a Frenchman, wrote the award which concludes the controversy. Witnesses were subpoenaed, and a summons issued to Armijo, the defendant, returnable on the third Monday in August, 1847. On that day the parties, Vallejo and Armijo, appeared in court, and the court was informed that the parties had agreed to refer the matter to arbitration. The parties selected the arbitrators, who were duly sworn, and an award was presented as their decision of the controversy. It (the award,) was entered on the record as part of the case, and the whole was offered in the court below as one record. It was signed by the arbitrators and the parties, plaintiff and defendant. It was in proof that the award and translation were written by the same person, one Prudon. Here follows the award:

“ We, the undersigned, appointed arbitrators by and for Mariano G. Vallejo and Francisco Armijo, to decide on the question existing between them, for having the last trespassed his limits, and usurping part of the land belonging to farm of first; as it is expressed in the complaint presented before the Alcalde of the jurisdiction, L. W. Boggs, and after hearing the declaration of both parties and examination made of the proofs and documents presented to us: we find that the limits of each farm are clearly determined in their respective titles, being those of the Tolenas farm according to the said the Suisun Creek which runs to the N. N. E. of Suisun, and beginning from thence at the first limits mentioned, there are to be measured three leagues running at E. N. E. as the ridge (sierra) runs, leaving the said ridge the natural limits which laying between the two farms, separate them, leaving one at the north and the other at the south. Thus neither of the both parties is prejudicated, and the titual meaning of the respective titles to both farms are fulfilled with, and in order to so not burden one part more than another, the costs of the judgment and those of the tribunal ought to be paid equally by both parties.

And for the fulfillment of the contents of this present writing

The counsel for Respondent contended that this award was conclusive of the action in his favor; although he afterwards moved to strike it out, near the conclusion of the case, which motion was denied. The subject matter of this controversy will be understood from the award, which discloses the fact that the action was brought on account of an alleged trespass committed by Armijo on the land of Vallejo. This award was made, as it states, on the proofs and documents presented by the parties—the documents were doubtless the expedients of the titles of Solano and Armijo. One of the arbitrators testifies that the deseños of both were presented to the arbitrators.

Testimony was likewise offered by Respondent to show that M. G. Vallejo and Ritchie had stated that the arroyo seco, or dry gulch, was the line on the north of the Suisun grant, and upon this it was contended by counsel for Respondent, that such admissions fixed the boundary at the dry gulch. The Judge charged the jury in relation to it, but the view taken of the case by the court renders any further statement on this point unnecessary.

There were many minor points as to striking out, admitting and rejecting evidence, which are not presented, because not passed on by the Court. The plaintiffs, however, asked for certain instructions to the jury, which were refused. They may be found in the latter part of the opinion of the Court as the first, third, sixth, seventh, eighth, and ninth, instructions.

The cause was tried before a jury, who, under the charge of the Court, rendered a verdict for defendant, whereupon judgment was entered.

An application being made for a new trial, was denied. Plaintiffs appeal.

Thornton, Williams & Thornton, for Appellants.

I. The Courts of the State should conform their decisions to those of the Supreme Court of the United States, on questions involving the alienation of the public domain, the effect of titles derived from the United States, the interpretation of treaties, and acts of Congress.

This has been the uniform doctrine of the Supreme Court of the United States, and the Courts of the States have followed it.

The ground upon which this doctrine rests is derived from the Constitution of the United States, (see Art. 4, Sec. 3,) which invests Congress with the power "to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory and other property of the United States." Such has been the uniform ruling of the Supreme Court of the United States in a series of cases. (Wilcox v. Jackson, 13 Pet. 516, 517; Bagnell v. Broderick, Id. 450, 451; Irvine v. Marshall, 2 How. 566, 567; Pontalba v. Copland, 3 Ann. La. 86-88; Boyd v. Montgomery, 6 Mo. 514; Mackay v. Dillon, 7 Id. 10; United States v. Wiggins, 14 Peters, 350; Gugnon's Lessee v. Astor, 2 How. 344; Strother v. Lucas, 12 Peters, 454; Loddell v. Clark, 4 Ann. La. 99, 100; Purvis v. Harmanson, 4 Ann. La. 422; Foley v. Harrison, 5 Ann. La. 87; Lott v. Prudhomme, 3 Rob. La. 295, 296; Hallett v. Hunt, 7 Ala. 882, 900-902; Ganache v. Piquignot, 16 How. 468; Gunn v. Bates, 6 Cal. 271.)

II. The grant to Armijo is in its nature and essence, executory and not executed. It gives to the grantee jus ad rem, not jus in re. It confers on him the right to three leagues of land, to be afterwards surveyed and laid off to him, within the territory described in the deseño or map by official authority, but the grant did not, nor does it now, attach the title to any particular land. To this extent, there vests in him a present and immediate interest.

This we conceive to be the legal effect and proper construction of such a grant, as clearly defined by the Supreme Court of the United States, in Fremont's Case, (17 How. 542, 558, 559.) The grant to Armijo, offered in evidence, is substantially the same as the grant to Alvarado, of which Fremont was the assignee. (17 How. 545, 546.) The third and fourth conditions are identical. These conditions are common to nearly all the grants made under the colonization laws. (Ritchie's Case, 17 How. 536; Reading's Case, 18 How. 2; Cambuston's Case, 20 How. 61; Fossat's Case, Id. 426; Fossat's Case, 20 Id. 426; Paschal v. Perez, 7 Texas, 367; Edwards v. James, Id. 379; Hancock v. McKinney, Id. 449; Menard v. Massey, 8 How. 305-308, etc.; United States v. King, 3 Id. 773-786; Lessieur v. Price, 12 Id. 59; Stoddard v. Chambers, 2 How. 317; Barry v. Gamble, 3 Id. 51; Rutherford v. Graves' Heirs, 2 Wheat. 196; Neal v. E. T. College, 6 Yerger, 190; West v. Cochran, 17 How. 403, 414-416; Kissell v. St. Louis Public Schools, 18 Id. 19-25; Elliott v. Piersol, 1 Pet. 341; Cooper v. Roberts, 18 Id. 173; Gaines v. Nicholson, 9 Id. 304, 305, 356; Stanford v. Taylor, 18 Id. 409; Bissell v. Penrose, 8 Id. 317; Ledoux v. Black, 18 Id. 475; Willot v. Sandford, 19 Id. 81; Bryan v. Forsyth, 19 Id. 334; Ballance v. Papin, Id. 343; Gilmer v. Poindexter, 10 Id. 257; Baird v. Wolfe, 4 McLean's C. C. R. 549; Waddingham v. Gamble, 4 Mo. 465; Jackson v. Van Buren, 13 Johns. 527, 528; Vandenburg v. Van Burgeen, Id. 202; Corbin v. Jackson, 14 Wend. 625; Jackson v. Livingston, 7 Wend. 136-141.)

---

Waterman v. Smith.

III. The conditions expressed in the grant to Armijo and Solano are subsequent. Negligence in respect to the performance of these conditions did not of itself forfeit the right of the grantee. It subjected the land to be denounced by another; but the conditions do not declare the land forfeited to the State, upon the failure of the grantee to perform them. (Ferris v. Coover, 10 Cal. 615; U. S. v. Fremont, 17 How. 560-562; Same v. Reading, 18 Id. 1, 6; U. S. v. Cruz Cervantes, Id. 555; U. S. v. Vaca and Pena, Id. 557; U. S. v. Larkin, 558, 563.)

IV. There was vested in the grantee, under such a grant as Armijo's, a right of possession to the whole land embraced within the limits of the deseño or map, against all the world except the government, or some one claiming under the government. This right existed until the quantity granted was surveyed off to the grantee by the government, or until the government had made a grant of a specific tract of land to a second grantee within the territory embraced in the map or deseño. (See Fremont's Case, 17 How. 558.) Unless this were so, unless the grantee had a lawful possession, the conditions subsequent in the grant could not be performed, and the grantee would lose his land by denouncement. The grantee must enter to perform the conditions, or the grant is felo de se, carries on its face its own destruction. It gives no right of value to the grantee, unless he can make a lawful entry, take possession, and defend it. This is sufficient to enable the grantee to maintain the possessory action of ejectment, an action founded on the legal right or title to the possession, and may be maintained though the grantee has not a full and perfect title to the lands.

---

Waterman v. Smith.

---

A case illustrating the point before us in a clear and striking manner is that of White v. St. Guirons, (1 Minor's Ala. 332-351.) Indeed, the title considered in this case is more clearly similar to the grant to Fremont, as far as this possessory right is concerned, than any other we have been able to find in the progress of our investigations. (1 Wash. C. C. 204-206, and note 2; Id. 160, 425-433; Payne v. Treadwell, 5 Cal. 311; 3 Chit. Blac. 205, 201, 199; Adams Eject. 12, 9-11, 17, Waterman's Ed. See Argument of Chancellor Bibb, in Henderson v. Tennessee, 10 How. 317; see, also, Opinion of Lord Mansfield in Taylor v. Horde, 1 Burrow, 119; Rumington on Eject. 21, 42; Troublesome v. Estill, 1 Bibb, 128; Jackson v. Buel, 9 Johns, 299; Doe v. West, 1 Blackford, 133; Christy v. Scott, 14 How. 295; Bullock v. Wilson, 2 Porter, Ala. 437; Masters v. Eastis, 3 Id. 371; Goodleth v. Smithson, 5 Id. 245.)

The last three cases cited were imperfect grants under the United States land system. (Jones v. Inge, 5 Porter, 327; Fippe v. McGehee, Id. 432; City of Cincinnati v. White, 6 Peters, 441, 442; Ferris v. Coover, 10 Cal. 589.)

V. The Mexican Government reserved the right to survey off the land granted in the case of the grant to Armijo, and of all such grants. This is reserved in the condition in which it is required that the Magistrate who may give possession shall cause the same to be surveyed according to the ordinance, the surplus remaining to the nation for the proper uses. The delivery of judicial possession and survey were executive acts to be performed by the authorities. The obligation to perform these acts now devolves on the United States.

This is the plain meaning of the third condition of the grant

---

Waterman v. Smith.

---

to Solano, 17 How. 536; of the fourth condition in the grant to Alvarado, Id. 546; of the fourth in the grant to Reading, 18 How. 2; of the third in the grant to Larios, 20 Id. 426; and of the fourth in the grant to Armijo. (See case of Fremont and Fossat above cited.)

VI. The Government of the United States could alienate the land embraced in the deseño of Armijo, where there had been no specific location of the quantity granted to Armijo, as it was held in Fremont's case Mexico could have done. This could be done with the most perfect good faith where a sufficient quantity was left to give Armijo the three leagues granted to him. (Fremont's Case; Ledoux v. Black, 18 How. 475; Menard's Heirs v. Massey, 8 How. 301; Lefebvre v. Cameau, 11 Lou. 203; Stack v. Orillon, 11 Id. 587; Lott v. Prudhomme, 3 Rob. 293; Metoyer v. Larenaudiere, 6 Id. 139; Cousin v. Blanc's Executors, 19 How. 209; McCabe v. Worthington, 16 Id. 96.)

VII. The granting and location of lands by surveys pertains to the executive or political department of the government. Until location is given to a grant by survey, where the boundaries are vague and uncertain, the title is imperfect; the title as a title in fee does not become the subject of judicial cognizance until it is perfected by location. (Vattel's Law of Nations, 175; 1 White's Land Law, 601; Act Congress 3d March, 1851; 13 Peters, 450, 516; 20 How. 566; 4 Bacon's Ab. Bouvier's Ed. 1856, Tit. Grant, Sec. 3; Haven v. Cram, 1 N. Hamp. 93; 2 Bl. Com. 347; Foster v. Neilson, 2 Pet. 253; Garcia v. Lee, 12 Id. 511; United States v. Rogers, 4 How. 127.)

A title or grant is imperfect as a title to any specific piece of land, and as such does not become the subject of judicial cognizance until it is perfected by location. (See Lessieur v. Price, 12 How. 76; West v. Cochran, 17 Id. 413; Kissel v. St. Louis Public Schools, 18 Id. 25; Stanford v. Taylor, Id. 412; Willett v. Sandford, 19 Id. 81, 82; Les Bois v. Bramell, 4 Id. 449; Bryan v. Forsyth, 19 Id. 335, and authorities cited under point immediately preceding; 18 How. 19, and cases cited under Point VI.)

VIII. In the case of a grant by the Legislature, if the boundaries are not fixed by statute, it must be fixed by survey. Where there is a legislative grant, when a survey is duly made by the proper authority, no patent is required. Ejectment can be maintained on it without a patent in the Courts of the United States. (Bryan v. Forsyth, 19 How. 334; 2 Id. 313; 4 Id. 456; 9 Id. 317; Chouteau v. Eckhart, 2 Id. 372, 373; Remark of McLean, J. 19 Id. 340, 341.)

---

Waterman v. Smith.

---

IX. The survey must be made by the political department. A private survey is of no authority to segregate the land, or to attach the grant of Armijo to any particular land.

This is and was the rule under the Mexican system, as well as under that of the United States. (Ordenanzas de Tierras and Aguas, by Galvan, Edition of 1855, 226, 227; Story's Eq. Jurisp. 677, etc.; Smith v. United States, 10 Pet. 327; U. S. v. Hanson, 16 Id. 199-201; Acosta's Case, 17 Id. 19; U. S. v. King, 3 How. 785; Jourdan v. Barrett, 4 Id. 169; Les Bois v. Bramell, Id. 449; Id. 421; Bissel v. Penrose, 8 Id. 335; Glenn v. U. S. 13 Id. 256; Fremont's Case, 17 Id. 563-565; American Ins. Co. v. Carter, 1 Peters, 511; The Fama, 5 Rob. Adm. Rep. 105; U. S. v. Percheman, 7 Peters, 86, 87; Mitchel v. The U. S. 9 Id. 711; Strother v. Lucas, 12 Id. 410; Leitersdorfer v. Webb, 20 How. 177.) This last case was in relation to territory acquired under the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo. (Vattel, Book 3, Chap. 13, Sec. 200; 1 Kent's Com. 177.)

This being the correct rule, the laws of the United States must regulate the entire system of surveys.

It may be remarked here that there was never in California under the former government such an officer as a Surveyor. Mexico had no such officer here. Though the land system demanded such an official, no one had such powers. The land in fact in the absence of an energetic population capable of developing the immense resources of the country, was of too little value to support a system of surveys.

X. The United States have made provision for such surveys in the Act of Congress of 3d March, 1851, and the 6th Section of the Act of March, 1831, so far as it is made a part of said Act of 1851. (Dunlop's Laws of the United States, 1226 and 806.)

XI. The survey and patent of the United States to Ritchie, are conclusive against Armijo and those claiming under him, as the three leagues granted to Armijo have not been located. (U.

Greer*, McAll. 401; Tobin v. Walkinshaw, Id.; Pollard's Heirs v. Greit, 8 Ala. 940-942; Hallett v. Hunt, 7 Ala. 882-900; 4 McLean, 549; Hickey's Lessee v. Stewart, 3 How. 750; West v. Cochran, 17 Id. 415; 18 Id. 88; 13 Peters, 451; 4 How. 462.)

XII. Armijo and those claiming under him are not of the class of third persons mentioned in the 15th Section of the Act of Congress of the 3d of March, 1851, against whom the survey and patent are not conclusive. The third person mentioned in that section of the Act are those who have titles paramount to the government, and not subordinate to the right of government to enter by its officers and segregate and designate the land which was granted. If this be not true, then Armijo is better off without a survey and patent than with one. (City of New Orleans v. De Armas & Cuculler, 9 Peters, 224; 10 Peters, 662-731; 5 Wheaton, 290; 9 Cranch, 87; 11 Wheaton, 380; 2 How. 280; U. S. v. Arredondo, 6 Peters, 738.)

As to perfect and imperfect titles, counsel cited: Blac. Com. Book 2, Chap. 13, p. 195, 199; Ordinanzas above; Escriche's Diccionario de Legislacion, etc. Tit. Propriedad; 8 How. 293, etc.; Arredondo's Case, 6 Pet. 691; 13 How. 257; 15 Id. 14, D'Auterieve's Case; U. S. v. Roselius, 15 How. 31, 33; Id. 38; 10 Id. 442; Paschal v. Patterson, Id. 10, where the concessions were made by the Commandant at Nacogdoches, who could only make concessions of inchoate grants; to make which perfect the ratification of the civil and military Governor was required. They did not possess this last requisite, and though they had all the rest, wanting this, they were held imperfect. (15 How. 8, 12.) In Bal-lance v. Papin, title of plaintiff held imperfect for want of survey, (19 How. 343.) Same title in Bryan v. Forsyth, where there was a survey held perfect, (19 How. 335, 337); and that it was perfected by a survey, (337.)

XIII. The first perfect legal title must prevail. Nothing but a patent will pass a perfect and consummate title, unless in case of grant of fee by Act of Congress. The fee is in the government until the patent issues, and this was the view of Congress in enacting the thirteenth section of the Act of the third of March, 1851.

---

Waterman v. Smith.

---

That the first perfect legal title must prevail, see Stoddard v. Chambers, 2 How. 317, 318; Ledoux v. Black, 18 Id. 475; Bagnell v. Broderick, 13 Pet. 450, 451; Chouteau v. Eckhart, 2 How. 375, 376; Les Bois v. Bramell, Id. 449; Mackay v. Dillon, Id. 421; Barry v. Gamble, 3 Id. 32; Landes v. Brant, 10 Id. 348; Menard's Heirs v. Massey, 8 Id. 293; Bissell v. Penrose, Id. 317; Mills v. Stoddard, Id. 345.

That nothing but a patent will pass a perfect and consummate title, unless in case of grant of fee by Act of Congress, or grant of a specific parcel of land, see Wilcox v. Jackson, 13 Pet. 576; Bagnell v. Broderick, Id. 450; Fossat's Case, 20 How. 425; 3 Ann. La. 88.

XIV. A government is never presumed to grant land twice. (U. S. v. Arredondo, 6 Pet. 738, and authorities there cited; 7 Johns. 8.) Nor is it to be presumed that any government would by its officers survey the same land to two grantees, especially when she can give the quantity granted to each one of them out of the territory designated in which the land ceded is to be procured.

But it is contended that the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo protects the title of Armijo, and to allow the Appellants to succeed upon their patent would be in violation of the rights secured to Armijo and those claiming under him by the said treaty. This would be true were the title of Armijo perfect, and that title embraced the locus in quo. The treaty did not make the title of Armijo perfect, for like the treaty of 1803, it did not change the character of the claims to land in the territory acquired by it. (See Chouteau v. Eckhart, 2 How. 375, and cases there cited.) The treaty only protects property; (see Article 8); it does not enlarge or diminish the rights of property. It guarantees the rights of property as they existed at the date of the treaty, and as they came to the United States. It does not make the rights attaching to an imperfect title identical with those pertaining to one that is perfect. Its guaranty goes no further than the law of nations — that law could have afforded the same protection, as it is recognized among civilized nations. (12 Pet. 436, 438; 7 Id. 88; 6 Id. 741, 742; 9 Id. 133.) While the possessory rights attaching to an imperfect title are protected by the eighth and ninth articles of the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, the same treaty likewise imposes upon the government of the United States a further obligation, political in its character, to perfect such imperfect titles; but "this obligation, sacred as it may be in any instance, cannot be enforced by any action of the judicial tribunals." (2 How. 375; 13 Id. 48.) And it would seem that all the legislation of Congress upon this subject has proceeded upon this construction of the treaty, as is manifested by the mode adopted to investigate the claims through a Board of Commissioners, under the Act of 1851. (Chouteau v. Eckhart, 2 How. 375; U. S. v. Wiggin, 14 Pet. 350.) The judicial tribunals are competent to protect rights of property, but not to discharge duties political in their character. Such functions, by our Constitution and laws, devolve upon a co-ordinate department of the government. (Foster v. Neilson, 2 Pet. 314; U. S. v. Ferreira, 13 How. 48, 49, etc. etc. cases cited, and note at end. Sullivan v. Davis, 4 Cal. 291; Arguello v. Edinger, 10 Id. 150; Les Bois v. Bramell, 4 How. 462; *Hickey's Lessee v. noma, dated August 16, 1847, fixes the line running in an easterly and westerly direction, dividing the two ranchos of Tolenas and Suisun by the Sierra Madre, and is conclusive between the parties. The construction of this award was a question of law, and the Court erred in submitting its consideration to the jury. (Neilson v. Hanford, 8 Mees. & W. 806, 823; Hutchinson v. Bawker, 5 Id. 535; Perth Amboy Man. Co. v. Condit, 1 New Jersey, 659; Rogers v. Colt, Id. 704; Brown v. Hutton, 9 Iredell, 319; Wason v. Rowe, 16 Verm. 525; *Eaton v. The Court below erred in refusing the instructions asked. (See latter part of opinion.)

---

Waterman v. Smith.

---

John Currey, also, for Appellants.

1. The Suisun title for the lands embraced by the survey recited in the patent granted by the United States to Archibald A. Ritchie was, at the commencement of this action, and now is, absolute and paramount; and in virtue thereof a verdict and judgment ought to have been rendered in the case for the plaintiffs against the defendant, for the recovery of the land described in the complaint.

[The Counsel here makes an elaborate argument upon the doctrine of "relation" to show, that the title of Solano is really prior in time to that of Armijo. But it is omitted, because the Court waive any consideration of that question.]

2. Where there was a grant by the Mexican nation to one person, of a given number of leagues of land, embraced within a much larger area described, with a reservation of the excess to the nation for its convenient uses; and subsequently there was a grant made by the same authority to another person of a given number of leagues of land within a larger area described, with a like reservation, embracing in part land within the entire

---

Waterman v. Smith.

---

area indicated by the first grant, could the junior grantee, or his assigns, either under the laws of Mexico, or of the United States, as successor of Mexico, acquire a title to any of the land within the general descriptions of both grants, paramount to that of the senior grantee?

By the 12th Section of the decree of August 18, 1829, respecting colonization, (Rockwell's Spanish and Mexican Law, 452,) no one person could obtain under that law more than eleven leagues of land; and hence where concessions were made of a definite number of leagues within an area embracing, for convenience of description, a larger territory or district described by prominent or well-defined land marks and water-courses, it became the custom, which was general, if not indispensable, to provide in the concession itself for the segregation, by the officer of the government, of the quantity granted, and that the excess contained within the extended description should remain to the nation, for its convenient uses. And in cases where a specified number of leagues, within a described area of much greater extent, was granted, a segregation of the quantity granted by the officer of the government was of essential necessity, before the grantee could become invested with absolute title to any specific portion of the whole area described. This position follows as an inevitable deduction from the law and the circumstances of the given case, and is equally supported by the opinion of the Court in the case of Fremont v. U. S. 17 How. 542, 558-560, 565; see, also, U. S. v. Fossat, 20 Id. 426; Smith v. U. S. 10 Pet. 334, 335; Strother v. Lucas, 12 Id. 435, 436, and cases cited; Lessieur v. Price, 12 Id. 60; Id. 75-77; Kissell v. St. Louis Public Schools, 18 Id. 21; 17 Id. 413; Gunn v. Bates, 6 Cal. 272; 13 Peters, 450; Id. 516; 20 How. 566.

All the right acquired by Armijo by the concession of three leagues made to him, was: "The right to so much land, to be afterwards laid off by official authority, in the territory described." Such is the doctrine of the case of Fremont v. The United States, and such is the principle of law maintained in Rutherford v. Greene's Heirs, and in Lessieur v. Price.

There was no evidence that any juridical measurement of any portion of the territory comprehended within the descriptive deseño of the Tolenas, was made or approved under Mexican authority. As already appears, "under the Mexican Government, the survey was to be made or approved by the officer of the government, and the party was not at liberty to give what form he pleased to the grant. This precaution was necessary, in order to prevent the party from giving it such a form, as would be inconvenient to the adjoining public domain, and impair its value. The right, which the Mexican Government reserved to control this survey, passed with all other public rights to the United States." (17 How. 565; 12 Pet. 435, 436.)

---

Waterman v. Smith.

Until such survey and segregation, or laying off, might be made, it cannot be maintained that the government could not make a grant to any other person, of any number of leagues not exceeding the legal maximum quantity, and not exceeding the surplus reserved by the granting authority for the nation's convenient uses. For by the general grant to Armijo, the government did not bind itself to make no other grant within the territory described, until after he had made his survey. (17 How. 558.) If the rule were declared otherwise, Armijo could hold the whole domain contained within the exterior limits of his general grant. He could maintain his action, or defend against the grantees of the former government, or against the patentees of the United States Government, for that portion of his domain in "La parte de Ololote," or at the "Esteros de Julpines," or at the sink of the Ololatos, with the same assurance of success, as at a point nearly at a league's distance below "La Punta de Partida." And that such was the right of Armijo, and those holding under him, the Court below in effect ruled.

The patent granted by the Government of the United States to Ritchie, contains therein the survey and map or plat of the Suisun Rancho, made and approved by the Surveyor-General of the United States, for California, in July, 1855, under, and in pursuance of the Act of Congress, of March 3d, 1851, entitled "An Act to ascertain and settle Private Land Claims in California." (4 Stat. at Large, 632.) By this survey and allotment of four specific square leagues of land of the Suisun, as the segregated land, to which the title granted to Solano attached, the right which the Mexican Government reserved to itself to control the survey and selection, and which with other public rights, passed to the United States, has been exercised; and by such survey and allotment the United States Government has performed the obligation which was concomitant of the right acquired to control such survey and segregation, (12 Pet. 435, 436); and thereby the Suisun grant has become completed and perfected by specific boundaries, (17 How. 558); and cannot be impaired by any subsequent survey that may be made of the three leagues granted to Armijo. This view, it is believed, is fully supported by the decision in Frémont's Case, (17 How. 558,) and forever puts at rest the question of title, as to the lands comprehended by the survey and segregation made under government authority, of the Rancho of Suisun. (See, also, West v. Cochran, 17 How. 408.)

Waterman v. Smith.

---

III. The right of the plaintiffs to the possession of the land described in the patent to Ritchie cannot be lawfully resisted in this action.

1. The delivery of juridical possession by an officer of the government was an essential ceremony to perfect the title, as to a definite portion of land under the land system of Mexico, (17 How. 558, and 20 Id. 426); and where such office has not been performed by Mexican authority, the government of the United States, in virtue of its right and duty, will fulfill this obligation to the grantee, who, under the Act of Congress of 1851, may become entitled to its performance. (17 How. 565; 20 Id. 427.)

This duty, as to the Suisun grant, has been performed by competent authority, under our own government. The essential ceremony of perfecting the grant made to Solano, by attaching the title to four particular leagues of land, described by specific boundaries has been completed; and not only are the government and the grantee of the Suisun bound by such selection and segregation, but the grantee of the Tolenas is also concluded thereby. (9 Stat. at Large, 632, Sec. 18; 4 Id. 49, Sec. 6; 17 How. 558, 565; 20 Id. 426; Reading's Case, 18 Id. 13; U. S. v. Larkin, Id. 561; 17 Id. 418; 19 Id. 80; 18 Id. 412; Id. 25; 4 Id. 456, 460, 461.)

2. The patent itself, with the evidence of the conveyance by Ritchie to Waterman, and the conveyance by Waterman to Bissell, is conclusive of the plaintiff's right to the possession of the land in controversy. The patent in the hands of the patentee,

---

Waterman v. Smith.

---

is competent evidence of his right to the land therein described, not only as between himself and the United States, but as between himself and any third person or stranger, who fails to establish a superior title in himself from a source of paramount proprietorship. And this is so because the political sovereign authority of the government has ordained the means which, exercised by the judicial and executive power of the government, works out a solemn official instrument, as a muniment of title, importing absolute verity, and which is primary evidence of what it contains. (9 Statutes at Large, 632, Sec. 13; 4 Id. 494, Sec. 6.)

In Doe v. Eslava, (9 How. 447,) it was held that a confirmation by Act of Congress was equivalent to a patent — that after such a confirmation, no patent was necessary to confer a perfect legal title. (Sims v. Irvine, 3 Dallas, 456, 457.)

Thus, it appears, the confirmation and survey under the Act of March 3, 1851, make perfect titles before then imperfect, and vest in the confirmer an absolute legal estate in the land selected and set apart by government authority; and though a patent may issue, it is merely evidence of title made perfect under the Act of Congress. The title vests without the aid of a patent. The government is concluded by the confirmation and segregation, because Congress has so ordained. (9 Stat. at Large, 632, Secs. 13, 15; see, also, West v. Cochran, 17 How. 412-416; Kissell v. St. Louis Public Schools, 18 Id. 24-26; Bryan v. Forsyth, 19 Id. 337; Les Bois v. Bramell, 4 Id. 460-464; Landes v. Brant, 10 Id. 371-373; Lessieur v. Price, 12 Id. 75-77.)

That the patent, when issued, is competent and conclusive evidence of title to the particular land confirmed and surveyed by authority of the government; and from the time of confirmation and official designation, operates by relation, as from the time of official confirmation and survey, seems fully sustained by many of the authorities already cited, and particularly so by the cases of Fremont, and Fossat, and Stark v. Barnes, 4 Cal. 412; Jackson v. Bull, 1 John. Ca. 81; Heath v. Ross, 12 John. 140; Jackson v. Ramsey, 3 Cow. 79; and Landes v. Brant, 10 How. 372, 373 — which last case contains a clear and cogent exposition of the law of the subject matter under immediate consideration; the circumstances of which are strikingly analogous to the principal features of the case at bar.

If the grounds here taken are tenable, how stands the objection interposed on behalf of defendant, to the effect —

That the patent issued to Archibald A. Ritchie, after his death, is void, and therefore incompetent as evidence?

It appears, by the record, that Archibald A. Ritchie died July 9, 1856. The survey following final confirmation of the validity of his claim to the extent of four square leagues of land of the "Suisun," was made and finally authenticated by the proper Surveyor-General, in July, 1855. The patent bears date January 17, 1857.

The Appellants insist, that, by a just application of the doctrine of relation, the patent is to be regarded in law, as if it had passed the great seal at the moment the official selection and measurement of the designated four square leagues of land were completed; which was in the lifetime of the confirmer.

At that point of time, every substantive act to be performed on the part of the government, to invest the confirmer with a perfect title to the specifically described four leagues of land mentioned in the grant to Solano, became fully complete; and all that remained to be done thereafter, were duties of a mere ministerial nature. (Doe v. Eslava, 9 How. 447, and cases therein cited; Landes v. Brant, 10 Id. 371-373; Landas v. Perkins, 12 Mo. 254; 14 Johns. 406.)

The last substantial act in the case at bar, and that which was necessary to give precision to the title, and attach it to a particular tract of land, and thus render that which before was imperfect, a perfect title, was the segregation and measurement by the proper Surveyor-General, of the quantity specified: The first substantial act towards the completion of the Suisun title was the filing of a petition before the Board of Land Commissioners, setting forth the claim of the petitioner, and praying its confirmation. By the authority of Landes v. Brant, the patent relates to the first substantial act in the series necessary to be taken in order to perfect the title, which, before then, was imperfect. So in the case at bar, the same reasonable rule would give the patent legal effect and validity by relation, from the filing of the claimant's petition with the Board of Commissioners. (See also Act Congress, 1836, 5 Stat. at L. 31; Act entitled Estates of Deceased Persons, Secs. 194, 195; Wood's Dig. 410, 411; Becket v. Selover, 7 Cal. 238, 239.)

3d. The defendant is not in a position to object to the plaintiff's right to the possession of the land in controversy, because of any title in himself as successor to Armijo; for Armijo never had absolute title to the land, and the defense made is concluded by the patent to Ritchie. (17 How. 558; Id. 413; 20 Id. 426; 18 Id. 25, 179; 9 Id. 356; 10 Johns. 23; 12 Id. 81; 3 Cow. 281.) His interest was only equitable. (12 Pet. 435, 436; 10 Id. 330, 335, 736; 4 Id. 512; 9 Id. 734.)

4th. The imperfect title of Armijo cannot be rendered perfect by any other means than those provided by, and enumerated in, the Act of Congress of 1851. (17 How. 403, 413; 18 Id. 409, 413; Id. 25; 19 Id. 80-82; 12 Id. 76-77; 17 Id. 565; 20 Id. 426; 18 Id. 412.)

Again: To the making of the confirmation, survey, and patent, conclusive against the defendant in this action, it is objected, on his part, that the 15th Section of the Act of March 3, 1851, provides that these shall be conclusive between the United States and the claimant only, and shall not affect the interests of third persons.

We believe, that, notwithstanding the general language of the 15th Section of the Act of 1851, its application should be limited to the interests of those third persons, whose rights of property and title in the particular land, were perfect and absolute at the time of the acquisition of California by the United States: Which interests would, by the law of nations, have been as effectually protected without the provision of said 15th Section, as by it; and that by the law of nations, the rights of property of private persons in California, held under the laws of Mexico, at the time of the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, would have been protected as amply as by the treaty stipulation for that purpose; and also that the 15th Section of the Act of 1851, and the stipulation for the protection of rights of property contained in the treaty, were provisions incorporated, each in its appropriate place, ex abundanti cautela, in order that those whose rights of property were beyond the reach of confiscation, might enjoy exemption from the vexatious and harassing litigation which would have resulted from the teachings of carping advocates of the omnipotence of government. (U. S. v. Percheman, 7 Pet. 87, 88; U. S. v. Arredondo, 6 Id. 741; Strother v. Lucas, 12 Id. 438, 439, and the cases therein cited; Ferris v. Coover, 10 Cal. 619; Doe v. Eslava, 9 How. 445, and cases cited; Strother v. Lucas, 12 Pet. 438, 439, and cases cited; Act of Congress, May 3d, 1831, 6th Section, as to Surveyor of Public Land in La.)

Thompson, Irving & Pate, for Respondent.

Upon the facts, the principal question involved in the case is, whether a patent from the United States, founded upon a confirmed Mexican grant, is paramount to, and can override, a prior Mexican grant for lands held, occupied, and claimed, by the first grantee, by specific boundaries, to the extent specified in the grant in conformity with its terms, and within the exterior limits therein described. The affirmative of this proposition is maintained by the Appellants; while, on the other hand, it is contended by the Respondent, that the prior grant accompanied by possession, with specific boundaries of the quantity of land granted, within the exterior limits described in the grant, conferred upon the grantee an absolute and indefeasible estate in the land so granted and occupied, which could not be divested by any subsequent grant by the Mexican Government, or the United States, who succeeded to the rights of that government, unless the title of the first grantee had been forfeited by due course of law, and such forfeiture duly declared by a tribunal of competent jurisdiction.

We do not pretend to controvert, as a general proposition, the doctrine set out in the first point of the argument contained in the brief of the Appellants, filed by Messrs. Thornton, Williams & Thornton, that the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States are a rule of decision to the State Courts, on questions involving the interpretation of treaties and the construction of Acts of Congress. But we do deny that the authorities cited, from those decisions growing out of questions arising under the inchoate titles or concessions issued by the Spanish authorities in Louisiana, have any application to the case at bar.

It has been argued that the first patent appropriates the land and extinguishes all claims of inferior dignity. But this view is not sustainable. The issuing of a patent is a ministerial act which must be performed according to law. A patent is utterly void and inoperative which is used for land that had been previously patented to another individual. (Choteau v. Eckhart, 2 How. 344; Les Bois v. Bramell, 4 Id. 449; Bissell v. Penrose, 8 Id. 7; Menard's Heirs v. Massey, Id. 293; Mills v. Stoddard, Id. 345.) The cases of the U. S. v. Boisdore, (11 How. 69,) Glenn v. U. S. (13 Id. 250,) and Villemont v. U. S. (Id. 266,) cited in the case of Fremont, and others of a similar character, were all decided upon the same general principle, that there had been no severance of the land claimed from the public domain, and that the right of property still remained in the government.

---

Waterman v. Smith.

---

The radical error on which the whole argument for the Appellants rests consists in the application of principles and rules of decisions, founded upon the laws of Spain and the United States in relation to the granting of the public domain, to grants of land made by the Mexican authorities in California, where the mode of granting and the rules for the segregation of the land granted from the public domain, were entirely different.

The difference between the two classes of cases is so clearly stated in the case of Fremont v. The U. S. that we need only refer the Court to the lucid exposition upon that point contained in the opinion of Chief Justice Taney, (17 How. 553-559.)

In support, therefore, of the general proposition laid down in the first part of the argument, as the basis of the Respondent's defense to the action, we shall endeavor to maintain the following points:

1st. That the grant to Armijo, of the 4th of March, 1840, vested in the grantee a present and immediate property in fee to the three leagues of land specified in the grant, within the exterior limits delineated on the map; and that his subsequent occupation and possession of the three leagues, in conformity with the terms of the grant and the provisions of the Mexican law, by metes and bounds, was a segregation of the land from the public domain, by reason of which the general gift became a particular gift, and the grant attached to the specific three leagues so held and occupied.

The first branch of this proposition can scarcely be considered an open question. See the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, in the Fremont case, on this point, and the affirmation of the principle there laid down by this Court in the cases of Gunn's Adm'r v. Bates, (6 Cal. 263,) and in Palmer v. Boling, (8 Cal. 389); Ferris v. Coover, (10 Cal. 589.)

---

Waterman v. Smith.

---

It is contended, however, on the part of the Appellants, that although the grant to Armijo might give him an immediate vested right to the three leagues of land within the exterior limits delineated on the map, yet that right could attach to no particular three leagues until there had been an official survey made by authority of the government, establishing the precise limits of the tract granted. We have already had occasion to call the attention of the Court to the broad distinction laid down by Chief Justice Taney, between cases arising under Spanish grants and the land laws of the United States, in relation to the disposition of the public domain, and those growing out of Mexican grants in California.

But it is contended for the Appellants that because, under the provisions of those Acts, a survey was necessary to complete the title, that being the mode of segregation prescribed by the law, therefore the same mode of segregation was requisite, under the laws of Mexico, in order to perfect the title of a grantee from that government.

The authorities cited have no application. Where the law requires a particular mode of segregation, that mode must be pursued before a severance can take place. But we cannot perceive the application of this, or the numerous other cases to the same effect cited in the briefs of the Appellants, to the case presented by the record. For that purpose it would be necessary first to show that the laws of Mexico in force in California, required a survey before the title could vest, and this they have utterly failed to do.

We hold the rule to be that where there is no locative description in the grant, and no possession or occupation under it, then, and then only, a survey or some equivalent act by authority of the government, was necessary to segregate the land and give precision to the grant. On the other hand, where the grant contains sufficient words of description, to fix the locus in quo, and the grantee takes possession and occupies consistently with the calls of the grant, such description and occupation operate, per se, as a severance of the land from the public domain, and vest in the grantee an absolute and definite title to the land so granted and occupied. (Smith v. U. S. 10 Pet. 326; Leconte v. U. S. 11 How. 127, 128; U. S. v. Clark, 8 Pet. 466, 467; U. S. v. Percheman, 7 Id. 89-93; U. S. v. Peralta, 19 How. 345.)

---

Waterman v. Smith.

---

As to the effect of actual occupation and possession under the grant, we say, that an actual entry by the grantee under his grant, prior to the change of government, and continued occupation in accordance with its terms and the requirements of the law, operated as a severance of the land granted from the public domain, and gave full effect to the title. This proposition is fully sustained by the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States and the Courts of Louisiana, in relation to Spanish concessions, and is likewise in strict conformity with the laws, usages, and customs, of the Mexican Government in force in California, when the grants to Armijo and Solano were made. (U. S. v. Boisdore et al. 11 How. 63, 69; Id. 115; Lafayette v. Blanc, 3 Ann. La. 60; Hooter v. Tippet, 17 La. 109.)

The doctrine here laid down, evidently contemplates three modes by which the land granted could be severed from the public domain.

1st. Where the descriptions in the grant were sufficient to identify the particular tract granted.

2d. Where the party entered under the grant occupied the land, in conformity with its terms; and,

3d. By an official survey, when the description in the grant was vague and indefinite, and there had been no possession under it. As to the first and last mentioned modes of segregation, there would, we presume, be no conflict of opinion between the opposing counsel and ourselves, the second results necessarily from the doctrine laid down in the above cases.

Upon this branch of the subject, therefore, we contend in the second place —

That, under the laws, usages, and customs, in force in California, in reference to the granting of the public domain, and by the terms of the instrument itself, a grant of lands, such as we are considering, gave to the grantee the right to locate and occupy the quantity of land granted within the exterior limits described in the grant, and that such location and occupation, when made in accordance with the calls of the grant, and in conformity to law, was conclusive both on the grantee and the government.

---

Waterman v. Smith.

---

The error of the argument of the Appellant's counsel, on this point, consists in giving to the act of juridical possession the force and effect of a survey, as understood under the laws of Spain and the United States; than this, nothing can be more fallacious.

The approval of a grant by the Departmental Assembly, was a prerequisite to obtaining juridical possession. (See Espediente in cases of Vaca and Peña, and the Archives in Surveyor-General's office; U. S. v. Reading, 18 How. 7; 10 Cal. 618.)

If, then, the juridical possession could not be given until after the approval, and the failure to obtain the latter did not affect the grantee's right and title to the land, as decided in the Reading case, neither would it be at all impaired by his failure to obtain the former. It had resulted from no default of his; he had done all that was incumbent upon him to perfect his title. He had entered upon the land, built a house, which was inhabited by his family, in compliance with the imperative condition of his grant; he had stocked it with cattle, and inclosed and cultivated portions of it. Here his duty ended; and until the Governor obtained from the Assembly the approval of the grant, no juridical possession could be had. The failure, therefore, to obtain the juridical possession, where the grant had not been approved, could no more affect the title than the want of the latter formality. It results, then, from this view of the subject, that unless the possession and occupation of the grantee, in conformity with the terms of his grant, operated a segregation and perfected his title, there could be no severance of the land from the public domain in such cases, which embrace the majority of Mexican grants in California, and the title still remained in the government, a position which is well characterized by the learned Judge above cited, as startling.

As to the effect, under Mexican law, of prior occupation and possession, see cases as to the grant of Richard Berry; The Heirs of Wm. Fisher v. U. S. (No. 244, Docket late Land Commission); Espediente and Decree in case of Vaca above, to be found in the Archives.

2d. That the patent from the United States to Archibald A. Ritchie, of the 17th January, 1857, operated only as a quitclaim or relinquishment of title on the part of the government, and did not affect the rights of third parties; and that, so far as it conflicts with the vested rights of Armijo, and those claiming under him, by virtue of his grant of the 4th of March, 1840, the same is void and of no effect. (See Act of Congress, 3d March, 1851, for settlement of Land Claims in California, Sec. 15, 9 U. S. Statute, 631; Debate in U. S. Senate on the same, Cong. Globe, Second Session, 31st Congress, Vol. 18, pp. 428, 429; Act of 3d March, 1831, to create office of Surveyor-General for State of Louisiana, Sec. 6, 4th Stat. 494; Marsh v. Brooks et als. 8 How. 223; Barry v. Gamble, 8 Miss. 87; De la Houssaye v. Saunders, 4 Lou. 445; Broussard v. Gonsoulin, 12 Rob. Lou. 1-8; Jewell v. Porche, 2 Lou. 146; Polk's Lessee v. Wendell, 9 Cranch, 99; 5 Wheat. 293; Stoddard v. Chambers, 2 How. 284; Choteau v. Eckhart, Id. 375; Les Bois v. Bramell, 4 Id. 449; Bryant v. Forsyth, 19 Id. 334; Bissell v. Penrose, Id. 317.)

There seems to be an idea pervading the argument of the opposite counsel, though not distinctly avowed, that a peculiar efficacy attaches to a patent from the United States which does not belong to other conveyances. They say: "That nothing but a patent will pass a consummate title, unless in case of a grant in fee by Act of Congress, or a grant of a specific parcel of land." Now, this might all be true under the rules prescribed by law for the granting and conveying of lands in the United States, but a very different system may have obtained in Mexico; and if a party could show that, according to the Mexican law, he had obtained a perfect title to lands, although it was by neither of the modes enumerated above, yet we apprehend that under the provisions of the treaty of cession, the United States and the tribunals of the country would be bound to respect it to the same extent as if he had obtained a patent from the United States. In our view, a patent from the United States is entitled to no more dignity or consideration, in a legal point of view, than any other instrument for the conveyance of real estate; and its effect must be tested, and its language construed by the same rules which apply to other deeds. This is clearly illustrated in many of the cases cited above. (Stoddard v. Chambers, Bissell v. Pen-

4th. Where adjoining landholders agree upon a dividing line between their respective tracts, such an agreement is conclusive between the parties and their privies; and the admissions of the party making such agreements, made while owner of the premises, long continued occupation up to the agreed line, and long acquiescence by the parties in such line, are evidence from which such an agreement may be presumed. (Thacker v. Gardner, 7 Met. 484; Wray v. Berry, 9 N. Hamp. 473; Houston v. Matthews, 1 Yerg. 116; Wilson v. Hudson, 8 Id. 398; Dibble v. Rogers, 13 Wend. 467; *Adams v. [In this connection counsel discussed the effect of the award.]

Again: The patent to Ritchie is void, because issued after his death. (Act Cong. 5 U. S. Stat. 31.)

FIELD, J. delivered the opinion of the Court — TERRY, C. J. and BALDWIN, J. concurring.

This is an action of ejectment, for the recovery of a tract of land situated in the valley of Suisun, in the county of Solano. Both parties claim title under grants of the Mexican Governor of California, Juan B. Alvarado—the plaintiff under a grant issued to the Indian Chief, Francisco Solano, on the twenty-first of January, 1842, and the defendant under a grant issued to José Francisco Armijo, on the fourth of March, 1840. The grant to Solano is of land known by the name of Suisun, and covers four square leagues, within exterior limits embracing about eight leagues. The grant to Armijo is of land known as Tolenas, and covers three leagues, within limits embracing from twelve to twenty leagues. The maps referred to in both grants cover the land in controversy. The grant to Solano was presented to the Board of Land Commissioners for confirmation by Archibald A. Ritchie, who had become, by purchase, interested in the land granted; and the same was confirmed to him by the Board in January, 1853, and subsequently by the United States District Court, in November, 1853, and the decree of confirmation was affirmed on appeal by the Supreme Court of the United States, at its December Term, 1854. In July of the following year (1855) the four leagues specified in the grant were laid off and surveyed, under the directions of the Surveyor-General of the United States for California, and the survey was approved and authenticated by that officer. In conformity with this survey, a patent on behalf of the United States was issued to Ritchie, bearing date on the seventeenth of January, 1857, for four leagues of land, with the specific description of the official survey. This patent covers the land in suit. The grant to Armijo was likewise presented to the Board of Land Commissioners, and was rejected. On appeal to the District Court of the United States, the decision of the Board was reversed, and the claim under the grant confirmed. From the decision of the District Court the case is now pending, on appeal, in the Supreme Court of the United States.

---

---

Both grantees resided within the limits of their respective grants, and it is insisted by the counsel of the defendant that the evidence establishes the fact that Armijo occupied and claimed three leagues of his tract, marked by metes and bounds, and that such occupation and claim operated as a segregation of that specific quantity, and the grantee's right thereto could not be impaired by the subsequent grant to Solano, and the patent thereon to Ritchie.

We shall pass over any consideration of the question as to the application of the doctrine of relation, in virtue of which the plaintiffs contend that the grant to Solano, though subsequent in date to that to Armijo, relates back to the provisional decree of Vallejo, made in January, 1837, as immaterial to the determination of the case. We shall assume, also, for the purposes of the appeal, that Armijo occupied and claimed from the entire quantity comprehended within the map referred to in his grant, three specific leagues, and that these covered the land for the recovery of which the present suit is brought. We propose to place our decision upon grounds which will settle the controversy in the present case, and serve as a rule in controversies of a similar character; and for that purpose we shall disregard the minor points presented by the record, and confine ourselves principally to the questions which properly and necessarily arise from the claim asserted by the defendant, that the occupation and possession by Armijo, under his grant of three leagues, by designated metes and bounds, was a location of that specific quantity within the exterior limits described in the grant, effectuating its segregation from the public domain, and attaching thereto the grant, and making the title of the grantee perfect against even a subsequent patent of the United States. These questions relate to the nature of the titles conferred by the grants; to the authority by which location can be given to the specific quantity granted where that is less than the quantity contained within the exterior limits of the grants; to the effect of a patent of the United States in such cases, and who constitute the third persons mentioned in the 15th Section of the Act of Congress of March 3d, 1851, against whom the confirmation and patent are not conclusive.

---

Waterman v. Smith.

---

The grants to Solano and Armijo both purport to convey the land designated therein—limiting its extent in the first case to four, in the other to three, leagues. Both are subject to similar conditions, with the exception of one peculiar to the grant to Armijo, against the molestation of the Indians there located and his immediate neighbors. Both provide for the free and exclusive enjoyment of the land by the grantees, and for such use and cultivation of it as they may think proper. Both require juridical possession to be given by a public officer of the vicinity, by whom the boundaries are to be designated. Both reserve any surplus over the quantity specified to the uses of the nation. Both are made liable to denouncement for failure to comply with their conditions, and both are subject to the approval of the Departmental Assembly. The grant to Solano received such approval—the one to Armijo did not; but this fact does not impair the title which passed to the latter. The effect of the approval was only to discharge the grant to Solano from liability to defeasance by the Mexican Government, except for breach of its conditions subsequent. Both of the grantees acquired rights of property, which were not impaired at the date of the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, and were protected by the guaranties of that instrument, and there is no law which authorized a forfeiture for any act or omission since. (Opinion of U. S. Supreme Court in the Sutter Case.)

The grants in question are similar in the title they convey to the one issued to Sutter, which was the subject of consideration in the case of Ferris v. Coover, (10 Cal. 589,) and, like that, passed an estate in the land embraced within their exterior boundaries, to the extent of the specified quantity, to be subsequently laid off by the government. They were issued in pursuance of the laws and regulations of Mexico for the colonization of the territories, the object of which was the settlement of the vacant lands of the Republic; and for that purpose were made subject to the usual condition in such cases, of cultivation and occupancy. The first condition in the grant to Solano provides for his inclosure of the land with a reservation of the crossings, roads, and servitudes, and for his free and exclusive enjoyment of the same, with such use and cultivation as he may think proper, and requires the construction of a house and its inhabitation within one year. Its language is:

“That he may inclose it without prejudice to the crossings, roads, and servitudes, and enjoy it freely and exclusively; making such use and cultivation of it as he may see fit, but within one year he shall build a house, and it shall be inhabited.” The second condition in the grant to Armijo is substantially the same; so were the second condition in the grant to Alvarado, (Fremont v. United States, 17 How. 545); the third condition in the grant to Reading, (United States v. Reading, 18 How. 2); and the first condition in the grant to Jimeno, (United States v. Larkin, 18 How. 559). Indeed, the same condition, substantially, was contained in all the colonization grants issued to individuals by the Mexican Government of California. Whilst it required the construction of a house, it conferred a right of entry upon the land, without which the requirement would have been incapable of fulfillment. Whilst it enforced the inhabitation of the house when constructed, it gave a right to the possession, use, and enjoyment, of the land, without which the inhabitation would have been of little benefit to the grantee, and the policy of the government in the settlement of the country would have been entirely frustrated.

But though the grants passed a right of possession to the land, they conferred only a vested interest in the specific quantity designated, to be afterwards measured and laid off by the officers of the government. The conditions required a juridical possession to be given by the magistrate of the vicinage, who was to cause a survey of the specific quantity granted, to be made in accordance with the provisions of the law, the surplus being reserved for the use of the nation. The juridical possession was to accompany the official survey, and in this way alone could a segregation of the given quantity take place under the Mexican authorities, from the public domain. The officers by whom, and the manner in which, the measurement was to be made, were distinctly designated by the law. The grantee could not, for himself, make the segregation. "No person," said the Mexican law, "though his grant be older than others, can take possession for himself, or measure, or set limits, to his landed property, (propriedas territoriales.) unless it be done by judicial authority, with the citation of all those who bound upon him, (colindantes.) for whatever is done contrary to this will be null, of no validity or effect." (Ordinanzas de Tierras and Aguas by Galvan, edition of 1855.) As the grantee could not locate his land by his own survey, it would seem a necessary conclusion that he could not do so by mere occupation, and the assertion of a claim to any particular place.

Waterman v. Smith.

---

The right to make the measurement and to give the juridical possession remained with the government, and could only be exercised by its officers. That right, like all other public rights, passed, with the transfer of the territory, to the government of the United States, and is now to be exercised in accordance with its laws. The estate, which vested in the grantees upon the execution of the grants, remains unaffected by the change of government; but the survey and measurement are to be made — not in accordance with the laws of the old government, which were abrogated with its authority, but in accordance with the policy and laws of the new government. The right to survey and segregate the specific number of leagues granted to Solano and Armijo, respectively, under the legislation of Congress, belongs to the Executive Department, and cannot be exercised by the Courts of Justice. The Courts can ascertain and fix the position of boundaries which are designated, but they cannot give boundaries to a specific quantity which has none and lies in a larger tract. To give precision and location to such specific quantity a survey by the department is essential. The authorities to this effect are numerous and decisive. In Stanford v. Taylor, (18

---

Waterman v. Smith.

How. 409,) the plaintiff claimed title to the land in dispute under a Spanish concession of 1785, which was confirmed in 1811, and a survey ordered conformably to the possession. The concession described the land as lying along the River Des Peres, from the north to the south, and as bounded on one side by the lands of Louis Robert, and on the other by the domain of the King. The survey was not executed until 1834, when the Surveyor ordered the land to be located west of Robert's tract. The plaintiff insisted that the land granted and confirmed adjoined Robert's tract on the east, and that the location was so plainly apparent on the face of the concession as not to require a survey, and offered evidence to show that the possession of the confirmee was part of a tract of land east of Robert's tract and adjoining it, and, if located there, would include the premises in controversy. The Court rejected the evidence, and allowed the defendant to introduce the official survey, and excluded evidence offered by the plaintiff to show that this was improperly made west of Robert's tract instead of east of it, and instructed the jury that, as the parties agreed that the official survey of the confirmation under which the plaintiff claimed did not include the premises in suit, they ought to find for the defendant. In considering the exceptions taken to the ruling and instructions, Catron, J. in delivering the opinion of the Court, said: "The law is settled, that where there is a specific tract of land confirmed according to ascertained boundaries, the confirmee takes a title on which he may sue in ejectment. The case of Bissell v. Penrose, (8 How. 317,) lays down the true rule.

"But where the claim has no certain limits, and the judgment of confirmation carries along with it the condition that the land shall be surveyed and severed from the public domain and the lands of others, then it is not open to controversy that the title attaches to no land; nor has a Court of Justice any authority in law to ascertain and establish its boundaries, this being reserved to the Executive Department. The case of West v. Cochran, (17 How. 403,) need only be referred to as settling this point. And the question here is, whether the concession to Perry (the confirmee) is indefinite and vague, and subject to be located at different places." And, after considering the description, the Court concluded that the uncertainty of the outboundary was

Waterman v. Smith.

---

In Ledoux v. Black, (18 How. 475,) the Court, in speaking of too manifest to require discussion to show that a public survey was necessary to attach the concession to any land.

the Act of Congress of 1820, confirming the plaintiff's claim, held that the Act did not tend to locate the claim and sever the land from the public domain, and that that could only be done by a public survey.

In Willot v. Sanford, (19 How. 81,) the defendants derived title under one Disonet, whose claim was confirmed by Act of Congress, in 1816. The land was surveyed in 1817, by authority of the United States, and a patent was issued in 1850. There was a conflict between this survey and the survey of the claim upon which the plaintiff relied. The Circuit Court instructed the jury that the survey and patent under which the defendant claimed were not conclusive evidence that the land they embraced was correctly located and surveyed according to the confirmation; and if they believed that the land sued for was not within the confirmation of the legal representatives of Disonet, although it might be within the survey and patent, then the survey and patent would not protect the defendants; but the Supreme Court held that Courts of Justice had no authority to disregard surveys and patents when dealing with them in actions of ejectment, and reversed the judgment of the Court below. (See, also, Bissell v. Penrose, 8 How. 317; West v. Cochran, 17 Id. 413; Cooper v. Roberts, 18 Id. 173; Bryan v. Forsyth, 19 Id. 334; Bal-ance v. Papin, 19 Id. 343.)

The matter of surveys of floating grants belongs, then, to the Executive Department of government, under the legislation of Congress on the subject of public lands. With such surveys the Courts of Justice have nothing to do. Whether in justice to the claimants the location should have been different from the official survey is none of their concern. That belongs to a department of government whose action is not subject to review by the Judiciary. The Courts, it is true, must determine whether prior rights of third parties have been interfered with by such survey and the patent following thereon, but they cannot correct the survey or patent and locate the land where, in their opinion, it ought originally to have been made.

The case of Fremont v. The United States, (17 How. 542,) is in point, as to the estate which passed under the grants of Solano and Armijo, and the authority by which precision and location are to be given to the specific quantity granted. In that case, the grant to Alvarado was for ten leagues, within a tract of much greater extent, and the Court held that as between the government and the grantee, the latter had a vested interest in the quantity of land mentioned in the grant. "The right to so much land," said the Chief Justice, in delivering the opinion, "to be afterwards laid off, by official authority, in the territory described, passed from the government to him by the execution of the instrument granting it." And in illustration of the principle asserted, the Court cited the case of Rutherford v. Greene's Heirs, reported in 2 Wheat. 196, which arose upon an Act of the State of North Carolina, of 1782, providing that twenty-five thousand acres of land should be allotted to General Greene and his heirs, within a tract reserved for the use of the army, to be laid off by Commissioners appointed therefor. The Commissioners, in pursuance of the Act, allotted the twenty-five thousand acres, and caused the tract to be surveyed and returned to the proper office, and the question upon which the case turned, related to the validity of the title of General Greene and the date at which it was commenced. The Court held the general gift of twenty-five thousand acres, lying in the territory reserved, became, by the survey, a particular gift of that quantity within the survey, and concluded a full examination of the title by saying that it was the clear and unanimous opinion of the Court, "that the Act of 1782 vested a title in General Greene to twenty-five thousand acres of land, to be laid off within the boundaries allotted to the officers and soldiers, and that the survey made in pursuance of that Act, and returned March 3, 1783, gave precision to that title, and attached it to the land surveyed."

Waterman v. Smith.

---

The Court, in the Fremont case, observes, in reference to this case of Rutherford v. Greene's Heirs, that "it recognizes as a general principle of justice and municipal law, that such a grant, for a certain quantity of land by the government, to be afterwards surveyed and laid off within a certain territory, vests in the grantee a present and immediate interest. In the language of the Court, the general gift becomes a particular gift, when the survey is made; and when this doctrine has been asserted in this Court, upon the general principles which Courts of Justice apply to such grants from the public to an individual, good faith requires that the same doctrine should be applied to grants made by the Mexican Government, where a controversy arises between the United States and the Mexican grantee." And, as to the authority by which the survey was to be made, the Court holds this language: "Under the Mexican Government, the survey was to be made or approved by the officer of the government, and the party was not at liberty to give what form he pleased to the grant. This precaution was necessary, in order to prevent the party from giving it such a form as would be inconvenient to the adjoining public domain, and impair its value. The right which the Mexican Government reserved to control this survey passed, with all other public rights, to the United States, and the survey must now be made under the authority of the United States, and in the form and divisions prescribed by law for surveys in California, embracing the entire grant in one tract."

---

Waterman v. Smith.

---

The authorities cited are conclusive of the questions we have been considering. Following them, we must hold that the grants to Solano and Armijo, passed a present and immediate interest in the quantity of land specifically designated in their respective grants, to be afterwards surveyed and laid off within the exterior limits of the general tracts by the government; that such survey could only be made under the former government, by its officers, and could not be made by the grantees themselves; that the right of survey passed, with other public rights, to the government of the United States, and is to be exercised in pursuance of its policy, and in conformity with its laws; that by its legislation, the subject of surveys is intrusted to the Executive Department; that the location of confirmed grants, when the quantity granted is without specific boundaries, lying within a larger tract, rests exclusively with such department, and cannot be reviewed or corrected by the Judiciary, but is binding and conclusive upon it in actions of ejectment, except only, when the patent issued thereon conflicts with prior rights of third parties, and then its inconclusiveness is maintained only so far as may be necessary for the protection of such prior rights.

---

Waterman v. Smith.

---

The learned counsel for the defendant has presented with great force the injustice which may follow from holding that the government can compel a grantee to abandon that part of the tract embraced in the exterior limits of his grant, upon which he has settled and made his improvements, and to take some other part; but his observations should be addressed to the officers of government, under whose supervision and control the survey and location are placed. To their sense of justice the appeal is to be made, and with them the observation would be entitled to the highest consideration. The Courts of the country possess no authority to act upon them. The right to measure and set apart the specific quantity was not left to the grantee, as we have observed, under the Mexican Government, nor is it permitted under our own. Occupation and cultivation could have no greater effect than a private survey. They were without binding effect upon the former government, and are equally inoperative under the new. In Smith v. The United States, (10 Peters, 335,) the Court said: "The laws of the United States give no authority to an individual to survey his grant or claim to lands; he may mark lines to designate the extent and bounds of his claim, but he can acquire no rights thereby. The only effect which we can give to this private survey is to consider it as a selection by the petitioner of that piece of land, as a part of what he was entitled to locate, in virtue of his general grant."

In United States v. Hanson, (16 Peters, 199,) a private survey was considered and rejected, as being of no force or validity. In United States v. King, (3 How. 785,) the Court rejected a survey made by the officer of the government after his authority had ceased. In Les Bois v. Bramell, (4 How. 457,) in speaking of a survey of one Mackay, the Court said it "was a private one, made at the instance of the inhabitants of St. Louis, and was not binding on the rights of any one;" and in Mackay v. Dillon, (4 How. 447,) of the same survey: "It was in its nature a private survey, not binding on the United States." In Glenn v. The United States, (13 How. 256,) in referring to surveys offered in evidence, the Court said: "The surveys produced to us are private ones, and of no value in support of the claim."

The location of the specific quantity may be made by a survey of such quantity, or by grants with specific boundaries of such

---

Waterman v. Smith.

---

parts of the general tract as will reduce it to such specific quantity. Either course will operate to give precision to the claim of the grantee. So long as there remains within the general tract sufficient land to satisfy the quantity specified in his grant, the grantee is without remedy. To this effect the language of Mr. Chief Justice Taney, in the Fremont case. "It is true," he says, "that if any other person within the limits where the quantity granted to Alvarado was to be located, had afterwards obtained a grant from the government, by specific boundaries, before Alvarado had made his survey, the title of the latter grantee would not be impaired by any subsequent survey of Alvarado. As between the individual claimants from the government, the title of the party who had obtained a grant for the specific land, would be the superior and better one; for by the general grant to Alvarado, the government did not bind itself to make no other grant within the territory described, until after he had made his survey." (17 How. 558.)

To the same effect is the language of the Supreme Court of Louisiana, in Lott v. Prudhomme, (3 Rob. 293,) cited in the opinion rendered in Ledoux v. Black, by the Supreme Court of the United States. "We then held," referring to the previous adjudication, "that when the boundaries of a confirmed claim are vague and uncertain, and are to be fixed by the operations of the surveying department, or such confirmation is only the recognition of a pre-existing right or claim, and before the survey and location the government sells a part of the land not necessarily embraced within the tract confirmed, the title of the purchaser will prevail."

This view disposes of the questions raised upon the award between Vallejo, the vendor of Ritchie, and Armijo, made in August, 1847. We are of opinion that the correct construction of the award makes the ridge and not the stream the dividing line between the two claims; but if we admit, for the purposes of the argument, that Suisun Creek was intended by the parties, it is difficult to perceive how this fact can avail the defense. Until the action of the government, whilst the claimants rested only on their grants, the award would have been conclusive in any controversies between them. But the government having wisely, or otherwise, issued a patent to Ritchie of a portion of the land included in the general tract designated in the grant to Armijo, (assuming this to be the fact—and we do so only for the argument,) it does not lie in the mouth of the latter to complain, there still remaining of such general tract more than sufficient to satisfy the specific quantity granted to him. The award could not bind the government, or control the effect of its patent. It was at most only effective as to the lines of the exterior limits of the general tracts claimed by the grantees. If the patentee accepted the land described in his patent as answering his claim, it is not perceived how any other persons can complain, even if a portion of the land thus taken was without the boundaries of his original claim.

---

Waterman v. Smith.

---

The limitation of quantity was a controlling condition of the grants in question, and the delivery of juridical possession was an essential ceremony, under the government of Mexico, to perfect the title of the grantees to the specific quantity designated. This was expressly held in the case of The United States v. Foshat, (20 How. 426.) Until such possession, which was accompanied by a survey, the title of the parties attached to no definite portion of the tract. There is no evidence in the record that such juridical possession was given under the former government to either Solano or Armijo, although in the opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States, in the United States v. Ritchie, (17 How. 537,) it is said that the grantee, Solano, was put in juridical possession in conformity with the conditions of his grant. If this were the fact, it does not appear in the transcript before us, and the rights of the parties are treated as though no such fact existed. The right, then, which the Mexican Government reserved to itself to control the location, having passed to the government of the United States, the duty to exercise such right devolved upon the latter. This duty was discharged by the survey following the final confirmation, and from that time the title of the parties claiming under Solano became perfect. On the other hand, the title under the grant to Armijo, did not attach to any three specific leagues; it constituted only an interest in such quantity, to be afterwards laid off by competent authority. Such general interest—not attached to the land in controversy, but, by the action of the officers of government, excluded from it—cannot be set up as a defense to the claim of

---

Waterman v. Smith.

---

the plaintiffs. The patent is conclusive evidence of the right of the patentee to the land described therein — not only as between himself and the United States, but as between himself and a third person, who has not a superior title from a source of paramount proprietorship. The patent was not necessary to invest Ritchie with the title, as his title existed at the cession of the territory, and the only act to render it perfect to a defined and particular tract, was an official segregation. The title was recognized by the decree of final confirmation, and the approved survey attached it to the specific land. The essential and substantive acts under the law of 1851, were the confirmation and survey. The patent in such cases is only evidence of the pre-existing title made perfect by these acts. Upon the original grant, final confirmation, and approved survey, the plaintiffs might have relied, without reference to the patent. The survey following the final confirmation was made and approved in July, 1855. Ritchie died in July, 1856, and the patent bears date in January, 1857. At the date of the survey every substantive act required for the vesting of a perfect title had been performed. The subsequent issuance of the patent only involved duties of a mere ministerial character, and by a just application of the doctrine of relation, the patent must be regarded as if it had received the signature of the President at the completion of the segregation of the four leagues. In Landes v. Brant, (10 How. 370,) the Supreme Court of the United States held that a confirmation made in 1811, and a patent issued in 1845, related to the first act necessary to complete the title, that of filing the claim in 1805, and that intermediate conveyances made by the confirmee, or by the Sheriff in his behalf, of a day after the first substantial act, were covered by the legal title, and passed that title to the alienee. In that case Clamorgan, the patentee, had died in 1814, and the Court held that according to the common law the patent was void for want of a grantee, but that this defect was obviated by the Act of Congress of May 20, 1836, declaring: "That in all cases where patents for public lands have been, or may hereafter be issued, in pursuance of any law of the United States, to a person who had died, or who shall hereafter die, before the date of such patent, the title to the land designated therein shall inure to, and become vested in, the heirs, devisees, or assigns, of such deceased patentee, as if the patent had issued to the deceased person during life." This law, the defendants contend, does not aid the patent to Ritchie, as the patent is not for public lands. It may be true that the land embraced in the patent is not in the strict meaning of the term public, but we think it was the intention of the Act to cover all cases where any rights belonging to the United States existed in lands which could be relinquished by patent, even though an interest in the same was also held by the patentee himself. The United States possessed the right to make the location of the four leagues in any part of the general tract they thought proper. By their act the identical land patented might have been reserved as a part of the public domain—and there was, therefore, such a public interest possessed in the land as to include the latter within the spirit of the Act of Congress in question. We think the objection untenable, and that whatever rights could have passed to Ritchie by the patent, had he been living at the date of its issuance, inured to, and became vested in, his heirs or assigns, represented by the plaintiffs in this action.

---

Waterman v. Smith.

---

The third persons against whose interests by the 15th Section of the Act of 1851, the final confirmation and patent are not conclusive, are those whose title is at the time such as to enable them to resist successfully, any action of the government in respect to it. Parties holding claims which may be located without the boundaries of the patent, and still within the limits of the general tract designated in the grants to them, do not constitute such third persons, nor do parties who hold claims only upon the bounty of the government, nor do intruders, nor even settlers, having certificates of sale, unless the same ante-date the presentation of the claim of the patentee to the Board of Land Commissioners for California, to which period the patent takes effect by relation. The interests of the third persons, intended by the Act, would have been as effectually protected without its provisions, as they are now by them. The section in question is only a legislative recognition of a principle of law and justice, applicable to all grants.

From the conclusions to which we have arrived, after the most mature consideration, it is clear that the plaintiffs were entitled to recover upon the facts conceded by the record, and that the first, third, sixth, seventh, eighth and ninth, instructions, requested by the plaintiffs, were proper, and should have been given, and the Court below erred in refusing them. The instructions requested and refused, are as follows: 1. That, if the jury believe, from the evidence, that the Suisun and Tolenas grants embrace, within their exterior boundaries, a much larger quantity of land than called for by both said grants, and that neither of said grants was located or segregated under the Mexican Government, and that the Suisun grant has, under the United States Government, been finally surveyed, and located, and patented; but that the Tolenas grant has not been finally confirmed and located by an officer, or under the authority of the United States; that, in such case, the location and patent of the Suisun Rancho, made and granted by the United States, must prevail in this action, and a verdict should be rendered in accordance with this instruction.

---

Waterman v. Smith.

---

3. "The location of land granted by the Mexican nation, in pursuance of the colonization law of Mexico of 1824, and the regulations of 1828, belonged to, and was to be made by, such government; and whenever such location was not made under the Mexican Government, the right to make it passed to the United States, under the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo."

6. "That in an action of ejectment by the person or persons entitled under a patent of the United States, against one in possession of any portion of such land, adverse to such patent, and the title whereon the same is predicated, and claiming to hold under a Mexican grant which was not surveyed or located by metes and bounds, or juridical possession under the Mexican Government, the defendant so claiming to hold adversely, as above mentioned, cannot interpose such unlocated grant, as a title paramount for the land described in said patent."

7. "That the patent in evidence by plaintiffs is conclusive as against the defendant, unless there is evidence that the defendant has a title superior to the title by said patent to the land in controversy, under a confirmed Spanish or Mexican grant, located under the Mexican Government, or under the United States Government."

8. "That if the jury believe, from the evidence, that the Suisun grant and Tolenas grant lie contiguous to and adjoining

Parks v. Alta California Telegraph Company.

---

each other, and that there is embraced within the deseño of the Tolenas grant and the land therein described, a quantity of land outside of the land described in the patent of the United States to Archibald A. Ritchie, greatly exceeding three leagues of land; that, in such case, the said Tolenas grant cannot be interposed and set up as a defense by defendant, without evidence of a specific location of three leagues granted to Armijo, by authority of the government of Mexico or of the United States; and showing that such last mentioned location embraces the land in controversy."

9. "The grant to Armijo does not invest him, or those claiming under him, with a title to any specific three leagues of land. If it is a grant of three leagues within a much larger area, then it is, in legal effect, a grant of land uncertain in its location, to be afterwards surveyed off to him by the government; and until such a survey on the part of the government, designating the three leagues of land granted to Armijo, he, or those claiming under him, have no right or interest which can be alleged in resistance to the right vested in Ritchie, or those claiming under him, by the patent to Ritchie, and this is true, although the land in controversy in this action is embraced within the exterior limits of the larger area, within which the three leagues granted to Armijo are to be located."

It is unnecessary to consider any other of the instructions given or refused, or points made by the Appellants. The judgment must be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

Ordered accordingly.

PARKS v. ALTA CALIFORNIA TELEGRAPH COMPANY.

TELEGRAPH companies in contemplation of law, are common carriers, and are subject to the rules of law governing the same.

Where A contracts with a telegraph company to have his dispatch transmitted, authorizing his agent to secure a debt due him from a third party, by attachment, and this service is so negligently performed that other creditors of the common debtor obtain the first attachment, and exhaust the assets of the debtor—which would not have been the case had the Telegraph Company performed its contract within a reasonable time, the company is liable not only for the cost of the dispatch, but for the amount of A's claim, which constitute the natural and proximate damages resulting from the breach of contract.

APPEAL from the Sixth Judicial District.

Parks v. Alta California Telegraph Company.

---

The Court below held that a telegraph company was not a common carrier; was not in any sense an insurer; that a message had not any market value; and that the measure of damages was limited to the cost of the dispatch, which being two dollars and fifty cents, judgment therefore was rendered. Plaintiff moved for a new trial, which being denied, this appeal was taken in his behalf.

George Cadwalader, for Appellant.

1. The telegraph is a public vehicle; a common carrier; whose value consists in its accuracy and dispatch, which, to be preserved, must be guarded by the strict rules defining the liability of common carriers.

2. No exemption from such liability can be claimed upon the ground that the motive power is a subtle, and often uncontrollable, agent.

3. Debts have all the characteristics of property; and the negligence of the defendant destroyed the value of the debt, owing to the plaintiff.

4. The measure of damages is the cost of the dispatch and the amount of the debt. (5 N. H. 357; 14 Peters, 99; 1 Starkie, 410; 19 Johnson, 381; 9 Bing. 68; 6 Id. 212; 17 Ala. 689; 7 Hill, 61; 13 How. U. S. 307; 18 Vt. 620; 10 Cal. 239; 7 Cush. 522; 8 Pick. 356; 9 Wend. 325; 8 Exchequer, 401; 10 Id. 401; 4 Id. 388; 20 Wend. 327; 24 Penn. 114.)

H. H. Hartley, for Respondent.

1. The rules of law governing common carriers, do not apply to telegraph companies. They are not insurers because a message is without value.

2. The legal measure of damages is the price paid for the dispatch. The loss of the debt is too remote, and the maxim is causa proxima non remota spectatur. (Coggs v. Bernard, 2 Lord Raym. 909; 2 Kent, 558; 1 Pick. 50; Sedg. on Damages, 112; 5 Hill, 472; 15 Pick. 297; 1 Iowa, 406; 1 Lord Raym. 546; 3 Denio, 406; 17 Mass. 168; 21 Wend. 342.)

BALDWIN, J. delivered the opinion of the Court — TERRY, C. J. concurring.

---

Parks v. Alta California Telegraph Company.

---

On the 7th day of October, 1856, about 7 o'clock, P. M. the defendant contracted with the plaintiff, at Mokelumne Hill, for the immediate dispatch of a message to the city of Stockton. The dispatch was directed to the agent of the plaintiff, in these words: "Due, 1,800; attach if you can find property; will send note by to-morrow's stage." This was in answer to a dispatch by the same line received that morning from plaintiff's agent, informing the plaintiff of the failure of a firm of Gillingham & Co. and inquiring the amount due from them to him. An accident prevented the sending of the message, of which the plaintiff was not informed until 9 o'clock, A. M. of the next day. The dispatch was forwarded the next day, which reached the agent at about 12 P. M. but the writ was not delivered to the Sheriff until 6 P. M. At that time, other attachments had been issued at the suit of other creditors, and the property of the defendants all seized under these subsequent attachments, so that nothing was made by the plaintiff's writ. The firm are now insolvent, and the plaintiff claims that he has lost his debt by failure of defendant to transmit this message.

It is found that this failure to send the message was by the gross neglect of the defendant's agent.

Some evidence was offered tending to show that the debt of plaintiff would have been made if the transmission had been made in time, or if the defendant's agent had informed the plaintiff that the defendant could not send the dispatch, that the plaintiff would have gone that night to Stockton, and been in the city early the next morning, in time to have taken proceedings before the other creditors sued and levied.

The rules of law which govern the liability of Telegraph Companies are not new. They are old rules applied to new circumstances. Such companies hold themselves out to the public as engaged in a particular branch of business, in which the interests of the public are deeply concerned. They propose to do a certain service for a given price. There is no difference in the general nature of the legal obligation of the contract between carrying a message along a wire and carrying goods or a package along a route. The physical agency may be different, but the essential nature of the contract is the same. The breach of contract in one case or the other, is, or may be, attended with the same consequences; and the obligation to perform the stipulated duty, is the same in both cases. The importance of the discharge of it in both respects, is the same. In both cases the contract is binding, and the responsibility of the parties for the breach of duty is governed by the same general rules. Nor do we perceive the difficulty experienced by the learned Judge, below, either in estimating the damages or ascertaining the cause of them. The process of ascertainment is the same in this as in other cases of carriers. The breach of the contract entitled the plaintiff to nominal damages, if no real damages were shown. The question of real or special damages, was a question of fact, and this question is dependent upon certain considerations, which, probably, in this case could have been better left to a jury under appropriate instructions, then decided by the Court. For example, the plaintiff had a right to have his message sent according to contract. To ascertain the damages sustained by the breach of this contract these inquiries are pertinent: if the message had been sent, was the plaintiff's agent in Stockton, at the time? and would he have received it? next, would he have then taken out an attachment on the debt? at what time could he have done this? could he have given security? could he have procured Attorneys to issue the writ? at what hour could, and would, it have been put in the hands of the Sheriff? was property there of the debtor's subject to the writ? If a telegraphic dispatch had reached the agent at eight o'clock on the seventh, the agent would have been bound to act at once; it is to be presumed that he would have done so; at least, he can testify whether he would. If he had, the Sheriff is to be presumed willing to do his duty; if he did not, he would be liable to the plaintiff; and thereby the plaintiff's debt would be secured.

Parks v. Alta California Telegraph Company.

---

We see no greater difficulty in this case than in a large class of cases upon which Courts have frequently adjudicated. Take the case of an Attorney: A note is placed in his hands for collection; he fails to sue; other creditors sue on claims placed later in the hands of other Attorneys; these last get judgments, and exhaust the property of the common debtor. Upon showing that the claim was just; that the Attorney failed to sue; that other creditors sued and obtained judgment on suits commenced later than the time the Attorney might and ought to have sued, the Attorney is held liable. It is true that it might be argued that all the intermediate persons might or might not have neglected their duties; but it is not to be presumed. On the contrary, the presumption of law is, that persons intrusted with specific duties will perform them; or if there is no presumption on the subject, the question whether they would, if the defendant had done its duty, becomes a question of proof for a jury or for the Court.

Parks v. Alta California Telegraph Company.

---

Suppose a man, on the eve of the expiration of a policy of insurance on his house, telegraphs to his agent to renew the policy immediately, the agent having the funds and the authority of the principal, and the telegraph company neglects to forward the message, and the house is burned a few days afterwards, could the company defend upon the ground that it could not be known whether the agent would have insured or not? Or, suppose that A bargains for a telegraphic dispatch to his agent to protest a bill of exchange, could the company, if it neglected to send it, set up that the damages were too remote, for it could not be known whether the agent would have taken the bill to the Notary, or the Notary have protested, or given the notice; or whether, if the notice were given, the indorser could have been compelled to pay? Would not the contract, the fact of the bill being due, the agent in the place, the Notary at hand, the apparent solvency of the indorser, be enough to charge the company? At all events, would not the plaintiff be allowed to prove that these things would have been done by the testimony of those who know or have opportunities of knowing the facts, in order to make out his case against the company? It seems to us that the loss of the debt would be the natural and proximate damages resulting from this breach of contract; and so in this case, the plaintiff had a debt on Gillingham & Co.; he wished to get out an attachment; he contracted with the defendant for the conveyance of a telegraphic message to his agent to take out an attachment; in the usual course of things, if the message had been delivered, the agent would have received it on the evening of the seventh; the papers could, with the most ordinary diligence, have been made out, and the writ issued early on the morning of the eighth; placed in the

Sheriff's hands shortly afterwards, the plaintiff's writ would have been entitled to precedence over most of these attachments; there was enough property, as seems to be admitted, to secure the debt. If the facts warrant these conclusions, the plaintiff, we think, was entitled to judgment.

As, however, the Court below has not found these facts directly and distinctly, we think it better to remand this cause, that a full investigation may be had. We are not to be understood as assuming these statements as facts fully proven. We only take them to be such for the purpose of the legal propositions announced. Upon another trial, the facts can be fully elicited, and the conclusions reached from the proofs, without any prejudice arising from this opinion.

The opinion of the Court below is not in accordance with these views, and the judgment is reversed and cause remanded for another trial.

TERRY v. SICKLES.

WHEREIN, in suit on an account stated, the only evidence was that of a witness who said defendant, on presentation of the account, admitted it to be correct and promised to pay it, and the Court charged the jury that, if they believed the testimony of the witness, they must find for plaintiff the amount claimed; and they so found. Held: That the instruction did not prejudice defendant, as but one verdict could have been rendered under the evidence.

To sustain an action on an account stated, it must be shown there was a demand in favor of plaintiff acceded to by defendant. And if defendant does not object to the account as presented, within a reasonable time, his silence will be an admission of its correctness.

In such action evidence that the items of the account are overcharged is not admissible, the complaint being verified, and the answer not averring fraud or mistake in the accounting.

Query: Whether such evidence would be admissible under a general denial if the pleadings were not verified?

Where the pleadings are verified, every matter of defense, not directly responsive to the allegations of the complaint, must be set up in the answer.

APPEAL from the Twelfth District.

Action on an account stated. Complaint and answer verified. The answer admits the purchase of the goods, as stated in the complaint, and avers that defendant agreed to pay fair market price. Denies that there ever was an account stated in which the balance alleged, or any balance, was found due plaintiff; denies that he ever promised to pay, or that, on a just accounting, defendant is indebted to plaintiff in the sum claimed.

---

Terry v. Slekies.

---

On the trial, plaintiff introduced a witness who testified in substance, that, as agent of plaintiff, he presented the account sued on to defendant, who examined it for some time, and said it was correct; but that there were arrangements for settling it in New York, and that if witness did not soon get advices that it was so settled, he, defendant, would settle it with witness. Witness identified the account, and it was given in evidence.

Plaintiff closed. Defendant offered in evidence the original accounts furnished by plaintiff, of which the account in evidence is a summary, showing what the articles were, and the prices charged, and then offered to prove that the articles were charged at more than fair market value. The evidence was ruled out, on objection, defendant excepting. Case closed.

The Court instructed the jury, that if they believed the testimony of the witness, Belknap, in relation to the stating of the account, they must find for the plaintiff the amount claimed.

Verdict for plaintiff; judgment accordingly. Defendant appeals.

Crockett & Crittenden, for Appellant.

I. The instruction was wrong: 1st. The witness did not prove any such admission by the defendant, of a balance due, as would entitle the plaintiff to recover on an account stated. (Chitty on Cont. 562, and cases cited; 2 Greenl. Ev. Sec. 926, and cases cited.) 2d. And whether he did prove such an admission was a question of fact for the jury. (2 Bouv. Law Dic. 519; Porter v. Cooper, 4 Tyrwhitt, 463-465; Const. Art. Sec. 17.)

II. The Court erred in refusing to allow the defendant to give in evidence the original accounts and to prove that the goods were overcharged. (Chitty on Cont. 567, and cases cited; 2 Greenl. Ev. Sec. 128; 5 Phil. Ev. 124; Chappelains v. Dechenaux, 4 Cranch, 306; Waland v. Heson, 7 Id. 237; Perkins v. Hart, 11 Wheat. 237; Barger v. Collins, 7 Harr. and Johns. 313.)

To show fraud or mistake, it was not necessary to allege it in the answer. A general denial under our system is equivalent to the general issue at common law, and it is now settled that any errors in an account stated, may be shown and corrected under the general issue. (2 Greenl. Ev. Sec. 128, and cases cited; Thomas v. Hawkes, 8 Mees. & W. 140.)

, George F. & William H. Sharp, for Respondent.

1. There being no conflict of testimony, the instruction was right. (Nichols v. Rich, 16 Wend. 663; Allen v. Hofman, 2 Dana, 221.)

2. Appellant was not prejudiced. (Dean v. Hewitt, 5 Wend. 257; Evans v. Spillman, 6 B. Mon. 384.)

3. The evidence offered for defense was inadmissible under the answer. (3 Greenl. Ev. Sec. 126; Truman v. Hurst, 1 Tenn. 126; Dawson v. Remnant, 6 Esp. 24.)

There were two opinions rendered in this case. The judgment is the same, but the opinions being different in some particulars, and both covering all the points in the case, the last only, delivered at the July Term, 1860, is inserted here. It was delivered by COPE, J.—FIELD, C. J. concurring.

We have examined the questions in this case, and are satisfied of the correctness of the former decision of this Court. The objection to the instruction given by the Court below is purely technical. The instruction could not have prejudiced the defendant. There was but one witness examined, and his testimony established every fact necessary to entitle the plaintiff to recover. Upon the evidence before them but one verdict could have been rendered by the jury, and we do not see how the instruction can be regarded as such an error as would justify a reversal.

In support of an action upon an account stated, it is necessary to show that there was a demand in favor of the plaintiff, which was acceded to by the defendant. But the admission of the correctness of the demand need not be express and in terms. If the account be sent to the debtor, and he do not object to it within a reasonable time, his acquiescence will be taken as an admission that the account is truly stated. "So," says Greenleaf, "if one item only is objected to, it is an admission of the rest. So, if a person is employed by both parties to examine the accounts in their presence, and he strikes a balance against one, which, though done without authority is not objected to, it is sufficient proof of an account stated." (2 Green. Ev. Sec. 126.) In this case the account was presented to defendant, and he not only admitted its correctness, but promised to pay it.

Gould v. Scannell.

The evidence in relation to the amount of the account was properly excluded. It is not alleged in the answer that there was any fraud or mistake in the original accounting. If the pleadings were not verified, the introduction of this evidence might have been proper under a general denial; but this point does not arise in the case, and we express no opinion in regard to it. In all cases where the pleadings are verified, every matter of defense not directly responsive to the allegations of the complaint must be set up in the answer.

Judgment affirmed.

GOULD v. SCANNELL, SHERIFF, et al.

Is an action to recover personal property, to enable the defendant to obtain the value of the property on judgment of dismissal against the plaintiff for failure to appear, the answer must contain some allegation, or prayer, relative to the change of possession from defendant to plaintiff. The judgment of return or value, is in the nature of a cross judgment, and must be based upon proper averments.

APPEAL from the Fourth District.

The answer simply denies that the defendant wrongfully detains the property, etc. and avers that it was the property of Lavalle, against whom the Sheriff had a writ of attachment, issued in the suit of Mills & Vantine v. Lavalle, and that the property was seized and held by the defendant, Scannell, as Sheriff, in that suit.

The Court below found, among other things, that said property was taken from the possession of defendant, Scannell, by the Coroner, by virtue of the proceedings in this action, and returned to the said Lavalle; and "that the property cannot be returned to the defendant."

Herrick v. Hodges.

BALDWIN, J. delivered the opinion of the Court—TERRY, C. J. concurring.

This action was brought to recover certain personal property. On the trial in the Superior Court, the plaintiff failed to appear, and his complaint was dismissed, and the Court proceeded to render judgment for the defendant for the value of the property, upon a special finding that the same could not be returned. Afterwards, a motion was made in the Superior Court to set aside the judgment, upon the ground of some alleged irregularity in the manner of ascertaining the facts. But when this motion came up for hearing, the plaintiff again failed to appear, and the Court dismissed the motion.

There seems to be no allegation or prayer in the answer in respect to the change of possession of the property from the defendant to the plaintiff; and, therefore, the judgment for the value was erroneous. The judgment of return is in the nature of a cross judgment, and there must be some appropriate averments in the pleadings to put in issue the facts upon which the relief is given. The judgment was erroneous in this respect.

So much of the judgment of the Court below as dismisses the plaintiff's complaint is affirmed, but the judgment in favor of the defendant against the plaintiff for the value of the property is reversed. As the plaintiff below failed to prosecute his suit or motion, and has thereby been guilty of laches, we think the costs of this appeal should be paid by him.

Ordered accordingly.

HERRICK v. HODGES.

WHERE one, having a claim to collect, agreed with another to take his claim against the common debtor and treat it as his own in any suit brought for the debt, costs and expenses to be shared pro rata, and, afterwards, prosecuted both claims to judgment in his own name, and in his own name bought the property of the defendant on execution sale and left it with an agent for sale, he is not liable to an action for money had and received, or in indebitatus assumpsit. For gross negligence or bad faith he would be responsible in a different form of action.

APPEAL from the Fourth District.

The Court gave two instructions: The first as stated in the opinion, and the second as follows:

---

Herrick v. Hodges.

---

That, if Hodges bid in the property for himself, he would be liable, as just stated; but, if he bid for himself and Herrick, then he would be liable to Herrick to account to him for Herrick's proportion of any amount realized, after deducting Herrick's proportion of necessary expenses; and that Hodges, as Herrick's agent, had no right to dispose of the property so bid in without first having authority from Herrick.

Defendant excepted.

The jury found for plaintiff, nine hundred and twenty dollars. Judgment accordingly, and defendant appeals.

Waller & Moore, for Appellant.

Hollady & Cary, for Respondent.

BALDWIN, J. delivered the opinion of the Court — TERRY, C. J. concurring.

Suit brought to recover a sum of money alleged to have been collected by defendant of a firm of Towers & Pierce, in Humboldt County, the defendant acting as agent for the plaintiff, and which money the defendant refused to pay.

It seems defendant had a large claim on this firm, and was about going to Humboldt, from San Francisco, to collect it. Plaintiff had a smaller claim, and the plaintiff and defendant agreed together that defendant should take plaintiff's claim and treat it as his own in any suit to be brought for the collection of the debt, the plaintiff and defendant to share costs and expenses pro rata, but the defendant to make no charge for his personal services. The defendant sued on his claim and plaintiff's together, and got judgment for the aggregate amount in his own name. Execution issued, and defendant bought in the entire property of defendants sold at execution sale under this joint judgment for less than the amount of the entire judgment. One Quick was appointed agent to take care of the property. It seems that the plaintiff knew and approved of these proceedings. It turned out that this property was involved in legal controversies in Humboldt County, so that it was lost to defendant and plaintiff, and that nothing was realized from these proceedings. Quick, the agent, was authorized to dispose of this property at private sale. While this property was in the hands of Quick, defendant gave the plaintiff an order on R. H. Waller, Esq. of San Francisco, for nine hundred and twenty-five dollars, which would have been his proportion of the sum for which the property was bid in, if that property had been considered as cash to that amount. This order on Waller was in these words:

Herrick v. Hodges.

---

“Mr. R. H. WALLER:— You will please pay to A. P. Herrick, or order, nine hundred and twenty-five dollars, or any part thereof, as soon as it may be remitted to you by John Quick, to my credit, but with instructions from him that it is to apply on a claim that the said Herrick assigned over to me against Towers & Pierce. This is the only paper by which to show that he has a claim to the above money.”

(Signed)

WILLARD HODGES.”

The Court charged the jury that, under the evidence adduced, Hodges' purchase would raise a prima facie case that the five thousand four hundred and ninety dollars bid by Hodges for the property was its value, and that he would be liable to Herrick for his proportion of that amount.

1. We think the Court erred in giving this charge. According to our understanding of the matter, Hodges was the agent of Herrick, with full power from Herrick to do with this matter as if it were his own. It was a sort of gratuitous agency he undertook; but it created an obligation to act in good faith, and without gross negligence. But the agency extended as well to the purchase of the property at public sale as it did to the prosecuting of the case to judgment. The bidding in of the property was a mere means of securing the debt, it created no obligations of paying to Herrick his proportion. Hodges did not hold as owner, but as Trustee so far as Herrick's claim is concerned. Even if Hodges had no original authority to bid, the subsequent acquiescence of Herrick was equivalent to that authority.

2. The second instruction is wrong, too. We think that the tendency of the facts was, to show that Hodges had power to dispose of the property without consulting Herrick: 1st. The large measure of powers first given. 2d. The recognition shown of Quick's agency. 3d. The order set out, which evidently contemplates that Quick should sell, and that it was expected he should remit the proceeds to Waller.

Patrick v. Montader.

3. It seems to us that the plaintiff has not taken his proper remedy, if he has any, if we rightly apprehend the true tendency of the proofs.

If defendant had undertaken this agency, he would be bound, though it were gratuitously undertaken, to good faith and ordinary diligence in executing what he pretended to do; but he could not be sued for money received if he never received any, though he failed to get it because of his gross negligence or even bad faith. If, in other words, he neither directly or indirectly received money on account of this agency, though he might be responsible, in a different form of action, for his negligence, he would not be held responsible for money had and received, or in the form of indebitatus assumpsit.

But the errors indicated are sufficient for the reversal of the judgment, which is ordered, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

PATRICK et al. v. MONTADER *et als.

An attachment issued before the maturity of the debt, is prima facie void as against a subsequent attachment.

Taaffe v. Josephson, (7 Cal.) overruled.

Where goods were fraudulently purchased by an insolvent, the creditor may attach before the maturity of the debt, and other creditors, subsequently attaching, cannot complain that the suit was prematurely brought.

The debt in such case, is equitably due, and there being no actual fraud against subsequent creditors, they cannot be preferred in equity, even if the suit could have been defeated by the debtor himself.

Where a first attachment against an insolvent is set aside as fraudulent, in a suit brought by a subsequent attaching creditor, to which various other attaching creditors, prior and subsequent, are parties, the plaintiff in the suit cannot claim priority over the attachments preceding his, on the ground, that by his superior diligence the fraud has been discovered.

Such a fund is not strictly an equitable asset. The prior attachments became liens, in the nature of a legal estate vested in the Sheriff for the benefit of the creditors. Plaintiffs' costs, disbursements, and counsel fees, however, should first be deducted from the fund before distribution.

APPEAL from the Twelfth District.

Sandrie & Lange, Grocers in San Francisco, failed December 1, 1857, having been in business about two years. On that day Alfred de Montader brought suit against them in the Twelfth District Court, on their note to him for fifteen thousand and eighty dollars, and attached their stock in trade. On several subsequent days various other creditors also levied attachments on the same stock. In due time judgments by default were entered in favor of the creditors, and the stock was sold for about seven thousand dollars, under execution upon the judgment of De Montader. Before sale, however, this suit was instituted by plaintiffs, as judgment creditors of Sandrie & Lange, against nearly all of the other judgment creditors who were prior in time to plaintiffs. The object of the suit is to set aside, as fraudulent in fact, the judgment of De Montader, and as fraudulent in law, because suit was prematurely brought, the judgments of the other defendants—excepting only Howes & Co. and Goodwin & Co. The stock was sold, and by stipulation of the parties, the proceeds left in the Sheriff's hands to abide the final decree.

---

---

Among the creditors, made defendants, Moller & Co., Mark Sheldon & Co., Bragg, Rollinson & Co., and J. Paxson, attached on the 2d and 3d of December, while their debts were not due until the 4th of December.

De Montader having assigned his judgment to Moller & Co. and Goodwin & Co. left the State, and was not served with process.

Upon the case being called for trial it was agreed that the main issue of fraud in the De Montader judgment, be tried by the Court, and in the event of that judgment being set aside, that the other issues as to whether the suits of Moller & Co., Bragg, Rollinson & Co., Mark Sheldon & Co., and Paxson, were not prematurely brought, and therefore fraudulent as to the other creditors, be referred. Accordingly, after trial by the Court, the De Montader judgment was found void as to creditors, and after trial before a referee, the judgments of the defendants above named, were also found void, and then, a motion for new trial being overruled, a final decree was entered directing the Sheriff to pay the creditors in the following order, to wit: Howes & Co., plaintiffs, Goodwin & Co., and the rest in the order of their attachments. The fund, however, did not reach them, except a small sum to Moller & Co.

Goodwin & Co. as assignees of the judgment of De Montader, appeal from so much of the decree as sets it aside; and Bragg, Rollinson & Co. and Mark Sheldon & Co. appeal from

Patrick v. Montader.

---

so much of the decree as postpones them to Howes & Co., Goodwin & Co. and plaintiffs.

J. P. Treadwell, for Bragg, Rollinson & Co. and Mark Sheldon & Co. Appellants.

I. The facts found by the referee, and on which the Court below proceeded, do not warrant the decree postponing the attachments of the defendants, Sheldon & Co. and Bragg, Rollinson & Co. to the subsequent attachments of the plaintiffs, and of the defendants, Goodwin & Co. and of Howes & Co.

Where goods are purchased on a credit, with the fraudulent intent never to pay for them, the seller, on discovering the fraud, may treat the credit, or whole special contract, as void, and maintain an action immediately, on an implied assumpsit, for the value of goods sold and delivered. (De Symans v. Minchwich, 1 Esp. 430; Hogan v. Shes, 2 Id. 522; Camp v. Pulver, 5 Barb. Sup. Ct. R. 92, 93; Wilson v. Force, 6 Johns. 109; 110; Bromagim v. Throop, 15 Id. 476; Linningdale v. Livingston, 10 Id. 36, 37; Rickard v. Stanton, 16 Wend. 26; Whipple v. Dow, 2 Mass. 418. As favoring this principle, see Ruiz v. Norton, 4 Cal. 358; Johnson v. Totten, 3 Cal. 343.)

The authority of these cases has not been uniformly followed to their full extent, and there are conflicting decisions. It is held by all the cases, however, that if the goods, so fraudulently purchased, have been sold by the vendee, which is the case here, an action for money had and received may be immediately brought and maintained.

The present suit seems to be grounded on this, that Sheldon & Co. and Bragg, Rollinson & Co. did not count right against Sandrie & Lange; that they should have counted in assumpsit for money had and received, not in assumpsit for the value of goods sold and delivered.

"It is well settled that a stranger cannot interfere upon the grounds of irregularity. When the contest is between creditors, all the equities are in favor of the most diligent. The subsequent execution or attachment creditors can claim no equitable relief. If the proceedings of the prior creditor are not void, but voidable, the defendant can alone object." (Dacey v. Pollock, 8 Cal. 573.)

Patrick v. Montader.

---

This case is not within the rule laid down in Taaffe v. Josephson, (7 Cal. 355,) because there the defendant knew the debt he sued on was not due; and here the debt was fraudulently contracted, a fact not existing in that case.

But that case is not law. The principle of Dana v. Stanford, (10 Cal. 277,) is against it. So with the Practice Act authorizing confession of judgment on a debt not due.

II. The plaintiffs now contend that they are entitled to be preferred to Sheldon & Co. and Bragg, Rollinson & Co. though the attachments of the latter were not fraudulent!

The priority of payment out of equitable assets sometimes, in some States, allowed the creditor first discovering them and filing a creditor's bill, is never extended to legal assets that may be reached by execution at law.

Such priority is never extended to oust, or have priority over, an existing prior lien at law — such as that of the prior attachments of Sheldon & Co. and Bragg, Rollinson & Co. on the same property, in this case.

Montader's judgment was "utterly void," at law, by the statute against fraudulent conveyances. The Sheriff might have so treated it, and have appropriated the proceeds of the property of the junior attachments of the Appellants, and then returned it nulla bona. And then, to an action for a false return, the Sheriff might have pleaded the fraud and facts, as a defense. (4 Wend. 111, and 5 T. R. there cited.) Equitable assets are only such as cannot be reached without the interposition of a Court of Equity.

But the principle of a priority of payment contended for by plaintiffs, is not recognized at all, as a doctrine of general equity jurisprudence; nor a limitation on the rule that equality is equity. (1 Story Eq. Jur. Secs. 553, 554; 8 Cal. 157; 2 Paige, 568.)

Harmon & Labatt, for Appellant, Goodwin & Co. argued, that the finding of the Court below, that the De Montader judgment was fraudulent in fact, was against evidence.

Hoge & Wilson, for Plaintiffs.

1. Can a creditor bring an action for goods sold and delivered

---

Patrick v. Montader.

---

before the term of credit, expressly agreed to, has expired, on the ground that the purchase from him was a fraudulent one?

I. We maintain the negative of the first question on the following points and authorities:

The actions of the Appellants against Sandrie & Lange, could not be maintained on the special contract made between the parties, for the term of credit had not expired. They could not be maintained upon implied agreements, because no agreement is implied when there is an express one. An action, therefore, for goods sold and delivered, could not be maintained at all.

The fraud did not render the contract void, but only voidable, and that at the election of the vendor; but if he elected to avoid, it must be in toto. He cannot affirm the sale in part and disaffirm it in part. If disaffirmed in toto, then the goods became re-invested in the vendors, and they could bring trover or replevin. But they cannot set up the fraud to avoid the express contract of sale, and then waive the fraud and set up an implied contract of sale. (Ferguson v. Carrington, 9 Barn. & Cress. 59; 17 Eng. C. L. entitle the plaintiff to sue, ex contractu, the goods must be sold and turned into money and the action for money had and received must be brought. (Jones v. Hoar, 5 Pick. 285-290. See, also, Rowley v. Bigelow, 12 Id. 312; Ayres v. Hewitt, 19 Me. 283; Minturn v. Main, 3 Seld. 227.) Here, not a fact going to the election to rescind was proven by defendants. If the injured party "have a knowledge of the fraud, he will be presumed to acquiesce if he takes no steps, but sleeps on his rights." (Edmunds v. Hildreth, 16 Ill. 216; Canal v. Potter, 1 Walk. Mich. 13, 373; Boyce Exrs. v. Grundy, 3 Pet. 215; Whitney v. Allaire, 4 Denio, 559.)

The only cases to the contrary of the positions above taken seem to be De Symons v. Minchwinch, (1 Esp. N. P. 430); Hogan v. Shee, (2 Id. 522); Wilson v. Force, (6 Johns. 110,) and Arnold v. Crane, (8 Id. 81.) The earliest case is the one first quoted, and is the authority on which the two New York cases rest. De Symons v. Minchwinch is discussed in Bradbury v. Anderton, (1 Crom. Mee. & Rosc. 490,) and it is there said by Park, B. that "that case has been overruled, and the principle is well established, that where there is an express contract between two parties, the law will not imply another." In Chitty on Contracts, 408, Note (i), it is said: De Symons v. Minchwinch, (1 Esp. 430,) is no longer law." It was decided in 1795, and Hogan v. Shee in 1797; but the whole current of English authorities, ever since, is the other way, and Ferguson & Carrington, (9 Barn. & Cres. 59,) is followed as settled law. Arnold v. Crane, (8 Johns. 81, 82,) is decided on the authority of Wilson v. Force, (6 Id. 110,) and the latter cases in Espinasse.

II. A subsequent attaching creditor can, by bill in chancery, have the attachments thus improperly brought set aside. (Drake on Attach. Ch. 39, p. 771 and cases cited; *McClung v. III. Respondents are entitled to priority, because by their diligence the property has been saved from the judgment of De Montader.

The Appellants say that they had a lien at law, and that the removal of the fraudulent judgment was not necessary to their protection; that De Montader's judgment "was utterly void at law," and that it might have been treated as such at law; that "equitable assets are only such as cannot be reached without the interposition of a Court of Equity." The counsel forgets, that other parties than De Montader and Sandrie & Lange had an interest in that judgment; that it had been assigned to Moller & Co. and to Goodwin & Co. who set it up as good and valid. Their rights could not be disposed of at law. (Smith v. Wright, 6 Black. 551; Lawrence v. Lane, 4 Gilman, 361.) Here then is a necessary resort to chancery to settle the whole question. The plaintiffs here first filed their bill, and having by their superior diligence saved the whole assets in dispute, they are, upon all principles of equity, entitled to priority of payment. (Pierson et al. v. Robb et al. 3 Scam. Ill. 143; Baker v. Bartol, 6 Cal. 486; Page v. O'Neil, 12 Id.)

BALDWIN, J. delivered the opinion of the Court—FIELD, J. and TERRY, C. J. concurring.

Bill filed to subject the proceeds of certain goods to the plaintiff's claim, he being an attaching and judgment creditor of defendants, Sandrie & Lange. One Montader had procured attachment on a large debt claimed to be due from these last defendants. The bill charges that this debt was simulated; the referee and the Court below find that it was. There was a good deal of conflicting proof on the trial. The counsel for the representatives of this claim have made a very plausible and forcible argument, impeaching the propriety of the finding that the claim of Montader was fraudulent. But it is not our habit to review the evidence on questions of fact, and especially in cases of fraud, where the result depends upon various considerations, of greater or less force, to be found in the conduct, dealings, and relations, of the parties, and various circumstances, tending, with more or less directness, to prove or repel the ascription of fraud.

Patrick v. Montader.

---

It is claimed by the plaintiff that the attachments of Sheldon & Co. and Bragg, Rollinson & Co. are fraudulent as against the plaintiff's attachment. The main ground of this charge is that these attachments issued upon accounts for goods which were due on the 4th of December, when the attachments issued two days before. The examination which we have given the authorities convinces us that an attachment is, at least, prima facie, void as against another attachment, when the first is issued before the maturity of the debt. The authorities collected in Drake on Attachment, 775, et seq. sustain the doctrine laid down by the author. The cases of Pierce v. Jackson, (6 Mass. 244); Smith v. Gettinger, (3 Kelly, 145); and Walker v. Roberts, (4 Richardson, 591.) especially, are in point; though the force of the last case is somewhat impaired by the fact that, in South Carolina, a judgment in attachment has only the effect of liquidating the debt and establishing the demand. The ground upon which the decision is placed is the fraud; or, as Chief Justice Parsons says, in the Massachusetts case: "The attempt is against law, and a fraud on the other creditors, for whom some remedy ought to be provided. If, therefore, the plaintiff, when he caused the attachment to be made on his writ, had no cause of action, he cannot claim the benefit of his attachment against a creditor having a good cause of action." Felton v. Wadsworth (7 Cushing, 587), is still more emphatic. In that case the previous decisions of the Supreme Court of Massachusetts are reviewed. The Court say: "The actual fraud is the essential element in the case," and proceeding further, hold this language: "The case of Pierce v. Partridge, is expressly put upon the same principle as that upon which Fairfield v. Baldwin was decided. It appears, therefore, that it was not the intention of the Court to adopt any principle in Pierce v. Partridge, different from that involved in Fairfield v. Baldwin. Nor does it appear that in Pierce v. Partridge the Court intended to extend the principle of the case of Fairfield v. Baldwin; but, on the contrary, the case of Pierce v. Partridge is expressly declared to be within the principle of the case of Fairfield v. Baldwin. Both these cases, therefore, were decided on the ground of fraud, and it is difficult to see on what other ground a party could be deprived of a just debt. The judgments in favor of the plaintiffs were declared invalid because they were fraudulent, and were made the means of defrauding others."

Patrick v. Montader.

---

In the case of Cushing, the party took judgment on his attachment for too much. The Attorney did this by mistake. Within thirty days after the issuing of the execution he went to the defendant and offered to correct the error. It was held that this mistake did not avoid the debt or writ.

2 Kernan, 215, recognizes the same doctrine.

The case of Taaffe v. Josephson, (7 Cal. 355,) is directly opposed to the case in 7 Cushing, and, we think, to reason and the great weight of authority. The arbitrary presumptions which the Court draw from the facts in the case seem to us unauthorized, when applied to the question of fraud in fact. According to that case, if a man should happen to take a judgment for ten dollars too much on a claim for ten thousand dollars, it would be a conclusive proof of fraud and avoid the judgment.

If these claims, therefore, stood on this fact alone, unexplained, there would be no doubt that the plaintiffs could hold these attachments to be mere fraudulent obstructions to his right. But the referee finds, and so the proof seems to be, that there was fraud on the part of these debtor defendants in contracting these debts; that the defendants were insolvent, and bought the goods without any intention of paying for them; and many facts are offered to show this. It may be true, as argued by Respondent's counsel, that this fact gave the plaintiffs in those suits no legal cause of action until the maturity of the debt as fixed by the contract; that is, that no suit could be brought for the goods as on a contract of sale, except according to the terms of the contract. Many respectable authorities hold the contrary, though, probably, the weight of authority, and, certainly, a very strong technical reason, favors the proposition as the learned counsel states it. But there can be no doubt that, in morals and conscience, this money was due from the defendants to these plaintiffs in attachment; there is neither showing nor presumption that the goods were not of the value for which they sold. There is some proof in the record, too, that these goods had been sold by the defendants, and the money received, though this is not so found by the referee. But that this debt, represented by the attachments and judgments, was equitably due at the time of the suing out of the attachment, we think clear. It may be true that if the defendants had chosen to plead a technical rule of law, the action in its present form might have been defeated. But we do not see what obligation rested on the defendants to make this plea, or how, if they did not choose to do so, third persons can complain. There was no fraud in the plaintiffs trying to recover the money for goods of which they have been defrauded. Nor was there fraud in defendants suffering judgment to go when they justly owed the money. If they had confessed judgment for this money, we suppose no man could have imputed fraud to them in the confession, unless it be held that it is fraudulent to pay a creditor whom the debtor has deceived and defrauded, the value of the property of which he has cheated him.

Patrick v. Montader.

---

The objection of the plaintiffs here, then, would seem to be directed to the form of the action of these plaintiffs against the common debtors, rather than against the substance of their act. But, as we said before, the only valid cause of complaint of these plaintiffs against the attachment assailed is for the fraud, which may, to be sure, be shown prima facie to exist, when the note is prematurely sued on, but which, we apprehend, would be rebutted when it was shown that the debt was really presently due, in justice and equity. We think it would be holding the rule with great rigor to decide that in such a case as this, where many of the most respectable authorities hold the suit properly brought, even according to the strictest rules, and when, in fact, this sum was due, at the time of the attachments, in conscience, and even, perhaps, at law—though recoverable in a different way, the plaintiffs below should lose their debts, because they have mistaken the particular form of remedy which they should have adopted. Having obtained a lien for a just debt, a Court of Equity, when they have been summoned before it, when there is no proof of actual fraud, would, according to its known liberal course of procedure, permit them to hold it. The plaintiffs here asking equity must do it, and it is only upon the ground of actual fraud that chancery usually holds void the contracts or liens of creditors in favor of junior creditors or purchasers.

Hyman v. Read.

---

It is contended that the plaintiffs here, by virtue of their superior diligence, have gained priority over the claims of these Appellants. But, we think, the rule cannot be invoked in this case. There are not, strictly, equitable assets, discovered by these plaintiffs, and only to be reached in equity. The Appellants had a lien, by virtue of their levies, subordinate only to other prior liens. It was in the nature of a legal estate vested in the Sheriff for their benefit. But a short time elapsed after their levy before the filing of this bill. They were not asked to go in with the plaintiffs to set aside this fraudulent attachment of Montader. They had shown nothing like abandonment of their right to subject these goods in priority to the plaintiffs. The plaintiffs have brought them into Court as parties to this proceeding. The effect of the bill is to marshal these assets and distribute them according to the rights of the several parties before the Court. The necessary parties and the necessary pleadings were made. We do not see why a final decree could not be rendered in equity, which delights in closing litigation, and abhors multiplicity of actions—settling all the rights and equities of the parties. The plaintiffs' reasonable costs, disbursements, and counsel fees, should be first deducted from the fund recovered, and the balance distributed as we have indicated.

The judgment will be reversed and remanded for a decree according to the principles of this opinion.

Ordered accordingly.

HYMAN v. READ.

ROYAL grants, made at the solicitation of the grantees, are to be construed liberally for the King. But, when made ex mero motu regis, the construction is in favor of the grantees.

Legislative grants are to be construed liberally in favor of the grantees.

The Act of March, 1851, commonly called the San Francisco Water Lot Act, should be construed favorably to the city, and includes all land within the boundaries fixed by the survey referred to in the Act.

Nothing in the Act of May, 1851, indicates any intention on the part of the Legislature to exclude the public slips from the Act of March.

Hyman v. Read.

---

APPEAL from the Twelfth District.

Ejectment for a lot, being part of what was formerly known as the City Slip, bounded by Clay, Davis, and Sacramento streets and the waters of the bay, in the city of San Francisco.

It is deemed unnecessary to state the facts. The whole controversy was as to the construction of the Act of March, 1851, known as the Water Lot Act, relative to San Francisco, and the Act of May, 1851, referred to in the opinion. And the question was, whether the title to what are called "slips," that is, water lots surrounded on three sides by wharfs, etc. and opening out into the bay, and not divided into "lots," technically speaking, at the time of the passage of the Act of March, 1851, vested under that Act in the city of San Francisco, or whether those "slips" remained the property of the State, subject to sale under the Act of May 18th, 1853, appointing Commissioners to sell the State's interest in the water lot property in San Francisco, and the Act of May 1st, 1855, supplementary thereto.

Plaintiff claimed under the Act of 1855; defendant under the city through the Act of March, 1851.

Defendant had judgment, and plaintiff appeals.

Heydenfeldt, for Appellant.

The first section of the Act of 1851, is devoted exclusively to a description of the property, and I direct particular attention to the salient points of description. The points are —

1st. All the lots of land.

2d. According to the survey of the city.

3d. According to the map of the same.

4th. Are known and designated as the San Francisco Beach and Water Lots. By the second section of the Act, "the use and occupation of all the land described in the first section," is granted to the city for ninety-nine years.

What is "the land" described, and made the subject matter exclusively in the first section?

It is beyond dispute, "the beach and water lots, according to the survey and the map." Then the question arises, can the strip which has been described pass under the denomination of "lot of land?" Upon examining the map it will be seen, that all the property within the lines described in the Act of 1851 is divided and subdivided into lots of different sizes, with the exception of the space occupied by this slip. Now, it is clear, upon authority and principle, that the map must be taken not only as explanatory of the grant, but as a part of it. (Lincoln v. Wilder, 29 Maine, 169; Davis v. Rainsford, 17 Mass. 207; Sutherland v. Jackson, 32 Maine, 80; Blake v. Doherty, 5 Wheat. 359.) The city took "lots" according to the map. What is a lot? The rule is to give to words the meaning which is commonly accepted. This word, as applied to land, is purely an American application. Webster is the only orthoepist who mentions the sense in which it is used in this connection. He says: "In the United States a piece or division of land;" and he illustrates it thus: "So we say, a man has a lot of land in Broadway, or in the meadow; he has a lot on the plain, or on the mountain; he has a home-lot, a house-lot, a wood-lot."

---

Now, in the Act of 1851, the Legislature speaks of pieces and subdivisions, as shown upon the map, as commonly and universally recognized as lots, according to American usage, and only of such as were so recognized. If, therefore, any portion of it would not in common parlance be called a "lot of land," it cannot be deemed within the description. Besides, if they intended to grant all the land independent of its apparent subdivisions on the map, how easy, indeed how much easier, it would have been to have done so. For the Act describes two lines, an interior or land line, and an exterior or water line. How simple it would have been to grant all the land lying within these two lines, instead of "the San Francisco Beach and Water Lots, according to the survey and the map of said city on file in the Recorder's office."

Again: Something is due to contemporaneous legislative exposition. About one month after the passage of the above named Act, the same Legislature passed another Act entitled "An Act in relation to the City of San Francisco." (See Acts of 1851, 311.) This has been commonly called "the Second Water Lot Bill." Its first section gives the city the right to construct wharfs at the ends of streets, etc. The second section relinquishes the right of the State to the beach and water lot property, upon the express conditions that the city shall confirm the titles to lots granted by Justices of the Peace, and

---

Hyman v. Read.

---

it confirms them on behalf of the State, and closes with this provision: "that this Act shall not be construed as confirming grants to the property known as the Public Slip, bounded by Davis, Clay, and Sacramento streets."

I insist, therefore, that the Legislature disclose by this proviso, that they knew of the existence of this property and its uses as a slip, and did not know it as a lot of land; and the inference is irresistible, that as they excluded it from passing for the purposes of the second Act, they never intended it should pass by the first Act.

I invoke another rule of instruction, to wit: that grants by the sovereign must be construed most beneficially for the sovereign. (2 Black. 347; Canal Co. v. Wheely, 2 Barn. & Adol. 792; Hall Dock Co. v. La March, 8 B. & C. 51; Canal Co. v. Hastler, 1 B. C. 424; U. S. v. Arredondo, 6 Pet. 738, and authorities cited; Charles R. Bridge v. W. Bridge, 11 Pet. 545; Mayor v. The O. & P. R. R. Co. 26 Penn. 355; McLeod v. Burroughs, 9 Geo. 213; Townsend v. Brown, 4 Zab. 80; Plank Road v. Elmer, 1 Stock. 754; 8 Porter 9.)

Again: Land does not pass as appurtenant to other land; it must pass only by its own description in the deed. (Cole v. Haynes, 22 Vt. 588; Chinaweth v. Haskell, 3 Pet. 96; State v. Clements, 32 Maine, 297.)

Hoge & Wilson, for Respondent.

The phrase "Beach and Water Lots," was the common designation of all the lands on the east part of San Francisco, between Point Rincon and Fort Montgomery, from 1847, down to the passage of the Act of March, 1851. (See the Kearny Grant; Captain Halleck's report as Secretary of State to Governor Mason, made before the land was divided into what are strictly city "lots;" also, the survey made by the City Surveyor in 1847, when Bryant was Alcalde.)

These surveys left undivided into town lots, within the boundaries of the Water Lot Act of 1851, and lying in larger lots or blocks, the following lands, viz: All east of Front Street, between Vallejo and Pacific; all east of Davis, between Pacific and Jackson; all east of Front, between Jackson and Washington; all east of Drumm, between Washington and Clay; all east of Davis, between Clay and Sacramento; two fractional blocks, and one small block, off Rincon Point; and also, all the land covered with water, nearly two miles in length, from the side of Fort Montgomery toward the Golden Gate, and a like tract about a mile in length from Rincon Point south to Mission Creek. None of these tracts were divided into those small subdivisions called town lots.

Hyman v. Read.

---

Prior to the first Water Lot Act, and in the early settlement of San Francisco, great doubt existed as to the rights of the town and the powers of the officers of the government. General Kearny, conceiving himself to have the power as Governor, clearly intended to cede to the town the entire bulk of the overflowed land between Rincon Point and Fort Montgomery, which would make a line about like or near the present city front. He meant by the phrase, "The Beach and Water Lots," the land—"the ground"—in that boundary, and did not use the word "lots" as "subdivisions as shown upon the map." It was then supposed that the town, by surveying "the ground" into those small "subdivisions," after that grant, and selling them could convey to the purchasers perfect titles, and had this been true, "blocks" never laid out would just as much have belonged to the town as those that were subdivided, and could at any time afterward have been laid out, subdivided, and sold. Subsequently it was discovered that the "Kearny grant" had no validity, and the doctrine of the case of Pollard's Lessee v. Hagan, 3 How. S. C. U. S. R. 212, followed afterward by Good Title v. Kibbe, 9 Id. 477; Doe v. Kibbe, 13 Id. 25, became the prevailing doctrine, and the title was by all avowed to be in the State of California. It was upon this basis that the Water Lot Act was passed. This Act was passed in the main to carry out and confirm all that had been done under the Kearny grant, but not merely that. Had it been intended only to convey to the city and her grantees the lots—that is, those small subdivisions called city lots—and in the limited sense that counsel uses the word. the boundary of the Water Lot Act of March 26th, 1851, would have been identical with that of Kearny's grant, for all the surveys and subdivisions into such lots were before then inside of and in pursuance of the Kearny grant, and on the assumption of its validity. But that Act does not stop with the Kearny grant, but extends about two miles north and west, and about one mile south and west into a great mass of water property, never surveyed or even platted into town lots before that Act, which was passed by the Legislature, with a knowledge of all the facts, and refers on its face to the Kearny grant; the sales made by the city under that grant; the Government Reservation, and the leases by the government officers.

Hyman v. Read.

---

All the land in the boundaries of the Kearny grant, was called "the beach and water lots," or in other words, all the water property claimed by the town, was called "the beach and water lots." The Legislature, besides granting, enlarged the boundary of the water property of the city, and applied to it the same appellation of "the beach and water lots," which it borrowed from the Kearny grant. As the Kearny grant laid down a distinct boundary, and called the land within it, "the beach and water lots," so Section 1 of the Act of 26th March, 1851, lays down a certain boundary, and designates the land within it as the "beach and water lots." That phrase had assumed a peculiar and somewhat technical signification, and was used by the Legislature in that sense, being in fact, synonymous with "water property." The State claimed and owned the whole of the property within the boundaries, as well as the tracts and blocks, not divided, as the smaller subdivisions, called town lots; she was making a donation to her great commercial city, and establishing a permanent boundary line or water front, and no good reason would seem to exist for such distinction by the State, between different parts of the property within the boundaries, nor for such an implied reservation, when she does make other express reservations. Where there are express reservations, there cannot be implied ones. Expressio unius, exclusio alterius. Why was not "the permanent water front" of San Francisco made on the line of the small subdivided city lots? Why were large blocks, squares, and irregular tracts, left between those small lots and that permanent front? What was the policy of the State in ceding any of this property to the city? Did not that policy dictate a cession of the blocks as well as the lots?

Counsel further argued, that legislation exposition was with Respondent; citing Act May 1st, 1851, showing that the line of the "permanent water front" of the city, under the Act of March, 1851, is the outside line of the beach and water lots.

Hymen v. Read.

---

The reference to "the survey of the city of San Francisco and the map or plat of the same," was not made in the Act of March 26th, for the purpose of showing what lots had been laid out, subdivided, and numbered, but for the purpose of fixing the boundaries only. The language of the Act is not, "all the lots" laid out on "the map or plats of the same," etc. but, "all the lots of land situate with the following boundaries, according to the survey of the city of San Francisco, and the map or plat," etc. that is, "the boundaries according to the survey," etc.

The fact is, that the Act of March 26th, assumed that many streets were extended beyond what they were in fact, and made a boundary to correspond thereto, without any map being plated and in existence, that precisely agreed with the Act. (Wood v. San Francisco, 4 Cal. 193, 194.) In the case of Holland v. The City of San Francisco, (7 Cal. 361,) the city slip is expressly decided to be a part of the beach and water lot property, and to have actually passed by the Act of 26th March, 1851, to the city, for ninety-nine years.

McDougall & Sharp, and F. M. Haight, also for Respondent, filed separate briefs, maintaining similar views to those contained in the foregoing brief; and the former, against the point of Appellant, that the grant in question must be construed in favor of the grantor, cited: 2 Blac. 347; United States v. Arredondo, (6 Peters, 738;) and argued that the general doctrine as to royal grants has no existence in this country; that we have no such things as grants by the grace of the crown, at the suit of the subject; nor any such thing as grants "ex speciali gratia, certa scientia, et mero motu;" that all grants, with us, are supposed to be made for some sufficient consideration, moving the government as well as individuals, and, therefore, according to the note cited from Blackstone, stand upon the same ground with private grants; and, further, that grants to private corporations, ex gratia, stand upon very different grounds, from grants to private persons; that this grant to the city of San Francisco, is not within any of the rules cited, nor within their reason; it was to the city of San Francisco, itself a department of the government, for the purposes of better administration; and the act, according to settled rules of construction, is to be construed liberally, for the maintenance of the administration.

Hyman v. Road.

TERRY, C. J. delivered the opinion of the Court — FIELD, J. concurring.

This is an action of ejectment, for a lot in that portion of San Francisco known as the City Slip. Plaintiffs claim under a purchase from the State Land Commissioner, and the defendant sets up title in the city, under the Act of March, 1851, commonly called the Water Lot Act.

The decision involves a construction of the Water Lot Act — the main question being, whether the lot in question forms a part of the property granted to the city by the terms of that Act. It was, at the time of the passage of the Act in question, part of an open slip, inclosed on three sides by wharfs, and open toward the bay, so that vessels could sail in and out.

The language of the first section is: "All lots of land situated within the following boundaries, according to the survey of the city of San Francisco, and the map or plat of the same now on record in the office of the county of San Francisco, and known and designated in this Act as beach and water lots." The section then proceeds to give the boundaries within which all the lots mentioned are situated. The second section provides that "the use and occupation of all the land described in the first section of this Act is hereby granted to the city of San Francisco," etc.

If this were a grant from an individual, there can be no doubt that the words used would be sufficient to pass all the land included in the general boundaries, whether laid off in lots or not. It is, however, contended by Appellant that grants from the sovereign are subject to a rule of construction different from that of grants of private persons; that the language of the Act does not clearly indicate the intention of the Legislature to grant any land, except such as was designated as "water lots" on the map referred to; that the Act must be construed most favorably to the grantor, and, therefore, the premises in question did not pass by it.

We are by no means satisfied that the statute is justly amenable to the charge of ambiguity, tested by ordinary rules. It appears sufficiently to indicate the intention to grant all the land included in the boundary designated. The grant is not of lots of land according to the survey, but of all lots of land within boundaries fixed by reference to the survey. The survey is not referred to as determining the boundaries respectively of the lots granted, but of the territory which included all the lots. We can see nothing in the language of the Act of May, 1851, which discloses an intention on the part of the Legislature to exclude the public slip from the operation of the Act of March. The Act of May, which confirmed certain grants known as Colton grants, made by an Alcalde to individuals, provided, "that this Act shall not be construed as confirming grants to the property known as the public slip, bounded by Davis, Clay, and Sacramento streets."

Hyman v. Read.

---

The land, at the time, was an open slip, used for the purposes of commerce, and, in order that the city might continue to use it in this manner, the Legislature refused to confirm grants to portions of it which had been made to individuals, the effect of such confirmation being to deprive the city of control over it.

But admitting for the purposes of the argument, that the language of the Act is uncertain and ambiguous, we think the Appellant has failed to establish his legal proposition, that the grant should receive a strict construction in favor of the grantor.

The rule for construing grants from the King is thus laid down by Blackstone, (2 Com. 347): "A grant made by the King, at the suit of the grantee, shall be taken most beneficially for the King, and against the party; whereas, the grant of a subject is construed most strongly against the grantor. Wherefore, it is usual to insert in the King's grants that they are made, not at the suit of the grantee, but 'ex speciali gratia, certa scientia, et mero motu regis;' and, then, they have a more liberal construction." In Note 4 to this text, it is said, "Royal grants, for a valuable consideration, are also liberally construed in favor of the grantee."

The construction and leaning shall be in favor of the subjects, if the grant show that it was not made at the solicitation of the grantee, but ex speciali gratia, certa scientia, et mero motu regis. "The grants of the King, when valid in general, bind him, though without consideration, as subjects are bound by their grants." (Chitty on Prerogative, Chap. 16, Sec. 5.)

A very thorough examination of this question was made by Judge Story, in the case of Charles River Bridge v. Warren Bridge et al. (11 Peters, commencing page 589.) The opinion of Judge Story on this question, which was not necessary to the decision of the case, has not the force of a judicial decision, but being the deliberate and careful elaborated conclusion of a very learned and able jurist, upon a point presented and solemnly argued in the case before him, it is entitled to the utmost respect, especially as it is sustained by cogent reasoning, and by reference to authorities. He says: "It is a well known rule in the construction of private grants, if the meaning of the words be doubtful, to construe them most strongly against the grantor. But it is said that an opposite rule prevails in cases of grants by the King; for, where there is any doubt, the construction is made most favorably for the King and against the grantee. The rule is not disputed. But it is a rule of very limited application. To what cases does it apply? To such cases, only, where there is a real doubt, where the grant admits of two interpretations, one of which is more extensive, and the other more restricted, so that a choice is fairly open, and either may be adopted without any violation of the apparent objects of the grant. If the King's grant admits of two interpretations, one of which will make it utterly void and worthless, and the other will give it a reasonable effect, then the latter is to prevail; for the reason (says the common law) "that it will be more for the benefit of the subject and the honor of the King, which is to be more regarded than his profit." (Com. Dig. Grant, G. 12; 9 Co. R. 131, a; 10 Id. 67, b; 3 Id. 6.) And in every case the rule is made to bend to the real justice and integrity of the case. No strained or extravagant construction is to be made in favor of the King. And if the intention of the grant is obvious, a fair and liberal interpretation of its terms is enforced. The rule itself is also expressly dispensed with in all cases where the grant appears upon its face, to flow, not from the solicitation of the subject, but from the special grace, certain knowledge, and mere motion of the crown, or, as it stands in the old royal patents, 'ex speciali gratia, certa scientia, et ex mero motu regis.' (See Arthur Legate's Case, 10 Co. R. 109, 112, b; Sir John Moulin's Case, 3 Id. 6; 2 Black. Com. 347; Com. Dig. Grant, G. 12,) and these words are accordingly inserted in most of the modern grants of the crown, in order to exclude any narrow construction of them. So the Court admitted the doctrine to be in Attorney-General v. Lord Eardly, (8 Price, 69). But what is a most important qualification of the rule, it never did apply to grants made for a valuable consideration by the crown, for in such grants the same rule has always prevailed, as in cases between subjects. The mere grant of a bounty of the King may properly be restricted to its obvious intent. But the contracts of the King for value are liberally expounded that the dignity and justice of the government may never be jeopardized by petty evasions and technical subtleties."

---

Hyman v. Road.

Again, on page 590, he says, "So in respect to implications in cases of royal grants, there is not the slightest difficulty, either upon authority or principle, in giving them a large effect so as to include things which are capable of being the subject of a distinct grant. A very remarkable instance of this sort arose under the statute of prerogative, (17 Edw. II, Stat. 2, Ch. 15,) which declared that when the King granteth to any a manor or land, with the appurtenances, unless he makes express mention in the deed, in writing, of advowsons, etc. belonging to such manor, then the King reserveth to himself such advowsons. Here, the statute itself prescribed a strict rule of interpretation. Yet, in Whistler's Case, (10 Co. R. 63,) it was held that a royal grant of a manor, with the appurtenances, in as ample a manner as it came to the King's hands, conveyed an advowson which was appendant to the manor by implication from the words actually used, and the apparent intent. This was certainly a very strong case of raising an implication from words susceptible of different interpretations, where the statute had furnished a positive rule for a narrow construction, excluding the advowson. So it has been decided that if the King grants a messuage and all land spectantes, aut cum eo dismissas, lands which have been enjoyed with it for a convenient time, pass. (2 Rolle Abridg. 186, C. 25, 30; Cro. Car. 169; Chitty on the Prerogatives, Ch. 16, S. 3, 393; Com. Dig. Grant, G. 5.) In short, wherever the intent from the words is clear, or possesses a reasonable certainty, the same construction prevails in crown grants as in private grants; especially where the grant is presumed to be from the voluntary bounty of the crown, and not from the representation of the subject."

Again, on page 596, he says: "But what, I repeat, is most material to be stated, is, that all this doctrine in relation to the King's prerogative of having a construction in his own favor, is exclusively confined to cases of mere donation, flowing from the bounty of the crown. Whenever the grant is upon a valuable consideration, the rule of construction ceases, and the grant is expounded exactly as it would be in the case of a private grant, favorably to the grantee. Why is this rule adopted? Plainly, because the grant is a contract, and is to be interpreted according to its fair meaning. It would be to the dishonor of the government, that it should pocket a fair consideration, and then quibble as to the obscurities and implications of its own contract. Such was the doctrine of my Lord Coke, and of the venerable sages of the law in other times, when a resistance to prerogative was equivalent to removal from office. Even in the worst ages of arbitrary power, and irresistible prerogative, they did not hesitate to declare that contracts founded on a valuable consideration ought to be construed liberally for the subject, for the honor of the crown. (2 Co. Inst. 496. See, also, Com. Dig. Franchise C. F. 6.) If we are to have the grants of the Legislature construed by the rules applicable to royal grants, it is but common justice to follow them throughout for the honor of this Republic. The justice of the commonwealth, will not (I trust) be deemed less extensive than that of the crown."

Hyman v. Read.

---

The case of Arredondo, (6 Peters,) does not, as we conceive, conflict with this view, inasmuch as the grant then under consideration, was a grant from the sovereign, made at the suit of the grantee.

But, if we are mistaken as to the rule of construction applicable to grants from the crown, there is no doubt that both on principle and authority, a legislative grant should be construed liberally in favor of the grantee. We again quote from 11 Peters, 597: "The present, however, is not the case of a royal grant, but of a legislative grant, by a public statute. The rules of the common law in relation to royal grants have, therefore, in reality, nothing to do with the case." We are to give this act of incorporation a rational and fair construction, according to the general rules which govern in all cases of the exposition of public statutes. We are to ascertain the legislative intent; and that once ascertained, it is our duty to give it a full and liberal operation. The books are full of cases to this effect, (see Com. Dig. Parliament, 10-28; Bac. Abridg. Statute,) if, indeed, so plain a principle of common sense and common justice stood in any need of authority to support it. Lord Chief Justice Eyre, in the case of Boulton v. Bull, (2 H. 136, 463, 500,) took notice of the distinction between the construction of a crown grant, and a grant by an Act of Parliament; and held the rules of the common law, introduced for the protection of the crown in respect to its own grants, to be inapplicable to a grant by an Act of Parliament. "It is observed," said his Lordship, "that there is nothing technical in the composition of an Act of Parliament. In the exposition of statutes, the intent of Parliament is the guide. It is expressly laid down in our books, (I do not here speak of penal statutes,) that every statute ought to be expounded, not according to the letter, but the intent." Again, he said: "This case was compared to the case of the King being deceived in his grants. But I am not satisfied that the King, proceeding by and with the advice of Parliament, is in that situation, in respect to which he is under the special protection of the law; and that he could on that ground be considered as deceived in his grant. No case was cited to prove that position.

Now, it is to be remembered, that his Lordship was speaking upon the construction of an Act of Parliament of a private nature; an Act of Parliament in the nature of a monopoly; an Act of Parliament granting an exclusive patent for an invention to the celebrated Mr. Watt. And let it be added, that his opinion as to the validity of that grant, notwithstanding all the obscurities of the Act, was ultimately sustained in the King's Bench by a definitive judgment in its favor. (See Hornblower v. Boulton, 8 T. R. 95.) A doctrine equally just and liberal has been repeatedly recognized by the Supreme Court of Massachusetts. In the case of Richards v. Daggett, (4 Mass. 534-537,) Mr. Chief Justice Parsons, in delivering the opinion of the Court, said: "It is always to be presumed that the Legislature intend the most beneficial construction of their Acts, when the design of them is not apparent." (See, also, Inhabitants of Somerset v. Inhabitants of Dighton, 12 Mass. 383; Whitney v. Whitney, 14 Id. 88; 8 Id. 523; Holbrook v. Holbrook, 1 Pick. 248; Stanwood v. Pearce, 7 Mass. 458.) Even in relation to mere private statutes, made for the accommodation of particular citizens, and which may affect the rights and privileges of others, Courts of Law will give them a large construction, if it arise from necessary implication. (Coolidge v. Williams, 4 Mass. 145.)

Again, on p. 601, "An attempt has however been made to put the case of legislative grants upon the same footing as royal grants, as to their construction, upon some supposed analogy between royal grants and legislative grants under our republican forms of government. Such a claim in favor of republican prerogative is new, and no authority has been cited which supports it. Our Legislatures neither have, nor affect to have, any royal prerogatives. There is no provision in the Constitution authorizing their grants to be construed differently from the grants of private persons, in regard to the like subject matter. The policy of the common law, which gave to the crown so many exclusive privileges, and extraordinary claims, different from those of the subject, was founded, in good measure, if not altogether, upon the divine right of kings, or, at least, upon a sense of their exalted dignity and pre-eminence over all subjects, and upon the notion that they are entitled to peculiar favor, for the protection of their kingly rights and office. Parliamentary grants never enjoyed any such privileges. They were always construed according to common sense and common reason, upon their language and their intent. What reason is there that our legislative acts should not receive a similar interpretation? Is it not at least as important in our free government that a citizen should have as much security for his rights and estate derived from the grants of the Legislature, as he would have in England? What solid ground is there to say, that the words of a grant in the mouth of a citizen, shall mean one thing, and in the mouth of the Legislature shall mean another thing? That in regard to the grant of a citizen, every word shall, in case of any question of interpretation or implication, be construed against him, and in regard to the grant of the government, every word shall be construed in its favor? That language shall be construed, not according to its natural import and implications from its own proper sense and the objects of the instrument, but shall change its meaning, as it is spoken by the whole people or by one of them? There may be very solid grounds to say, that neither grants nor charters ought to be extended beyond the fair reach of their words, and that no implications ought to be made, which are not clearly deducible from the language and the nature, and objects of the grant.

In the case of a legislative grant, there is no ground to impute surprise, imposition, or mistake, to the same extent as in a mere private grant of the crown. The words are the words of the Legislature upon solemn deliberation, and examination, and debate. Their purport is presumed to be known, and the public interests are watched and guarded by all the varieties of local, personal, and professional, jealousy; as well as by the untiring zeal of members devoted to the public service."

We think the terms of the Act of 1851 should be construed favorably to the grantee: 1st. Because it is not a grant made at the suit, or upon solicitation of the grantee. 2d. That it is a grant upon a valuable consideration, and was in the nature of a contract, the grantee assuming the trouble and cost of managing and disposing of the land, and being bound to pay to the State twenty-five per cent. upon all money received from sales of the property conveyed, which was done. 3d. That it is the deliberate public act of the Legislature.

Judgment affirmed.

SCOTT v. WARD.

By the Mexican law, one-half interest in the community property vested in the wife upon the death of the husband, and was not subject to his testamentary disposition.

The same rule prevails under our statute.

The case of the matter of the Estate of Buchanan, (8 Cal. 507,) affirmed.

Under the Spanish and Mexican law, property acquired by husband and wife during the marriage, and whilst living together, whether by onerous or lucrative title, and that acquired by either of them by onerous title, belonged to the community; whilst property acquired by either of them, by lucrative title solely, constituted the separate property of the party making the acquisition. The fruits, and profits, and increase, of the separate property, also, belonged to the community. By onerous title was meant that which was created by a valuable consideration, as the payment of money, the rendition of services, and the like, or by the performance of conditions, or payment of charges, to which the property was subject. Lucrative title was created by donations, devise, or descent.

Where a Mexican grant contained the following clauses designated in the instrument as conditions, namely: "1st. Neither the grantee nor his heirs can divide, nor alienate the premises granted to them, nor place upon said premises any mortgage or other charge, even though such mortgage or charge be for pious purposes, nor shall they convey the said premises in mortmain. 2d. He may inclose the premises without prejudice to the roads and the easement: he shall enjoy the premises freely and exclusively, devoting them to such cultivation and use as he may see proper. 3d. When the property shall be confirmed to him, he shall ask the proper Judge that he give him juridical possession in virtue of this title, for which purpose the boundaries shall be marked, and some landmarks shall be placed about said premises. 4th. The land which is embraced in this grant, is only that which is named in the petition of the grantee, and which is delineated in the sketch attached hereto, and the Judge who shall give him possession thereof, shall make to this government a report of the quantity of land comprised in the grant." Held, that these clauses were not properly conditions, and that there was nothing in any of the provisions which was onerous or burdensome to the grantee, or which could be regarded as a valuable consideration, moving the government to make the grant.

Donations may be absolute, or accompanied with conditions, the performance of which may be essential to the enjoyment of the property donated. It would seem that under the Spanish and Mexican law, a more comprehensive meaning was attached to the term donation than that usually given to it in our jurisprudence.

Onerous conditions were not necessarily attached to grants issued under the colonization laws of Mexico.

The land granted with the conditions above specified, constituted the separate property of the grantee, and passed to his devisees. The conditions did not change the transaction from that of donation to one of contract or purchase.

The recital in the grant that the grantee solicited the land for his personal benefit and that of his family, does not control the operative words of the grant.

APPEAL from the Third District.

This case was presented upon an agreed statement of the case under the 377th Section of the Practice Act. The facts are as follows: In February, 1830, Ygnacio Alviso and Maria Louisa Peralto were intermarried. In July, 1835, Alviso petitioned the Governor of California for a grant of the place called "Rincon de los Esteros." The Governor referred the petition to the Ayuntamiento of San José, and to the Reverend Father, minister of the Mission of Santa Clara. A favorable report was received from both the Ayuntamiento and the Minister, and in February, 1838, Juan B. Alvarado, then governor of California, issued to Alviso a grant for the place for which he had petitioned. This grant was afterwards confirmed by the Departmental Assembly of California. The following are copies of the petition of Alviso, the order referring the same to the Ayuntamiento and Reverend Father, their reports in relation to the same, the decree of the Governor thereon, the grant to Alviso, and the certificate of the confirmation of the grant by the Departmental Assembly:

"MONTEREY, August 12th, 1835.

In accordance with the laws relative to the subject the Ayuntamiento of San José Guadalupe will report whether the petitioner possesses the requisites to entitle him to what he asks, if the land he asks for is not comprised in the twenty limiting leagues, but in ten littoral leagues mentioned in the law of August 18th, 1824; whether it belongs to any individual, mission, corporation, or pueblo, and all else relating to it. This done, transfer this expediente to the reverend fathers, Ministers of the Mission of Santa Clara, that they may report in relation to the matter. José Figueroa, General of Brigade, General Commandant and Inspector, and Superior Political Chief of the Territory of Upper California, so I order, decree, and sign, which I certify.

NEGRETTE, Sec'y."

"This illustrious Council having examined with care as well the petition of the citizen, Ygnacio Alviso, as the respectable decree of your Excellency, of the date of August 12th, 1835, has seen fit to make the following report: The land is not irrigable, but subject to the season, having watering-places; it is not comprised within the twenty limiting leagues, nor the ten littoral leagues. The petitioner is a Mexican citizen, who has performed many services to the country, and is a retired Sergeant: that the land does not belong to any individual or mission, and it does belong to the commons of this pueblo, in view of the fact that the petitioner possesses it with the consent of this council, Transfer this expediente to the Reverend Father, Minister of the Mission of Santa Clara."

"Superior Political Chief:

In obedience to the preceding decree of your Excellency, I say, that the place asked for does not belong to this mission, nor to any individual, but it does belong to the commons of the pueblo of San José Guadalupe. It is subject to the season; has watering-places, and is not irrigable. Also, that it is not comprised within the twenty limiting leagues, but is within the ten littoral leagues.

The petitioner is a Mexican citizen, a retired Sergeant, with numerous cattle. He has a family, and is deserving and meritorious for his services done for the territory, for which, in my opinion, he is deserving of any favor.

"MONTEREY, February 10, 1838.

Having examined the petition with which this expediente commences, the report of the municipal authority of the Pueblo de San José, with all else, in conformity with the laws relating to the subject, Ygnacio Alviso is declared the owner in property of the land called Rincon de los Esteros, according to the accompanying map, and within the limits marked upon it, subjecting himself to the conditions established by the laws of August 18th, 1824, and the regulations of November 21st, 1828. Let the corresponding dispatch be issued and a record made in the proper book, and direct this expediente to the Most Excellent Deputation for its approval, in which case the grantee to whom this decree is made known will present his title again that it be re-validated. ## GRANT TO YGNACIO ALVISO.

The Citizen Juan B. Alvarado, Political Chief ad interim of Upper California:

Whereas, Ygnacio Alviso, a Mexican by birth, has solicited, for his personal benefit and that of his family, the land known by the name of Rincon de los Esteros, between the marked lines in the map, which accompanies the petition for the said tract; having previously taken the proper steps according to what is prescribed by the laws and regulations, in virtue of the power in me vested in the name of the Mexican nation, I have granted the said property to him by these presents, in conformity with the law and subject to the approval or disapproval of the Departmental Assembly and the following conditions:

1. Neither the grantee nor his heirs can divide nor alienate the premises granted to them, nor place upon said premises any mortgage or other charge, even though such mortgage or charge be for pious purposes; nor shall they convey the said premises in mortmain.

2. He may inclose the premises without prejudice to the roads and easements; he shall enjoy the premises freely and exclusively, devoting them to such cultivation and use as he may see proper.

3. When the property shall be confirmed to him, he shall ask the proper Judge that he give him juridical possession in virtue of this title, for which purpose the boundaries shall be marked, and some landmarks shall be placed about said premises.

4. The land which is embraced in this grant is only that which is named in the petition of the grantee, and which is delineated in the sketch attached hereto, and the Judge who shall give him possession thereof shall make to this government a report of the quantity of land comprised in the grant.

Wherefore, I order that these presents shall constitute his title, and shall be deemed good and sufficient, and that a memorandum of it shall be inscribed in the proper book, and that these presents be delivered to the grantee for his use.

Given in Monterey, in the Department of the Californias, on the tenth day of February, one thousand eight hundred and thirty-eight.

---

Scott v. Ward.

---

The approval of said grant by the Departmental Assembly:

"Juan B. Alvarado, Constitutional Governor of the Department of the Californias:

The most excellent Departmental Assembly, in session on the 26th day of May of the present year, approved the concession which this government made under date of 10th of February, 1838, of the land called Rincon de los Esteros, to the citizen Ygnacio Alviso, in the words following: 'Sec. 1st. The grant made by the Departmental Government, under date of February 10th, 1838, of the land called Rincon de los Esteros, to the citizen Ygnacio Alviso, is hereby approved.'

Certified for the benefit of the grantee, May 30th, 1840.

JUAN B. ALVARADO.

Manl. Jimeno, Departmental Secretary."

Alviso died in 1848. His wife, Maria Luisa Peralta, survived him, and was living on the 5th of November, 1857. There were no children by this marriage, but by a previous marriage Alviso had several children, among whom was a son named Domingo, and a daughter named Dolores. Domingo was married, and had several children in the lifetime of Alviso.

Alviso left a last will and testament, by which, after directing his executors to sell, for the payment of his debts, the portion of the rancho which lies between the Coyote and the Penitencia creeks, he undertook to devise the half of what remained, lying to the northwest, to his daughter, Dolores, and the half lying to the southeast, to the children of his son, Domingo; excepting, however, from the portion so devised, the place called Chino, which he directed "might be at the disposal of the widow of his son, José Maria"—but leaving no portion whatever of the rancho aforesaid to his widow, Maria Luisa.

Whatever title Dolores derived from the will of her father, in the portion of the rancho devised to her, is now held by the defendant. Whatever interest the widow, Maria Luisa, held in the same tract of land, by virtue of her marital rights, was conveyed by her, on the 5th of November, 1857, to William T. Wallace, and on the 22d of December of the same year was conveyed by Wallace to the plaintiff.

Scott v. Ward.

---

Upon this state of facts, the defendant claimed to own the whole tract thus devised—the plaintiff claimed to be a tenant in common with him, and to own the undivided half of the said tract; and the parties prayed the judgment of the Court whether the plaintiff was entitled to recover the undivided half claimed by him.

The Court below rendered judgment in favor of the defendant, and the plaintiff appealed.

William Mathews, for Appellant.

If, by the grant made to Alviso in 1838, the land became his separate property, the Appellant admits that the devise to the daughter, Dolores, was valid; or at least, that neither the widow of Alviso, or any person holding under her, can dispute its validity. Assuming it to be community property of the marriage, the devise had no legal effect, as to more than an undivided half of the land, as against the surviving spouse.

The community property of a marriage, in consideration of the Mexican law, was on the death of one of the spouses, at the instant of death, divided between the survivor and the children of the deceased. (Esrache Diccionario, Tit. Bienes Gananciales.) On the other hand, the will of the testator only took effect after his death. (Buchanan's Estate, 8 Cal. 519; Beard v. Knox, 5 Id. 256.)

Whether this land belonged to the community property of the marriage, or to the separate estate of Alviso, must be determined by the Mexican law as understood in California at the time of its grant—in other words, by the Mexican law and the customs of the country.

Ganancial property is thus defined by Esriche: "Whatever the husband and wife acquire during the marriage and living together, by common lucrative or onerous title; or that which the husband and wife, or either of them, during the marriage and living together, acquire by purchase or by means of their labor or industry; as also the fruits of the separate property which each brings to the marriage; and of that which either acquires for himself by any lucrative title, whilst the conjugal society subsists." (El Diccionario, Tit. Bienes Gananciales.) This definition is less felicitous than that given by Feb-

Scott v. Ward.

---

tero: "Whatever is acquired or gathered together during the marriage, by the husband and the wife, or by either of the two, is called ganancial property; as likewise the fruits of the separate property which either had brought to the marriage, or had taken for themselves, while it subsisted, by any title whatsoever." (Febrero, Tom. 1, p. 76.) This principle has been fully adopted by our statute. (Wood's Dig. 2d Ed. 487.) "The ganancial property is the common property of the husband and wife, and belongs the half to each of them; although the husband has more separate property than the wife, or the wife more than the husband; although one, after marriage, acquires more than the other; and although it may be one alone who by commerce or toil, accumulates the property; since by virtue of the marriage, there is established between the two consorts, a partnership, though legal, different from others, in that the acquisitions are the property of each, in equal proportion." (Escriche, Ubi, Supra.)

As the natural fruits of the separate property of each of the spouses are to be regarded as somewhat the result of labor, they are considered as belonging to the community. (Id.)

On the contrary, the improvements and augmentations to the property of one of the spouses, caused by nature or time alone, without labor or skill, are regarded the separate property of such spouse. (Id.)

Guided by these principles, it is submitted that the grants of land by the Mexican Government, for the purposes of colonization, are to be regarded as the community property of the marriage, and not the separate property of the spouse, in whose name the land is granted.

The object of Mexico in making her grants was to colonize the country. The empire, and afterwards the republic, possessed immense tracts of wild land, which, when inhabited at all, were inhabited by savages whose depredations desolated her frontiers. The territories of Coahuila and Texas, New Mexico, and the Californias, were eminently in this condition. The introduction and establishment of settlers in these territories was the means adopted by her to remedy this evil.

A citizen could leave the country, and might alienate his lands before his departure, but he could not abandon the country and still hold his lands. (Id. Art. 23; Holliman v. Peebles, 1 Texas, 673.) Most of the colonization grants contained the recital that the grant was made for the "personal benefit" of the applicant, and that "of his family." Such a recital is found in the grant in the record. The history of the country shows that these inducements and advantages offered to colonists were necessary. (Reading's Case, 18 How. 5.)

Scott v. Ward.

---

The method of soliciting the grants was tedious and costly. The proceedings extended not infrequently through a series of years. The proceedings in the record commenced in 1835, and ended in 1838.

Surely these grants, obtained and held with such difficulty, are not to be considered gifts from the government, but as purchases dearly paid for. They were so regarded by the Mexican law. Escriche, in enumerating the various classes of community property, places in his list "that which the husband acquires by military or governmental services, and the recompense for them, which the government gives him, provided he serves without pay, and maintains himself from the common resources of the marriage." (Tit. Bienes Gananciales; Ley 2, Tit. 4, Lib. 10, Nov. Rec.)

The colonization grants were so regarded by the Courts of California, and so treated by its population; the custom of the country in this respect had the force of law. (Arredondo's Case, 6 Pet. 715; Von Schmidt v. Huntington, 1 Cal. 56; Castro v. Castro, 6 Id. 160; Tevis v. Pitcher, 10 Id. 477; Stafford v. Lick, 10 Id. 12.)

The Supreme Court of the United States has held, in the Florida, Louisiana, and Missouri cases, that concessions and grants made on condition that the grantees should occupy, cultivate, work or graze, the lands granted, were contracts between the government and the grantees. (Seton's Case, 10 Pet. 309; Südbald's Case, Id. 313; Arredondo's Case, 6 Pet. 691; U. S. v. Heirs of Forbes, 15 Id. 173; Same v. Heirs of Buyck, Id. 215; Same v. O'Hara et als. Id. 275; Same v. Smith, 10 Id. 327; Same v. Boisdore, 11 How. 63.)

These cases differ from those based on unconditional grants, made by the government in consideration of past meritorious services. Such were the following cases: U. S. v. Fernandez et al. 10 Pet. 303; Segu's Case, Id. 306; U. S. v. Benjamin Chaires

---

Scott v. Ward.

---

et al. Id. 308; Same v. Antonio Huertas, 9 Id. 171; Same v. Clark, Id. 168.

These grants were the separate property of the husband, or the community property of the marriage, according to whether the grant was or was not made in payment for services rendered during the marriage.

In the California cases, the Court has acted upon the same views. It holds the grants to be contracts, and admits it was in the power of the Mexican Government to declare these lands forfeited upon the failure to perform the conditions annexed to them. (Fremont's Case, 17 How. 542.)

The Texas cases establish the doctrine which the Appellant contends for. The chain of authorities in that State is unbroken. (Yates v. Houston, 3 Tex. 433; see, also, Burris v. Wideman, 6 Id. 231; Edwards v. James, 7 Id. 372; Parker v. Chance, 10 Id. 513; Smith v. Strahan, 16 Id. 314.)

S. O. Houghton, for Respondent.

The grant to Ygnacio Alviso commences with the recital that "Whereas, Ygnacio Alviso, a Mexican by birth, has solicited, for his personal benefit and that of his family, the land known by the name of Rincon de los Esteros," etc. and then follows the grant by the Governor: "I have granted the said property to him by these presents, in conformity with the law," etc.

The Spanish law in force in California at the date of the grant provides that: "Everything acquired or purchased by husband and wife jointly they shall have equally by halves; and if it be a gift from the King, or from another, and it be given to both of them, the husband and wife shall have it equally, and if it be given to one of them, that one alone shall have it to whom it is given." (L. 1, Tit. 41, Lib. 10, Nov. Recop.; L. 1, Tit. 3, Lib. 3, del Fuero Real.)

Community property under the Spanish law is defined to be that which the husband and wife, during marriage and while living together, acquire by a joint lucrative title, or by onerous title, and that which the husband and wife, or either of them, during marriage and while living alone, acquire by purchase or by laborious industry. (Escriche, Bienes Gananciales.)

Property acquired by gift, devise, or descent, is held under lucrative title. (Escriche, Lucrativo.)

Scott v. Ward.

---

An onerous title is one by which we acquire anything paying its value in money, or in something else, or in services, or by means of certain charges or conditions to which we are subjected as purchase, exchange, hiring, and dower. (Escriche, Tit. Oneroso.)

The so-called conditions in this grant are not properly conditions, but restrictions. If they can be regarded as conditions, they are not onerous; they are merely nominal, and the fact that mere nominal conditions are annexed to a grant does not determine the character of the property. If the conditions are burdensome it is an onerous title, and goes to the community; otherwise it is lucrative, and is the separate property of that one of the spouses to which it is granted. (L. & F. Friques v. Hopkins, 4 Mar. N. S. 214.)

The Texas grants, which have been held by the Courts of that State to be community property were made under the colonization law of Coahuila and Texas, the 22d Section of which provides for the payment by the grantee of a certain sum of money to the State. Those grants, therefore, are essentially different from the grants made to Alviso; they were titles by purchase; this is a gift from the government. The fact of there being a money consideration determines the character of the Texas grants; it is not the amount of the consideration, but the fact of a consideration being exacted, that fixes the character of the property.

As to the custom proved, it could only relate to grants with onerous conditions, and not to grants without such conditions.

Mathews, in reply, contended that the conditions annexed to the grant were onerous, and referred to the clause subjecting the grantee to the law of 1824 and the regulations of 1828.

FIELD, J. delivered the opinion of the Court — TERRY, C. J. concurring.

The only question presented by the record for determination in the present case is, whether the land granted by the Governor of California to Alviso, was his separate property, or the property of the community existing at the time between himself and wife. Alviso intermarried with Maria Luisa Peralta in 1830; the grant was issued in 1838; Alviso died in 1848; his wife survived him, and was living in 1857. There was no issue of this marriage, but by a previous marriage Alviso had several children, among whom were a son, named Domingo, and a daughter, named Dolores. Domingo married and had children during the lifetime of Alviso. To his daughter, and the children of his son, Alviso devised the land granted to him, with the exception of certain specified portions. The defendant claims title under Dolores; and whatever interest the widow Maria Luisa possessed, by virtue of her marital rights, in the land, was conveyed by her, in 1857, to Wallace, and by him to the plaintiff.

---

Scott v. Ward.

---

The case must be determined by the Mexican law in force at the time. If by that law the land was the separate property of the husband, it passed under his will, and judgment must be rendered for the defendant; if it were the property of the community, one-half interest vested in the wife upon the death of the husband, and was not subject to his testamentary disposition. "The wife," says Escriche, "at the death of the husband, acquires full property in, and control of, one-half of the community property of the marriage, and may freely dispose of it, as well by contract inter vivos, as by will, without being compelled to preserve it for the children of the marriage, provided, in her devises, she respects the rights of forced heirs." (Diccionario, Tit. Bienes Gananciales.)

The same rule prevails as to the rights of the wife, and the power of testamentary disposition of the husband, in reference to common property, under the statute of this State, as was held in Beard v. Knox, (5 Cal. 256.) In that case the Court said:

"The husband and wife, during coverture, are jointly seized of the property, with a half interest remaining over to the wife, subject only to the husband's disposal during their joint lives. This is a present definite and certain interest, which becomes absolute at his death, so that a disposition by devise, which can only attach after the death of the testator, cannot affect it, for such a conveyance can only operate after death, upon the very happening of which the law of this State determines the estate, and the widow becomes seized of one-half of the property."

The rule of the Mexican law as we have stated it, was recognised by this Court in the matter of the estate of Buchanan, decided at the October Term of 1858, (8 Cal. 507.) Buchanan died in June, 1855, leaving property, real and personal; some of the real estate having been acquired previous to the passage of the Act concerning the rights of husband and wife — April 17, 1850 — and a portion afterwards; and this Court held that the property — that acquired previously, as well as that acquired subsequently — belonged to the community, (excepting only a portion set apart as a homestead,) and that the same did not pass under the will of the deceased. "The law of Mexico," said the Court, "in force here until our statute took effect, was the same, so far as relates to the merits of this question. The property belonged to the community, and upon the death of the husband the widow took one-half. The husband had the power of disposition while living, but not by will, which could only take effect after his death. (Schmidt's Civil Law of Spain and Mexico, 12, 14, Arts. 43, 44, 51, 52; 1 Cal. 513; 5 Id. 111, 257.)"

It may be observed, that the property in relation to which the decision in the matter of the estate of Buchanan was made, was acquired by purchase, although the fact is not stated in the report of the case. It was not essential to the decision that it should have been stated, for the presumption attendant upon the possession of property during the marriage, under the Mexican law, was that it belonged to the community, and exceptions to the rule were required to be proved. (See Meyer v. Kinzer, 12 Cal. 248, and Smith v. Smith, Id. 217.)

It is proper to observe, also, that the decision in the Buchanan matter, which we affirm in the present case, does not conflict with the views expressed by Mr. Justice Bennett, in Panaud v. Jones, (1 Cal. 512,) as to the control of the husband over the common property after the death of the wife, and his power of testamentary disposition of the same. Indeed, in that case, the Court cite the authority of Febrero, to the effect that, upon the death of the husband, the wife becomes the absolute owner of the one-half of the common property; and then proceeds to show, that, upon the death of the wife, the husband still retained the control and right of disposition of the entire common property; that no estate in such property vested in the children on the decease of the mother; that they had only a contingent and defeasible interest in it, which never became perfect until the death of the father, and then only after the payment of his debts. There is no conflict in the two decisions.

The question then recurs, whether the land granted to Alviso in 1838 was his separate property, or the property of the community. Under the Spanish and Mexican law, property acquired by the husband and wife during the marriage, and whilst living together, whether by onerous or lucrative title, and that acquired by either of them by onerous title, belonged to the community; whilst property acquired by either of them, by lucrative title solely, constituted the separate property of the party making the acquisition. The fruits, and profits, and increase, of the separate property, also, belonged to the community. By onerous title was meant that which was created by a valuable consideration, as the payment of money, the rendition of services, and the like, or by the performance of conditions, or payment of charges to which the property was subject. (Escriche, Tit. Oneroso.) Lucrative title was created by donation, devise, or descent. (Escriche, Tit. Lucrativo.) The Mexican law as to what constituted common property was very similar to the law of this State. Our statute does not seem to provide for property acquired by gift to the husband and wife jointly, but, with that exception, there is no substantial difference, unless, perhaps, the meaning of the term donation, under the Spanish and Mexican law, was more comprehensive than the term in our jurisprudence. The inquiry, then, is whether the property conveyed by the grant was held by Alviso under a lucrative or onerous title; in other words, whether it was a donation or a purchase. The grant purports to convey the land, subject to the approval of the Departmental Assembly, and contains various clauses which are designated in the instrument as conditions. The conditions, as they are termed, are not in fact such, but simple restrictions upon alienation, reservations of easements, and provisions for judicial possession, and the marking of boundaries of the specific tract granted. The first condition provides that neither the grantee or his heirs shall divide or alienate the premises, or subject them to any mortgage or other charge, even for pious purposes, or convey them in mortmain. The second condition provides that the grantee may inclose the premises, without prejudice to the roads and easements, and enjoy their free and exclusive possession, subjecting them to such cultivation and use as he may think proper. The third condition provides that, upon the confirmation of the property, the grantee shall request the proper Judge to give him judicial possession, in virtue of his title, and, for that purpose, the boundaries shall be designated, and landmarks placed around the premises. The fourth condition limits the land included in the grant to that designated in the petition of the grantee, and delineated in the sketch annexed, and provides that the Judge giving possession shall report to the government the quantity embraced in the grant. It is evident, from this statement, that the clauses of the instrument which are termed conditions, are not properly such. The first is a restriction; the second is the expression of the power of the grantee with a reservation of easements; the third is a provision for giving bounds and precision to the grant; and the fourth is a specification of the land intended to be conveyed, with a requisition upon the judicial officer to report to the government. There is nothing in any of these provisions which is onerous or burdensome to the grantee, or which can be regarded as a valuable consideration, moving the government to make the grant. Donations may be absolute, or accompanied with conditions, the performance of which may be essential to the enjoyment of the property donated. Thus, a gift of fruits would not lose its character as a gift because accompanied with the condition that the donee should gather them, nor would a gift of land be less a donation because the beneficiary was required to measure off the specific quantity given and designate it by metes and bounds. And it would seem that under the Spanish and Mexican law, a more comprehensive meaning was attached to the term donation than that usually given to it in our jurisprudence. Conditions are sometimes attached to donations which would be regarded as common law as changing the character of the transaction from one of gift to one of purchase. "Donations inter vivos and testaments may be made on conditions, and subject to restrictions imposed either on the person or the thing, and they may contain clauses of substitution and restitution." (Schmidt's Civil Law of Spain and Mexico, Art. 966.) "A donation may be made simply and without any condition or incumbrance; or it may be made for a certain time and as remunera-

Scott v. Ward.

---

---

Scott v. Ward.

---

tion for benefits received." (Id. Art. 988.) "That which is made conditionally remains effective until the condition happen." (Id. Art. 989.) "A donation made on condition that the donee shall do something is revocable, if the donee fail to fulfill the condition." (Art. 990.)

"Men are sometimes induced to make donations from certain causes or particular reasons, without which they would not have made them; as where one man gives another a sum of money, or an estate, expressly declaring at the time he make the donation that he gives it in order that the donee may, by that means, be always provided with a horse and arms for his service; or where he makes the donation to any artificer, and declares openly that he makes it for certain work or service which the donee was to render him. Wherefore, we say, that if the person who receives a donation in the manner above mentioned, complies with the agreement or condition, or does that for which it was given, the donation will be valid in every respect; but if he should not comply therewith or faithfully execute that for which it was given, he may be compelled to comply with what he had promised, or to abandon the donation which had been made to him. We likewise say, that if one man give another a vineyard, or garden, or an estate, or any other thing whatever, declaring expressly at the time he made the donation, that he gave the thing with the intention that a certain portion of the fruits arising from it should be given to another person for his maintenance, or to redeem him from captivity, or for any other like purpose, if the donee comply with the object for which it was given, the donation will be valid; and if he should not, the donor may revoke it. And donations of the kind mentioned in this law are called, in Latin, sub modo; which means, in common speech, a donation made for a certain purpose—so otra manera." (2 Moreau & Car. Partidas, 647, 648.)

In Gayoso de Lemos v. Garcia, (1 Mar. N. S. 333,) the Supreme Court of Louisiana, in speaking of a claim, asserted by the plaintiffs in that case, that the land granted to their father by the King of Spain belonged to the community, said: "The title of the plaintiffs is founded on a grant made to their father during marriage, and it has been urged that the land thus acquired, entered into and made a part of the community subsisting between husband and wife. Whatever support this argument may derive from the practice which, we believe, has prevailed in some parts of the State, to regard lands granted by the sovereign as property common to both spouses, it is certain that it is not only unsupported by authority, but that the law most positively says it shall not be common to both, but that it shall belong exclusively to the individual to whom the King grants it. (Novissima Recop. Liv. 10, Tit. 4, Leyes 1, 4, y. 5, Febr. p. 1.)”

In Frique v. Hopkins et al. (4 Martin's Rep. N. S. 214,) it was also claimed that land granted to the ancestor of the plaintiffs, by the King of Spain, was common property, and the ruling in Gayoso de Lemos v. Garcia, was referred to and expressly affirmed. The consideration, or moving cause of the grant, was stated in the instrument to be the public good, and in order to increase the population of the city. After citing the Spanish law, by which it was declared that whatever might be given by the King, or another, to both husband and wife, should belong to them jointly; but that if given to any one of them, it should be considered as belonging to the individual to whom it was given, and mentioning that the commentators understood the law to apply to all cases coming within its letter, except those where the King gave in remuneration of services rendered by the husband, when he served without pay, and was maintained at the expense of the community, and referring, in support of that view, to a law of the Fuero Real, the Court said: “The correctness of the application of these laws to a grant of lands by the former sovereign of Louisiana, has been contested on two grounds:

1st. That there is a material difference between a donation and a concession.

2d. That as it appears by all regulations made here by the Spanish Government, in relation to concessions for lands, that the quantity conceded was greater or less, according to the circumstance of the grantee being married and having children, or being single; grants made to a man who was married, must be the common property of both husband and wife.

As to the first of these grounds, we apprehend there is nothing in it which requires our particular consideration. We are unable to perceive any material difference between a donation and a concession of lands, such as the former government of Louisiana was in the habit of granting. It is true, concessions may be made, on consideration moving from the donee, which would take from them the character of a donation. But lands given by the King, without price paid for them, and not in remuneration of any services rendered, certainly are donations. If they be not, we are ignorant under what denomination they should be classed.

---

Scott v. Ward.

---

The second ground was most relied on in argument. It did not escape our attention in the case already alluded to, though no notice is taken of it in the opinion delivered. But we were unable then, as we are now, to discover in it a sufficient reason for taking the case out of the plain and positive provisions of the statute. The consideration which induced the grant or donation, cannot change its character, unless there is a positive provision of law which makes the exception; as in that given from the fuero real, where the thing granted is in remuneration of services rendered at the expense of the community. Were we to take this as valid ground for evading the positive enactment of the Legislature, it would lead us, we apprehend, much further than is contemplated by those who press it on our adoption. By the regulations of the Spanish Government, if the individual who applied for land was unmarried, a certain quantity of land was given to him; if he had a wife, this quantity was increased; and if he had children, an additional number of acres were conceded. Now if the circumstance of his being married made the thing given become the property of both husband and wife, we must, on the same principle, hold, that where children were the moving cause, they, too, should be considered as owners in common of the land conceded. But that such was the effect of the donee having a family, we believe was never even suspected—it certainly is unsupported by law. Many donations are made, in which the donee's having a wife, and being burdened with a large family, is a great consideration for the beneficence of the donor; but this motive in him does not prevent the person to whom the gift is made, from being considered its owner, nor prevent the thing given from descending to his heirs.

It was, however, said that the object in making these grants was to encourage the settlement of the country; and that to carry that object into effect, it was necessary that the lands should be considered as given to both husband and wife. To this it might be answered, and with great force, that if the government were of that opinion, it is strange they did not at once say so, and by making the concession in the name of both, place the matter beyond doubt; and not, by granting it to one of the spouses, leave it to the operation of a positive law which repelled the idea. But if we could enter into political considerations, in order to ascertain whether they could repeal statutes, we would, in this case, be led to the examination of a nice and refined question of policy in relation to the effect on national prosperity, of giving to the wife a distinct interest in the property acquired during marriage, one on which men would be found to differ according to their education and particular modes of thinking."

---

Scott v. Ward.

---

To these Louisiana cases, and the absence of express onerous conditions in the grant, the plaintiff only answers that the grant in question was issued under the colonization laws of Mexico, and that, by force of them, onerous conditions were necessarily implied. We do not understand that such conditions were necessarily attached to colonization grants. There may be a marked difference between the concessions in the Louisiana cases and the grants made under the decree of 1824, and the regulations of 1828. The object of the decree and those regulations was the settlement of the vacant lands of the republic, and for that purpose grants were generally made subject to the conditions of cultivation or occupancy. But where, as in the present case, such occupancy already existed, accompanied with the construction of a house, and its habitation, it would have been to no purpose to have inserted the conditions. The fact of occupancy may have been, and probably was, the reason both for the issuance of the grant, and the omission of the usual condition. But the reason moving the government constituted no consideration changing the character of the grant from a donation to a purchase. It created no obligation, and conferred no rights.

We are of opinion that the grant in question was a simple donation, and that the land it contained constituted the separate property of Alviso, and passed under his last will and testament; and as a conclusion therefrom that the judgment must be affirmed. Ordered accordingly.

Scott v. Ward.

---

On rehearing, at a subsequent term, the following opinion was delivered by FIELD, C. J. — BALDWIN, J. and COPE, J. concurring.

Since the rehearing ordered in this case was had, we have carefully reviewed the opinion delivered at the April Term, and are satisfied that its conclusion as to the character of the grant in question is correct. If it be admitted, as contended by the counsel of the plaintiff, that the usual conditions of cultivation and occupancy were annexed to the grant by force of the decree of 1824, and the regulations of 1828, the result would be the same. These conditions would not change the transaction from that of donation into one of contract or purchase. Their performance constituted no consideration to the government in the nature of a price for the land. They were annexed to colonization grants, in furtherance of the general policy of the republic in the settlement of the country, and their performance was exacted to prevent that policy from being defeated. They only operated as a requirement that the lands should be appropriated to the purposes for which they were granted.

The recital in the grant that the grantees solicited the land "for his personal benefit and that of his family," cannot control the operative words of the grant. In point of fact the recital is untrue. The petition is set forth in the record, and contains no mention of the petitioner's having any family. In it the petitioner solicits the land "to secure the cattle and horses which he has" — and states no other object for which the land was desired. The recital was probably taken from the usual forms in which grants were written; it certainly was not inserted or intended to have any influence upon the direction of the title. The grant is made to Alviso individually, and its terms determine the person in whom the property vested.

The term "family" is not limited to the husband and wife. Alviso had at the time several children by a previous marriage, and if the use of the term in the recital can have any effect upon the direction of the title, it is difficult to see why those children might not claim to have received an interest in the property equally with the wife, or the community existing between the husband and wife. Such an effect was never supposed to exist, it is believed, by any one. Judgment affirmed.

See Noe v. Cord, decided at the January Term, 1859.

Moore v. Wilkinson.

MOORE et al. v. WILKINSON et al.

WHERE a grant is for four leagues of land, within a larger tract, the right to measure off the specific quantity granted rested with the former government, and upon the cession, passed with other public rights to the United States. That right is political, and cannot be exercised by the judicial department. Courts may ascertain and fix the position of boundaries which are designated, but cannot give boundaries to a specific quantity which has none, and lies in a larger tract.

The judiciary must determine whether the prior rights of third persons have been interfered with by the survey and patent, but it cannot correct the one nor the other. The survey and patent are conclusive in actions of ejectment.

Even though the title of a grantee, in a particular case, to a specifically described or designated tract be perfect, without further action by our government, yet if such action be had, and the grantee accepts the land described in his patent as satisfying his claim, no other persons can object that a portion of the land thus taken is without the boundaries of the grant, unless their prior rights are interfered with. This is a matter between the government and the grantee, with which strangers have no concern.

The survey and location are to follow the decree of confirmation. The approval of the survey by the proper officers is the determination — the judgment of the appropriate department of government that the survey does conform to such decree. That determination or judgment is not the subject of review by the judiciary. It is conclusive upon the Courts in actions of ejectment as the adjudication of a competent tribunal, upon a subject within its exclusive jurisdiction.

A patent cannot be attacked collaterally, even for fraud, whether charged to have existed in the procurement of the original grant, or in the proof of its execution, or in the making of the survey. For these matters the right of interference rests only with the government. Individuals can resist the conclusiveness of the patent only by showing that it conflicts with prior rights vested in them.

The 15th Section of the Act of Congress of 1851, provides that the final decree of confirmation and patent shall be conclusive between the United States and the claimants only, and shall not affect the interest of third persons. If conclusive between the United States and the claimants, it must be equally so between persons holding under either of those parties.

A patent takes effect, by relation, at the date of the presentation of the petition of the patentee to the Board of Land Commissioners. And where such petition was presented in March, 1852, at which time the pre-emption laws of the United States were not extended to California; the rights, if any, of parties, claiming under those laws, are subordinate to the result of the proceedings then pending by the grantee before the tribunal and officers of the United States.

Where claimants had, prior to the issuance of a patent, published a notice that they had become the owners of the grant, specifying its boundaries, and warning off trespassers; Held, that they were not estopped from claiming, under their patent, land outside of those boundaries.

Query: Whether such notice would protect third persons against any demand for damages until the approved survey?

APPEAL from the Ninth District.

Ejectment to recover land situated in Butte County. The plaintiffs claim title under a Mexican grant, and a patent of the United States, issued upon its confirmation. The following is a copy of the grant:

tract of vacant land in the immediate vicinity of the river Sacramento, bounding on the north with the base of the Snowy Mountains, on the south with the land of Don Juan A. Sutter, and on the east with Feather River, having previously made the corresponding inquiries and investigations as are provided in conformity with law of 12th August, 1824, and regulations of 21st November, 1828, I have assented by decree of this date, in the exercise of the powers conferred upon me, in the name of the Mexican Nation, to grant to them the tract aforesaid, declaring to them the fee of the same by these presents with reservation of the approval of the most excellent Departmental Assembly, and under the following conditions:

1st. They may fence in the same without prejudice to the cross-roads and servitudes. They shall enjoy it freely and exclusively, dedicating it to the uses or cultivation which may suit them.

2d. They shall solicit from the respective Judge that he give them judicial possession in virtue of this patent, by whom shall be marked out the boundaries by the necessary monuments.

3d. The land of which donation is made merely four square leagues, (or four ranges of neat cattle,) in conformity with the map annexed to the proceedings, (expediente.) The Judge who may give them possession will cause the same to be measured according to the ordinance, leaving the remainder which may result in the nation for its proper uses.

I therefore ordain that, holding the present document of title as firm and valid, note be taken of it in the respective book, and it be delivered to those concerned for their protection and other purposes.

Given in the city of Los Angeles on this common paper, for the absolute want of stamped, the twelfth day of June, one thousand eight hundred and forty-six.

prove that two of the plaintiffs, and the grantor of the other plaintiff, on the 4th of March, 1856, published in the Butte Record, a paper of general circulation in the neighborhood where the premises are situated, a notice stating that they had become the owners of the tract of land known as the Fernandez grant, and setting forth its boundaries, and notifying persons not to trespass upon the tract. The notice was at the same time produced in connection with the offer of the defendants. The object of introducing it was to show that the plaintiffs did not claim, by the boundaries designated in the notice, the premises in controversy. The Court excluded the notice, and the defendants excepted.

All other material facts of the case are stated in the opinion of the Court. The plaintiffs recovered judgment, and the defendants appealed.

Robinson & Beatty, for Appellants.

I. If the grant was for a certain specific tract of land, defined by metes and bounds which were capable of being ascertained and accurately defined by the ordinary modes of judicial investigation, and the said boundaries contained four leagues and no more, then the grant of the Mexican Government conferred on the grantees a perfect title. As a corollary to this proposition, the plaintiffs, having derived a perfect title from the Mexican Government, need not have presented their claim to the Board of Land Commissioners. It is true, that the Act of Congress requires all claims to be presented, and says that all lands not confirmed shall be "deemed held and considered" public domain. But this is a mere brutum fulmen. Congress could not pass a law forfeiting the property of a citizen without compensation, and for no crime but failing to do an act which should perfect a title which was already perfect. (Lytle et al. v. State of Arkansas, 9 How. 314.) If, however, the grantees had a grant for four leagues of land not defined by any specific boundaries, but contained within more extended boundaries—say within thirty leagues—then the question arises, who would have the right to segregate and select the four leagues out of the thirty, the grantees or the government? If the government has the right to elect, it has no right to go outside of the thirty leagues.

---

Moore v. Wilkinson.

---

It was suggested by the Court that this land, having been patented by the United States, the government would never advertise it for sale, consequently defendants could never get a title. This we think an imaginary difficulty. The land has been conveyed by the government to the plaintiffs by a sort of quit-claim, reserving the rights of third parties. The Appellants are third parties holding an equity against the government. The government patent passes the land subject to that equity. Appellants can tender the one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre, and file their bill to compel Respondents to deed the land. Or Respondents can file their bill to compel Appellants to pay the money or surrender their equity. We admit that, if this grant did cover an extent of thirty leagues, no pre-emption right could attach within that thirty leagues. But we offered proof to show that the land in controversy was outside of the utmost limits of the grant.

II. A pre-emptor who settles on public land under and by virtue of the United States laws, is, from the time of his settlement, a purchaser in good faith. He has a vested right, of which the government cannot deprive him by Act of Congress. His settlement and his improvement of the land are the consideration that he pays the government. (Lytle v. State of Arkansas, above cited.)

III. The notice published by two of the plaintiffs and the vendor of the third, as to the boundaries of their grant, was competent evidence, and should have been received. It was one link in the evidence to establish the allegation in the answer of the defendants, that they had made their improvements, "encouraged by the representations of the plaintiffs," that the premises "were public lands, and not included in any Mexican grant." If the plaintiffs did make such representations, they are estopped from claiming any back rents, and may be compelled to pay for improvements made by defendants, if indeed they are not estopped to sue for the land.

IV. The Appellants are the "third persons" mentioned in the 15th Section of the Act of March 3d, 1851, whose interests the decree of confirmation and the patent do not affect. If the Appellants held under the United States by right acquired per- dente lite, they would be privies. It can only be supposed that they acquired their rights pendente lite by confounding the acts of the Courts with those of the Surveyor-General. If, while the claim of the Respondents was pending before the Board of Commissioners, or the United States District Court on appeal, they acquired any right from the United States adverse to the claim they presented, they acquired it pendente lite, and the same would be barred by the decree against the United States. But they admit the validity of Respondents' claim, and the correctness of the decree in their favor. They abide in everything the Court and Commissioners did. The decree was a legal adjudication that the title was and had been a good one. After that adjudication, the political department of the government commenced to act, and they say, surveyed land not decreed to belong to Respondents.

Moore v. Wilkinson.

---

If Respondents asked for one piece of land, and the Appellants finding litigation about that, bought another and different piece, this was not buying pendente lite, because there was no suit about the piece they bought. It was a suit between the same parties, but not about the same property. The Surveyor is in no way connected with the Courts or Board of Commissioners.

The first proceeding terminated with the final decree. If that decree was for this land, the Appellants cannot hold it, as they are purchasers pendente lite. But if the decree does not include it, then they are not precluded from setting up rights acquired before the survey was made. That was the first indication of a claim to this land. It is that survey they wish to contest, not the decree. They did not purchase pending the survey.

Wm. H. Rhodes, for Respondents.

I. By the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, the United States reserved and incurred the duty of surveying and segregating the domain previously granted by the government of Mexico. (West v. Cochran, 17 How. 403; Stanford v. Taylor, 18 Id. 412; Stoddard v. Chambers, 2 Id. 316; U. S. v. Sutherland, 19 Id. 364; Willot v. Sanford, 19 Id. 80; Menard's Heirs v. Massey, 8 Id. 294; Guitard et al. v. Stoddard, 16 Id. 512.)

II. The grant having been confirmed, surveyed, and patented, the defendants cannot question the proceedings on the ground of having, as third persons, rights to the land in controversy; the survey and patent are conclusive. (West v. Cochran, 17 How. 402; Stanford v. Taylor, 18 Id. 412; Bryan et als. v. Forsyth, 19 Id. 334; Stephenson v. Smith, 7 Missouri, 610.)

---

Moore v. Wilkinson.

---

The terms "third persons," in the Act of Congress of 1851, do not apply either to the U. S. Government or to the claimants, for they are the immediate parties to the proceedings. They have reference solely to the claimants of conflicting grants.

In what sense can a settler be deemed a third person? He must be so by virtue of some interest in the premises derived from an independent source. His interest derived from the parties litigant is, by a general rule of law, merged in that of the parties through whom he claims. All actions at law and in equity bind parties thereto. But the term "parties" signifies: 1st. The persons immediately before the Court. 2d. Privies in estate. 3d. Privies in blood. 4th. Privies in law. (1 Green. Ev. Secs. 523, 536.)

The true position of affairs is this: 1. The United States purchased certain vacant land from Mexico. 2. The United States, as a matter of bounty, agreed to sell that land to actual settlers. 3. The land in controversy is admitted by the United States to belong to the Respondents, and that they never owned a foot of it; and third persons are bound by this admission. (Stringer et al. v. Young, 3 Pet. 341; Galt et al. v. Galloway, 4 Id. 342, cited with approval in Bagnell v. Broderick, 13 Id. 446; West v. Cochran, 17 How. 403; Stanford v. Taylor, 18 Id. 412; Willot et al. v. Sanford, 19 Id. 80; Id. 209.)

Again, the defendants cannot claim as pre-emptors, because the land is exempted from the operation of the pre-emption laws. Nor can they claim to be settlers in good faith without notice. 9 U. S. Statutes at Large, 632, Sec. 13; 10 Id. 246, Secs. 6, 3; Act of 1851 relative to settling land claims.)

III. There is no error in the location of the grant. The grant commences its boundary with the north line, not the south. It fixes the faldas of the Sierra Nevada range as its starting point. According to the Spanish dictionary, the word means, primarily, radix montis. It is sometimes translated base of a mountain, sometimes skirts of a mountain, and sometimes trail of a dress. But it has nowhere an independent existence.

---

Moore v. Wilkinson.

---

It necessarily adheres to something greater — is a component part of a larger thing. In this case it is attached to the terms Sierra Nevada range of mountains. It cannot, therefore, mean the foot-hills of that range. It must mean the radix of the range itself.

FIELD, J. delivered the opinion of the Court — TERRY, C. J. and BALDWIN, J. concurring.

This is an action of ejectment, to recover the possession of a tract of land situated in Butte County. The plaintiffs deraign their title to the premises from a grant issued to Maximo and Dionisio Fernandez, by Pio Pico, formerly Mexican Governor of California, and a patent issued, upon its confirmation, on behalf of the United States. The grant bears date on the twelfth of June, 1846; the claim under it was presented for confirmation to the Board of United States Land Commissioners in March, 1852, and was confirmed by that Board to the claimants in July, 1855, and subsequently by the United States District Court in March, 1857. The Attorney-General of the United States soon afterward gave notice that no further appeal would be prosecuted on the part of the United States, and by an order of the District Court, the claimants had leave to proceed as upon a final decree. The grant describes the land as lying in the immediate vicinity of the river Sacramento, and as bounded on the north by the base of the Snowy Mountains; on the south by the lands of John A. Sutter, and on the east by Feather River. No boundary on the west is specified, but to the espediente a map of the tract was annexed, and to this map reference is made in the grant, the third condition of which is in the following language: "The land of which donation is made is merely four square leagues (or four ranges of neat cattle), in conformity with the map annexed to the proceedings (espediente). The Judge who may give possession will cause the same to be measured according to the Ordinance, leaving the remainder which may result to the nation for its proper uses." In April, 1857, four leagues — the specific quantity granted — were laid off and surveyed under the directions of the Surveyor-General of the United States for California, and the survey was, in May following, approved by that officer. Upon this survey, and in pursuance of the confirmation, a patent on behalf of the United States was issued to the claimants, bearing date on the 14th of October, 1857, for four leagues of land with the specific description of the official survey. This patent includes the premises in controversy, and the defendants were in their occupation at the commencement of the action.

To resist a recovery, the defendants offered parol evidence, to show that the four leagues, as surveyed and patented, were different from the tract designated in the grant, and the map to which the grant makes reference; that a correct location of the tract, as granted, would not include the premises in suit; that the defendants are citizens of the United States, and had each entered upon a separate quarter section of the premises, claiming the privileges of pre-emptioners under the laws of the United States, and made the improvements required in such cases, and had, in May, 1856, filed their separate declaratory statements in the office of the United States Register, at Marysville, insisting that as such pre-emption claimants, they had acquired vested rights, and that the confirmation of the grant, and the patent issued thereunder, were not conclusive against them under the provisions of the 15th Section of the Act of Congress of March 3d, 1851. The Court below excluded the evidence offered, and its ruling in this respect constitutes the principal error assigned for a reversal of the judgment.

This ruling of the Court, we think clearly correct, and the position of the defendants untenable. It will be seen from the grant that there were no certainty and precision in the boundaries. No official survey of the northern line of the lands of Sutter was ever made under the former government, and none has as yet been made under the government of the United States. The position of that line was a matter still to be determined when the grant to Fernandez was issued. The point where the Sierra Nevada may properly be said to commence, was at the time, and is to this day, a matter of uncertainty. The term faldas is used in the original grant, and is sometimes translated "slope of the mountains," and sometimes "base" of them. It represents no independent existence, but only something pertaining to that which is greater. As applied to the Sierra Nevada, it must mean either their "base" or "slope," and not those elevations which precede the general rise of the mountains, and are termed "foot hills." The commencement of such base or slope is not fixed by any marks which give to it precision and certainty. The western boundary is not given at all. It is very evident that the Governor only intended to indicate by the boundaries designated the general outlines of the tract within which the four leagues were to be taken. Between the faldas of the Sierra Nevada — not meaning thereby the foot hills, but the base or slope of the mountain — and the line of Sutter, as given by the witness, Bidwell, who made the map referred to in the grant to Fernandez, there is an extent greatly exceeding four leagues. The western boundary is not, as we have stated, given, and between Feather River on the east, and the Sacramento River, in the vicinity of which the land is stated in the grant to lie, there is a much greater width than one league.

Moore v. Wilkinson.

---

If, then, the grant in question is to be regarded as conveying an interest to four leagues lying within a larger tract, the right to measure off and give precision to the specific quantity granted, remained with the former government, and passed with all other public rights to the government of the United States, upon the cession of the country. That right belongs to the political department of the government, and cannot be exercised by Courts of Justice. The Courts can ascertain and fix the position of boundaries which are designated, but cannot give boundaries to a specific quantity which has none, and lies in a larger tract. To give precision and location to such specific quantity a survey must be made by the proper department of government, in which the subject is vested by the legislation of Congress. (See Waterman v. Smith, 13 Cal. 373.) With the action of that department, the judiciary cannot interfere. The judiciary must determine, it is true, whether prior rights of third parties have been interfered with by the survey and patent issued thereon, but it cannot correct the one nor the other, and locate the land, where, in its judgment, the location ought originally to have been made. The survey and patent are conclusive upon it in actions of ejectment, except when in conflict with the prior rights of third persons, and then their inconclusiveness can be asserted only to the extent essential for the protection of such prior rights.

We do not understand the counsel of the defendants as questioning the correctness of these views, but as insisting that the map annexed to the grant embraced the precise quantity of four leagues granted, and as that quantity was to be taken in conformity with such map, the title of the grantees was perfect, requiring no further action of the government, and must be restricted to the land contained in the map; that the subsequent confirmation, survey, and patent, of the United States did not add to the grantees' title, nor could they, without the grantees' assent, in any way have impaired it.

Moore v. Wilkinson.

---

The title of the grantees to the land contained within the map may be admitted to have been perfect, and yet no conclusion follows against the claim of the plaintiffs. If they have accepted the land described in their patent as satisfying their claim, no other persons can object that a portion of the land thus taken is without the boundaries of the grant, unless their prior rights are interfered with. This is a matter between the government and the grantees, with which strangers have no concern. The answer, however, to the position of counsel is this: The government has provided a Board for the determination of the validity of claims to lands held under Mexican grants, and a system for the survey and location of the lands upon the recognition and confirmation of such claims. The survey and location are to follow the decree of confirmation. The approval of the survey by the proper officers is the determination — the judgment of the appropriate department of government, that the survey does conform to such decree. That determination or judgment is not the subject of review by the judiciary. It is conclusive upon the Courts in actions of ejectment, as the adjudication of a competent tribunal, upon a subject within its exclusive jurisdiction. The patent, which is the final document issued by the government, is conclusive evidence of the validity of the original grant, and of its recognition and confirmation, and of the survey, and its conformity with the conformation, and of the relinquishment to the patentee of all the interest of the United States in the land. It cannot be attacked collaterally, even for fraud, whether charged to have existed in the procurement of the original grant, or in the proof of its execution, or in the making of the survey. For these matters the right of interference rests only with the government. Individuals can resist the conclusiveness of the patent only by showing that it conflicts with prior rights vested in them. And this brings us to the inquiry whether the defendants possess any such prior rights. The 15th Section of the Act of Congress of 1851, provides that the final decree of confirmation and patent, shall be conclusive between the United States and the claimants only, and shall not affect the interests of third persons. If conclusive between the United States and the claimants, it must be equally so between persons holding under either of those parties; and in Waterman v. Smith, ante, 373, we held that the third persons mentioned in the Act were those whose title was at the time such as to enable them to resist successfully any action of the government respecting it. The patent took effect by relation, at the date of the presentation of the petition of the patentees to the Board of Land Commissioners, in March, 1852. At that time the pre-emption laws of the United States, under which the defendants assert their acquisition of rights, were not extended to California. Any rights which they possess were subsequently acquired, and must be subordinate to the result of the proceedings then pending by the grantees before the tribunals and officers of the United States. These proceedings had for their object the recognition of the grantees' claim, and the determination of its location with such precision as to leave no room for subsequent dispute and litigation. If settlers, after steps taken for confirmation, could by location acquire such rights to the premises as to authorize them to compel a patentee, in every suit for the recovery of his land, to establish the correctness of the action of the officers of government in their survey and location, the patent, instead of being an instrument of quiet and security to the possessor, would become a source of perpetual and ruinous litigation, and the settlement of land titles in the country be delayed a quarter of a century. The patentee would find it established in different suits, to the utter destruction of his rights, that his land should have been located in as many different places within the exterior boundaries of the general tract, designated in his grant, as the varying prejudices, interests, or notions of justice, of witnesses and jurymen might suggest.

Moore v. Wilkinson.

---

The notice published by two of the plaintiffs and the vendor of the third, in 1856, stating that they had become the owners of the grant, and specifying its boundaries, and warning trespassers not to come upon the land with such boundaries, was properly excluded. Such notice could not operate as an estoppel upon the plaintiffs, for two reasons. First, it was only evidence of the opinion the parties entertained of the boundaries of their claim; that opinion could not control the action of the officers of government, or affect the validity and effect of the patent. The pre-emptioners are presumed to have known, as such was the law, that the right of survey and location rested exclusively with the government, and was not subject to any direction of the grantees. Nor is it reasonable to hold that the plaintiffs intended to abandon all rights to any other land, provided the official survey did not conform to the boundaries they indicated. The most that can be asserted from the notice is, that until the location of their tract, the parties limited their claim to the land within certain boundaries. It may be possible that such notice would operate as a protection against any demand for damages until the approved survey was made. We do not affirm even this, but certainly it can have no greater effect. In the second place, the settlement was made by the defendants in 1853, and could have not been induced, of course, by the notice published in 1856.

Moore v. Roff.

---

Judgment affirmed.

MOORE et al. v. ROFF et al.

Moore v. Wilkinson, (supra.) affirmed.

The facts of this case are similar to the facts in Moore et al. v. Wilkinson et al. with the exception that the defendants have never filed any declaratory statement of their intention to pre-empt the quarter sections which they occupy. The case, if possible, is more barren of merit than the one cited, and on that authority the judgment is affirmed.

ANNA TRYON v. SUTTON et al.

If no motion be made in the Court below to correct a clerical error disclosed by the pleadings, the error will be corrected in the Supreme Court at Appellant's cost.

Mere indefiniteness of description in a mortgage is no objection to its enforcement as it is written, whatever the effect of the sale under such a description. The mortgagor cannot complain.

There is little, if any, practical difference between the Court ruling out testimony upon the strength of a fact proven to the Court, and permitting the case to go to the jury, and then denying effect to such testimony, upon proof of the same fact.

A married woman cannot make an assignment of a mortgage without the concurrence of the husband. [The property was common.—REV.]

By the common law, a note payable to the wife is prima facie the property of the husband, and can be indorsed by him, but not by her alone.

A party dealing with a feme is bound to inquire into her rights and powers. The fact that papers are drawn directly to the wife does not estop either husband or wife from refusing effect to her sole act.

The case might be different if the husband represented the wife to be a feme sole, and with authority to deal as such with the common property, or assented to a transfer by her; but the fact that a note or mortgage is executed to her is not conclusive proof of any such representation.

Where the complaint avers that the note and mortgage sued on were made to "E." a married woman, and by her assigned to plaintiff, he cannot recover, because the right to assign was in the husband; and this, too, where the proof was that both husband and wife assigned the note and mortgage. In chancery cases the party must recover according to the pleadings, and not the proof, where there is a variance.

APPEAL from the Sixth District.

The case is sufficiently stated in the opinion.

J. H. Ralston, for Appellant. The Court below erred in excluding the assignment by E. Schroeder of the two thousand dollar note and mortgage to Bertha. McKay. The complaint counted on the note as payable to Mrs. E. Schroeder, and by her alone assigned to plaintiff. The fact that she had a husband is nowhere averred. Defendant admits the execution of the note to her, and sets up payment to her assignee. Under this state of pleading the defendant had a right to go to the jury upon the question whether E. Schroeder was married in fact, or whether she was a sole trader, and hence competent to assign. Defendant had a right to try his case according to the issues framed.

Wm. S. Long, for Respondent. 1. Error in the decree as to description of the property, cannot be taken advantage of in the Appellate Court for the first time. 2. E. Schroeder, being a feme covert, could not assign the mortgage. Besides, there is no proof that the note was assigned, and this could be bought by plaintiff even if the mortgage had passed to McKay.

Tryon v. Sutton.

---

BALDWIN, J. delivered the opinion of the Court — TERRY, C. J. concurring.

1. It is conceded by the counsel for the Respondent that there is an error in the decree in this case by an omission to give credit for one thousand dollars entered on the note. This seems to have been a clerical error, which the pleadings themselves disclose, and the Respondent is willing that it should be corrected here. As no motion was made for the correction in the Court below, the error would be corrected here at the cost of the Appellants, and the decree otherwise affirmed, if there were no other error in the record.

2. There seems to be another error in the decree, also shown by the pleadings and exhibits. In one of the mortgages attempted to be foreclosed the property is described as the south half of Lot 5, in square between J and K, Ninth and Tenth streets, and in the other mortgage, as part of Lot, No. 5. The decree directs the sale of the lot as first described under both mortgages, and, of course, a foreclosure of the mortgagor's title and equity. It is very true that the mere indefiniteness of the description in the mortgage is no objection to the enforcement of the mortgage as it is written, whatever the effect of the sale under such a description would be. It does not lie with the mortgagor to say that he conveyed the property by so loose or indefinite a description that no title could pass to a purchaser at a sale of the mortgaged premises. If nothing passes, it is the misfortune of the mortgagee, but the mortgagor is not hurt; if anything does pass, the mortgagee is entitled to it. But this does not meet the objection; the complaint is that, by this particular description, property is or may be made to pass or be sold which the mortgagor never conveyed. But this error, which attaches to only one of the mortgages, can be corrected by the record.

3. We have intimated that this was a bill filed to foreclose two mortgages — one made 2d April, 1856, by Joseph Sutton and wife, to Anestina Schroeder, to secure a note of two thousand dollars, due at twelve months from date, with interest; the other mortgage, made the 10th day of October, 1857, by Sutton and wife, to the plaintiff here, for one thousand dollars, to secure a note of that date, due at six months, with interest.

It seems that a jury was empaneled under the direction of the Court, who were instructed to find a special verdict. They found as follows: "We, the jurors, do not find any evidence to satisfy us that there has been any alteration in the papers since the execution." The Court reserved its judgment, and directed the Clerk to compute the amount due the plaintiff. After the Clerk had returned his report of the amount due, appears in the transcript a motion for a new trial and statement. By this it seems that the case was tried in July, 1858, by the Court, and a final decree entered for the plaintiff. The defense, in this case, was that Mrs. Schroeder, on the 21st day of August, 1857, assigned this two thousand dollar mortgage to Miss Bertha McKay, who entered satisfaction on the 10th day of October, 1857, on the records, in these words: "Satisfied in full, this 10th day of Oct. 1857, Miss Bertha McKay, assignee of Anestine Schroeder, by her Attorney in fact, R. H. Stanley."

A copy of the assignment was offered, which purports to be for the consideration of the sum of two thousand dollars, and to be an assignment of the note and mortgage, and to be made without recourse. It is signed in the presence of R. H. Stanley, by, or in the name of A. Schroeder. It purports to be acknowledged before Stanley, Notary Public, and recorded on the day of its date.

The plaintiff, in making out his case, after the introduction of the mortgage, offered the note, which was payable to Mrs. Anestine Schroeder or order, and was indorsed, "Sacramento, Nov. 13, 1857, assigned and transferred without recourse. A. Schroeder, H. R. Schroeder." After the introduction of the assignment by the defendant, the plaintiff moved to exclude it, and, for that purpose, offered evidence tending to show that Mrs. A. Schroeder was a married woman at the time of the assignment, being then and still the wife of one H. R. Schroeder. The Court heard this proof and excluded the assignment. Perhaps this was irregular. Probably it would have been more accordant with right rules of practice to permit the defendants to go on with their proof, and then, after they had closed, to have given the plaintiff the opportunity to rebut it, thus turning the question from one of the admissibility of evidence to a question of the effect of it. But no objection for irregularity seems to have been made; and there is little, if any practical difference between the Court ruling out testimony upon the strength of a fact proven, and denying effect to such testimony upon proof of the same fact; and the failure of the defendants to except to this order and mode of proof, must be considered a waiver of objection to it.

Tryon v. Sutton.

---

The question then is: Can a married woman make an assignment of a mortgage without the concurrence of her husband? We say, without the concurrence of her husband, for it is not necessary to inquire whether this concurrence must, in such cases as this, be in the statutory mode required for the conveyance of the separate estate of the wife. We are not aware of any authority which holds this doctrine. It is true that the note and mortgage were made directly to the wife. But this does not show that she was a feme sole, nor that even this note or the mortgage, (the mere incident to it,) was her separate estate, even if this last fact would help the defense. As we have held, prima facie, property conveyed to, or acquired by, either spouse during the coverture, under one system, is common property, and the control and disposition of this common property is given, by statute, to the husband. The wife has no right to dispose of it. At common law, the note made payable to the wife, would, prima facie, be the property of the husband, who could indorse it in his own name. (Chitty on Bills, 22.) Probably the indorsement of the wife was not necessary, but it did not hurt or make less effectual the indorsement of the husband. A party dealing with a feme is bound to inquire into her rights and powers. She or he is no more estopped by the fact that the papers are drawn directly to her than she or he would be bound to give effect to her sole deed, if she were named as grantee in a conveyance of real estate. The case might be different if the husband expressly represented the wife to be a feme sole, and with authority to deal as such with the common property, or assented to this transfer by her, but this representation is not made in any such a manner as to conclude the parties by the mere fact that a note is taken to the wife, or a mortgage to secure it, executed to her: for this is consistent with the title or right of the husband.

4. Another point taken by the counsel for the Appellants is more formidable. According to the views we have taken of this case, the sole title and right to transfer this note and mortgage were in H. R. Schroeder, the husband. The title of the plaintiff was through his assignment of the note to the plaintiff here. But the complaint does not show this title or count upon it. The proof supports it, but not the pleading. Upon the pleadings, the same case is not made as in the proofs. In a chancery case, a party has a right to insist that the legal conclusion to be deduced from the pleadings—whatever may be the proofs—shall be applied. Therefore, upon this case, so made, the plaintiff was not entitled to his decree so far as this first mortgage was concerned. The decree was wrong, therefore, as the case was presented to the Judge; for the complaint alleges that the two thousand dollar note was made to, and signed by, E. Schroeder.

But the plaintiff may have the pleadings amended so as to conform to the proofs. The bill can easily be amended, averring that the note and mortgage were made to Mrs. Schroeder, a married woman, and that Schroeder and wife indorsed the note, carrying with it the mortgage to the plaintiff.

The decree is reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings and a new trial, in pursuance of this opinion.

Ordered accordingly.

---

MORRISON v. WILSON AND WIFE.

A perfect equity united with possession is, under our system, equivalent for all purposes of defense, to a legal title.

The wife cannot convey her separate estate, acquired before the Act of 1850, whether legal or equitable, except by the joint deed of herself and husband.

The doctrine of estoppel in pais, has no application to the estates of married women. The Act of 1850 is enabling, and the estate vests only after compliance with the mode of conveyance prescribed by the Act.

Generally, a conveyance by a feme covert, not executed according to the forms prescribed by statute, is invalid.

The doctrine that fraud vitiates all contracts, must, when applied to married women, under our statutes, be limited to this: that a contract, so infected, can not be enforced; not that a fraudulent representation will divest a feme's title in the face of a statute declaring a different and exclusive mode of divestiture.

Where the deed of land bought for a married woman, is taken in the name of a third person, under an executory agreement on his part to convey to her, on the payment of a certain sum, and she goes into possession, she enters under claim of right, with a vested equitable interest in the land, which, on payment of the sum agreed, becomes a perfect equity.

And if, in such case, before the payment of the money she acquires the real title from another source, the first deed being from parties without title, this real title is not divested in favor of a vendee or mortgagee of such third person, because she holds the inferior title from him, or entered, or claimed under it.

Morrison v. Wilson.

Claiming or taking the one title is no abandonment of the other. And her possession, if not to be referred to the good title, would not be referred exclusively to the bad.

The title of a married woman cannot be divested by an estoppel, based upon the fact of her taking possession under a bad title.

Possession of land is notice of the equity under which the party holds. And if, in this case, the good title was recorded, the person dealing with the land had notice, notwithstanding her representations that she held under the bad title. Her ignorance will not forfeit her estate.

▲ A deed to a married woman is prima facie valid. And where it recites that the consideration is paid by another, for her exclusive benefit, the deed, prima facie, creates a separate estate in her.

APPEAL from the Twelfth District.

Ejectment for a lot in San Francisco.

Complaint, among other things, avers that defendants entered under one Ford, and not otherwise; and, that plaintiff holds a title deraigned from Ford under mortgage sale.

Defendant, Wilson, claims no interest in the lot except such as results from the possession by his wife; denies the title and possession of Ford, and sets up title in his wife. Mrs. Wilson denies the exclusive possession of Ford, as averred in the complaint, or that she entered under him, or that there was any consideration for the mortgage from Ford to Perkins, and avers title in herself, derived through Perkins.

The Court, among other things, charged the jury in effect, that if they believed the defendants entered into possession under Ford, they were estopped from setting up title against Ford, and if plaintiff had acquired title from Ford, the verdict must be for plaintiff. The Court also charged, that if Perkins was induced to waive his lien and take the mortgage from Ford upon the representation on the part of defendants, that they had no interest in the lot, and that it belonged to Ford alone, and that plaintiff acquired title from Ford, then, whether Mrs. Wilson entered under Ford or not, defendants are estopped, as before.

The jury found for plaintiff, judgment accordingly. Defendants appealed.

J. D. Thornton, for Appellants, argued: that, as Mrs. Wilson was a married woman, she could not be estopped by her acts and declarations; that any concurrence, on the part of the wife, with the acts, declarations, or admissions, of the husband, relied on as an estoppel, would be rejected, on the presumption of law that she was under the influence of her husband; and that the only way to divest the estate of a married woman, is by deed, signed and acknowledged, as prescribed by statute. (Wood's Dig. 483, Sec. 2.)

G. F. & W. H. Sharp, for Respondent.

Appellants having entered into possession under Respondent's grantor's title, the Court was right in giving Respondent's first instruction, and this Court will disregard all evidence of adverse title in Appellants or the homestead claim. (Jackson v. Scissam, 3 John. 499; Jackson v. Bard, 4 Id. 230; Jackson v. Dennison, 4 Wend. 558; Bank of Utica v. Mersereau, 3 Barb. Ch. R. 528; Jackson v. Harper, 5 Wend. 246; Greenleaf's Ev. Vol. 1, 137; 7 Cow. 717, 637; 15 Wend. 615; 6 How. 288.)

Defendants did not connect themselves with the title of Soule. (Winans v. Christie, 4 Cal. 70.)

The doctrine of estoppel is correctly given in the charge of the Court below. (Hoen v. Simmons, 1 Cal. 120; Mathews v. Light, 32 Maine, 305; Whittington v. Wright, 9 Geo. 23; 1 Story's Eq. Juris. Sec. 385; Pickard v. Sears, 6 A. & E. 469; Welland Canal v. Hathaway, 8 Wend. 483; 2 Hare & W. Lead. Cases in Eq. 47.) Defendants entering under Ford are also estopped. Acts of John Wilson must characterize the entry of family.

BALDWIN, J. delivered the opinion of the Court — TERRY, C. J. concurring.

We understand the merits of this controversy to depend upon this state of facts: One Ford obtained a deed for the lot in dispute, from Hitchcock and Van Winkle, who had no title, but claimed under a Colton grant. Ford bought for Mrs. Wilson, though the title was taken in the name of Ford for her, and at her instance. Nearly contemporaneously, Ford executed to Mrs. Wilson an agreement to convey to her, as her separate property, this lot, on the payment of three hundred dollars, which sum there was evidence to show she paid, and the money was advanced as a gift to her by her son. Previously to this time, she had received a deed from another source, and this last seems to be the better title. The plaintiffs offered evidence tending to show that in consideration of a debt due for the building of the house, and a waiver of a lien on it, to one Perkins, Ford, at the instance of Wilson and wife, executed a mortgage on the premises, the latter representing at the time that Ford was the owner, and in consequence of this representation, the mortgage was so taken. Plaintiff claims through this mortgage and sale under it. He asserts that this gives to him the right as against Mrs. Wilson, on the ground of estoppel. 1. Because she, having entered under Ford, cannot dispute his title, or that of Ford's representative, the plaintiff here. 2. Because these representations acted on, estop her from denying the title to be in Ford.

Morrison v. Wilson.

---

We think neither ground can be maintained. If the purchase were made by Ford in his own name for the benefit of Mrs. Wilson, Ford would be morally, if not legally, her Trustee; and if Ford, at or shortly after this time, gave her a writing to convey to her, on payment of the three hundred dollars, the two papers may be construed together, if they are shown to be parts of one general transaction. On the payment of the purchase money, Mrs. Wilson had a perfect equity, which, united with the possession, was equivalent, in our system, for all purposes of this defense, to a legal estate. This estate she could not convey except by joint deed of her husband and herself, any more than if it were a legal estate. The cases of Jenkins v. McConico, (26 Ala. 213,) and Lee v. Bank of the United States, (9 Leigh, 219,) and the authorities cited are conclusive on this point, even in the absence of statutory provisions like the Sixth Section of our Act regulating the disposition of estates of femes covert. The case of Ingoldsby v. Juan, 12 Cal. 564, in this Court, is not opposed to this view, for the doctrine there is limited to conveyances of married women of separate estates vested before the passage of the Act of 1850. The doctrine of estoppel in pais has no application to the estates of married women; for the Act of 1850 is enabling, the estate vesting only after compliance with the mode of conveyance prescribed by the statute.

Palmer v. Cross, (1 Smedes & Marshall, 48,) is a case upon a statute similar to our own. It was shown there that the wife stood by and saw some personal property sold by the husband as his own; and it was contended that she was estopped from afterwards claiming it. But the Court said: "The law has thrown certain guards around a married woman to protect her from the influence of her husband. It has provided a mode by which alone she can be deprived of her real estate and, to use no stronger language, it is certainly very doubtful whether she can be deprived of her separate personal estate in any other mode than the one prescribed by the instrument of settlement. The Supreme Court of the United States, in the case already cited from 13 Peters, 107, decided that the mere silence of Mrs. Lee, as to her title, and her failure to obtrude her rights upon the notice of others, could not divest her of her property." The general rule is, that if the conveyance of a feme covert be not executed according to the forms prescribed by the statute, it is not valid. (Elliott v. Petersol, 1 Peters, 328; Hepburn v. Dubois, 12 Id. 345; West v. West, 10 S. & R. 445. See, also, James v. Fisk, 9 Smedes and M. 152). And, accordingly, it has often been held that when the acknowledgment was defective in any substantial particular, the feme's title did not pass. It would be strange if a mere defect of this kind avoided the deed, though regularly signed, and proven to have been fairly and voluntarily made, and yet a loose declaration of the feme, in the presence of the husband, and, possibly, made by his connivance or constraint, and in total ignorance by the wife, of its legal effect, or even of the real facts of the transaction, could pass her estate. It is obvious, if this be the rule, that every deed of the husband might be an estoppel, whether acknowledged or not, according to law, or even signed by the wife, since the representation in the presence of a purchaser or mortgagee, by the wife, of the property being the husband's, would be sufficient to estop her from denying the title to be in him. In truth, the paper signed by him, in her presence, purporting to convey the property as his, would amount to such representation and consequent estoppel. It is true that it is said by some writers that fraud vitiates all contracts, even those made by infants or femes; but, we apprehend, that in cases of married women, under statutes like ours, this doctrine is limited to this — that a contract so infected cannot be enforced; but not that a fraudulent representation will divest a feme's title in the face of a statute declaring a different and exclusive mode of divesture.

Morrison v. Wilson.

---

The second instruction asked for by the plaintiff, and given by the Court directly contravenes this view. For the learned Judge below told the jury that, even if the defendants did not enter into possession of the lot under Ford, yet if they disclaimed title to induce Perkins to waive his lien and take a mortgage from Ford, this estopped her from contesting the title of plaintiffs deraigned through Ford.

Morrison v. Wilson.

---

It was a disputed fact whether the defendant entered under Ford, and, perhaps, the weight of evidence was that she did not.

If we concede that Mrs. Wilson entered under this executory agreement with Ford, she did so under claim of right, and with a vested equitable interest in the property, which, on payment of the purchase money, became a perfect equity. This equity, as we have said, she could no more dispose of by estoppel in pais, than if it were a legal estate; but if she could, having received the real title from another source, we do not perceive how that title is divested in favor of the plaintiff here, merely because she held an inferior title from Ford, or even entered, or claimed, under it. The result of such a doctrine would be to destroy the whole effect of the statute, for all a creditor or stranger would have to do, in order to divest the title to real estate of a feme covert, would be to get her or her husband to take and consent to hold under a bad title, and then both titles, by the doctrine of estoppel, might be subjected to a claim held by a predecessor under the vicious title. The good title was older in date than that acquired by Ford, and the evidence is by no means satisfactory, that she entered under Ford, or that, in getting in the Van Winkle and Hitchcock title, she did, or meant to do, anything more than to strengthen the title she held before, by getting in the outstanding claim. Besides, if the fact be, as stated by witnesses not contradicted, that Ford really bought for her, and made the executory agreement alluded to, we cannot perceive that she stood towards Ford in any other relation than any other purchaser, having two titles; or, that claiming or taking the last is any abandonment of the first. The possession, in such a case, if not referred to the good title, would not be referred exclusively to the bad. But if we hold that a feme covert cannot be divested of a title by parol or an estoppel in pais, directly operating upon the title, it would be illogical to hold that such divestiture could be effected by an estoppel created by taking possession under a bad title.

Morrison v. Wilson.

---

It is not pretended that she entered as tenant of Ford. She entered, if at all, as purchaser. She held the equitable estate, Ford merely the legal title. Being in possession, this was a notice of the equity. The payment of the purchase money perfected this equity, leaving nothing but the naked legal title outstanding in Ford, with a right to call for it at any time by Mrs. Wilson. Any person dealing with the estate was bound to inquire as to the true state of the title; and if the party in possession had a deed recorded, this was a notice of his or her title. A different question might arise, if a feme covert was in possession, under a deed or an executory agreement, not recorded, and a person dealing with the property on the faith of an apparent legal estate in another, inquired of her, and she represented that she had no title, but that the title was in another, and the inquirer then dealt with that other as the owner. But we do not understand that was this case — at least, it does not seem to be so put to the jury. In this case, the mortgagee did not see the legal title in Ford, for it was not in him, and therefore did not deal with the property on the faith of it. It may be very true that Mrs. Wilson, being in possession under the good title and the vicious title, said to Perkins she held under the Ford title — and that it was the real title; but a feme covert could scarcely be held to forfeit a good title because she was not learned enough in land law in 1851 or 1852, to know, what has so puzzled the Courts to determine — the relative strength of San Francisco titles.

We have all along assumed the fact that Mrs. Wilson held a good title under the deed from Minor. This deed was executed 7th of May, 1851, and is made to her in exclusive property. A deed to a married woman is prima facie valid. (Harmon v. James et ux. 7 S. & M. 118.) And this deed recites that the consideration money was paid by George W. Soule, for the exclusive benefit of Mrs. Wilson. This, it seems to us, prima facie, created a separate estate in Mrs. Wilson. The deed, too, is witnessed by the same George W. Soule. It is true, that on the 3d of May before, Minor executed a deed of the lot to Soule, but this deed was not acknowledged until the 21st of April, 1852, or recorded until April 27th, 1852. When it was delivered does not appear. As between Soule and Mrs. Wilson, it would seem that the witnessing of the deed to Mrs. Wilson, with this recital, and especially with the possession taken by Mrs. Wilson — if such was the fact — would strongly imply that the deed to Soule by Minor, was not delivered at the date of the deed to Mrs. Wilson, or, if delivered, that the unrecorded deed of Soule was, by contract or consent, postponed to the latter deed. If the money paid by Soule was furnished by Mrs. Wilson, would not this be an estoppel against Soule's setting up his secret deed? Could he encourage or assist in giving effect to the last deed, and yet hold it good for nothing? It is not necessary to consider this point further, as it has not been argued; for, upon the ground last taken, the judgment must be reversed; and this whole matter may be more fully presented on a future trial.

Morrison v. Wilson.

---

Nor is it necessary to decide whether, if Mrs. Wilson and Ford were in possession, and Perkins having no notice, by the record, or otherwise, of Mrs. Wilson's title, inquired of Wilson and wife, and Ford, as to the title, and was informed that the title was in Ford, and accordingly dealt with Ford as if he were owner, and thereby released a valuable right, the title of Mrs. Wilson would be bound by such a transaction. This question is left open and unaffected by this opinion.

Judgment reversed and cause remanded.

On petition for rehearing, the following opinion was delivered by BALDWIN, J.—TERRY, C. J. concurring:

The rehearing is denied. The main ground of reversal was the instruction of the Court, that whether Mrs. Wilson entered under Ford or not — which was a disputed fact before the jury — if the defendants, (Mrs. Wilson being one,) disclaimed title to induce Perkins to waive his lien and take a mortgage from Ford, this estopped her from contesting the title of plaintiffs, deraigned through Ford. We meant to assert, and think we sustained the proposition by reason and authority, that a feme covert under our statute, cannot divest her separate estate in any other mode than that pointed out by the Act; for to hold otherwise, would be to hold that the statute, where it says that the estate shall only be divested by joint deed of husband and wife, means that it may be divested by estoppel in pais.

As this error is sufficient to reverse the judgment, we so modify the opinion as to leave the other points discussed in it open to future discussion, as it is suggested, with some plausibility, that a fuller examination may throw some light upon the questions, and the facts can be more fully presented.

---

DORE et al. v. COVEY et al.

In an undertaking on appeal, the names of the sureties need not appear in the body of the paper.
 The stay of proceedings, accorded by the statute to the execution of the undertaking, is a sufficient consideration.
 Non-compliance with the directory provisions of the statute, intended for the benefit of the Respondent, does not vitiate the undertaking.
 Residence of the sureties, and their occupation, and that the penalty must be double the amount of the judgment, are directory provisions.
 The execution of the paper, the delivery of it to the Clerk, filing it among the papers with the affidavit, and the actual suspension of proceedings, is prima facie, a sufficient proof of delivery, if delivery is essential, as if the instrument were sealed.

APPEAL from the Sixth District.

Action by plaintiffs against the defendants upon an undertaking executed by them, on an appeal to the Supreme Court, in the suit of M. Dore & Co., v. J. R. Hardenbergh.

For the undertaking, see opinion of Court. The appeal in that case was duly prosecuted, and the judgment affirmed, with ten per cent. damages. Demurrers were interposed, and being overruled, answers were filed.

On the trial, the Court below ruled out the undertaking, as evidence for plaintiff, except for three hundred dollars, for reasons which appear in the opinion of this Court. Plaintiff offered to prove further, as to defendant, Covey, that, after signing the instrument, he had admitted that he signed it for the full amount named; and that, after judgment of affirmance by the Supreme Court, he had promised to pay the same to plaintiff. The Court excluded the evidence, plaintiffs excepting. Under instructions, the jury found for plaintiffs three hundred dollars. Plaintiffs excepted to the instructions, and appeal.

H. H. Hartley, for Appellants.

The Court erred in ruling out the undertaking offered in evidence by the plaintiffs.

Dere v. Covey.

I. Because the undertaking was in substantial compliance with the provisions of the statute. (Wood's Dig. Arts. 1082, 1083, 1088.) It is but one integral undertaking, and not two separate undertakings on the same paper; it has but one recital of the parties, the Court in which the judgment was rendered, the nature of the appeal, and the conditions of the obligation. And the signature of the defendants at the bottom of the instrument made it prima facie theirs, and bound them for the whole penalty. 2. It was a good undertaking; although executed in blank. (Smith v. Crocker, 5 Mass. 537; 7 N. H. 230; 1 Texas, 9; 7 Cow. 484; Parker v. Bradley, 2 Hill, 584; Scott v. Whipple, 5 Greenl. 337; 17 Sergt. & Rawle, 438; 4 McCord, 239; Id. 203; 2 Dana, 142; and the filling up of a blank is not a material alteration; Smith v. Crocker, Sup.; Hunt, Administrator, v. Adams, 6 Mass. 522; Granite Railway Co. v. J. Bacon, 15 Pick. 239; Humphreys v. Crane, 5 Cal. 173; Barrett v. Thorndike, 1 Greenl. 73; Turner v. Billgraham, 2 Cal. 520; State v. Cilley, 1 N. H. 97; 1 Saund. Pl. & Ev. 76; Hale v. Russ, 1 Greenl. 334; 4 Bing. 123; 5 Taunt. 707; 1 Brod. & Bing. 426; Kershaw v. Cox, 3 Esp. 24; 6 Id. 57; Hale v. Russ, 1 Greenl. 334.)

II. Because the insertion of the place of residence and occupation of the sureties is immaterial, and the want of it will not avoid an undertaking when an appeal has been had.

1. Those requirements are only inserted for the Appellee's benefit, and he can waive them. (17 Wend. 67; Dudley, Geo. 22; Id. 66; 4 Texas, 4; Ives v. Finch, 22 Conn. 101; 7 Monroe, 118.) Mere irregularities in appeal bonds do not vitiate them. (Swan v. Graves, 8 Cal. 549, and cases cited; Bonnachan v. Webb, 6 Iredell, 57; Whitsett v. Womack, 8 Ala. 466; Iredell v. Barbee, 4 Iredell, 250; Teall v. Von Wyck, 10 Barb. 379; Gully v. Gully, 1 Hawks, 20; Stockton v. Turner, 7 J. J. Marshall, 192; 4 Mon. 448; 3 Id. 392; Wendham v. Coates, 8 Ala. 285; 1 Wend. 464; 12 Id. 306; 2 J. J. Marsh. 473; 4 Mon. 225; 17 Wend. 67; 26 Wend. 502; 8 Barb. 81; 1 Watts & Sergt. 261.) As to a proper delivery of the undertaking, see 6 Geo. 202; 3 No. Ca. R. 384; 4 Id. 270; Hare v. Horton, 2 Nev. & M. 428; 5 B. & Adol. 715.

2. But if the undertaking was invalid and void for want of strict conformity to the statute, yet it was good as a voluntary undertaking. (11 Ill. 417; 6 Hump. 234; 10 Miss. 663, 698; 8 Cow. 138; 5 Id. 27; 3 Scam. 347.)

3. Conceding that the undertaking filed might not have stayed execution for want of certain informalities, yet the Appellee having waived the taking out of execution, and the obligors having had the benefit of the appeal, are estopped from setting up any errors in the undertaking.

W. S. Lang, and Robinson, Beatty & Heacock, for Respondents.

1st. Whenever there is a blank in an instrument, and that blank can only be filled up in one way, so as to be consistent with the balance of the instrument, any one may fill it up. (Smith v. Crocker, 5 Mass. 537.)

2d. Where it must be inferred from the form and nature of the instrument, that the party who executed it with the blanks, intended to confer upon the party to whom it was delivered, or upon some other person designated by the nature of the instrument, the authority to fill up the blanks, they may be so filled. (Bank of the Commonwealth v. Curry, 2 Dana, 143.)

The instrument under consideration cannot come under the first class; for the blank may be filled up by the name of Covey, or of any other person, and be equally sensible and consistent in all its parts. With respect to Justis, it does come under the second class. The irresistible inference is that he authorized the person to whom he delivered the instrument, to fill up the blanks, and that, with the name of any citizen of California, who could take the necessary oath with regard to solvency. (Case of Day v. Brown, 2 Ham. 345; or, Ohio Rep. condensed; U. S. Dig. Supplement, Vol. 5, Sec. 74, Tit. Surety; U. S. Dig. Vol. 3, Sec. 4, Tit. Surety, referring to Walsh v. Bailie, 10 Johna. 180; 2 Penn. 27.)

But the instrument must be interpreted by what it contains. Justis and Covey undertake positively for three hundred dollars, and Justis undertakes for six thousand eight hundred dollars more, on the condition that Hardenbergh will procure another person, who can qualify as to responsibility, to become bound with him; failing in that, he is only bound for the three hundred dollars. (Sharp v. United States, 4 Watts, 21.)

As this is an instrument not under seal, it comes within the

---

Dore v. Covey.

12th Section of the statute of frauds. It is the undertaking of sureties to answer for the default of the principal. It was executed according to law, so far as the first branch of the undertaking is concerned, and is binding on the parties. With respect to the second branch of the undertaking, it complies with the law in no respect. The amount of the undertaking is less than double the amount of judgment—the judgment being for three thousand four hundred and fifty-four dollars—besides thirty-five dollars and twenty-five cents costs, and the undertaking for six thousand eight hundred dollars. The name and residence, but not the occupation, of one surety is given; but neither the residence, name, or occupation, of another is given. It is not made in accordance with the statute. (See Sec. 349 of Practice Act.) It does not express a consideration for the second undertaking. (Wain et al. v. Walters, 5 East, 10.) There was no consideration unless the undertaking stayed execution. It did not, ex necessitate, stay execution. (Pr. Act. Sec. 378.)

“But,” says the Appellant, “we waived the right to issue execution, and allowed the undertaking to operate as a stay.” Then the consideration is nothing in the undertaking, but a waiver outside of it. That waiver must be proved by parol evidence, and not by the instrument. But the statute, as interpreted by the Courts, says, you can prove no part of the consideration by parol. There must be a sufficient consideration expressed in the instrument.

There are cases in which the payee of a bond may waive defects in it. But it is not every bond, and certainly not every undertaking without a seal, which may be made valid by a waiver of defects. Imperfect appeal bonds are divided into two classes: those which are void, and those which are merely voidable. A bond absolutely void, produces no effect. (See 7 Monroe, 117.) If, however, a bond, is not absolutely void, but merely voidable, the party to whom it is payable, may elect either to treat it as an insufficient bond, and move to dismiss the appeal, or to waive the imperfections of the bond, and call up the appeal on its merits.

The instrument, in this case, is absolutely void, as an undertaking to stay execution. The statute expressly makes it so. But if this were only a voidable bond, what evidence is there, or what is there in the pleadings showing that plaintiff did waive his right to a better bond? It appears that no execution issued, pending the appeal, but how does it appear that this undertaking prevented the issuance of execution?

---

BALDWIN, J. delivered the opinion of the Court — TERRY, C. J. concurring.

Suit was brought by the plaintiffs below, Appellants here, upon the following instrument; and, upon a proper construction of its terms, the appeal depends. The paper is in these words:

“STATE OF CALIFORNIA, County of Sacramento.

In the District Court, Sixth Judicial District.

M. Dore & Co. plaintiffs, v. J. R. Hardenbergh, defendant:
Whereas, on the twenty-sixth day of March, 1857, judgment was rendered in the above entitled cause, in favor of said plaintiffs, for the sum of three thousand four hundred and fifty-four dollars and fifty cents, and the sum of thirty-five dollars and twenty-five cents costs; and, whereas, the said defendant is about to appeal from the judgment of said District Court to the Supreme Court of this State:

Now, therefore, we, the undersigned, do agree, undertake, and become bound, on the part of the Appellant, to the effect that the said Appellant will pay all damages and costs which may be awarded against him on his appeal, not exceeding three hundred dollars; and, whereas, said Appellant is desirous of a stay of execution in said cause, we, the said Charles Justis, residing at Johnson's Ranch, in the county of Sutter, do further undertake, and become bound, in the sum of six thousand and eight hundred dollars, that if the judgment appealed from, or any part thereof, be affirmed, the Appellant shall pay the amount directed to be paid by the judgment or order, or the part of such amount as to which the judgment or order shall be affirmed, if affirmed only in part, and all damages and costs which shall be awarded against the Appellants upon this appeal.

(Signed)

CHARLES JUSTIS,
H. R. COVEY.

County of Sacramento, ss:

Being each for himself duly sworn, doth depose and say, that he is worth double the amount specified in the foregoing undertaking, over and above all his just debts and liabilities, exclusive of property exempt from execution.

CHARLES JUSTIS,
H. R. COVEY.

Sworn to before me, this 29th day of March, 1857, by Charles Justis.

N. R. WILSON,
Notary Public."

Proceedings were stayed in the District Court in the case of Dore & Co. v. Hardenbergh, and this Court rendered judgment of affirmance, with ten per cent. damages. No objection was taken to the undertaking in the Court below, or in this Court on appeal.

The stipulations of this undertaking are two-fold. The first is that the Appellant will pay all damages and costs not exceeding three hundred dollars. The second, to pay the amount directed to be paid by the Supreme Court, on affirmance of the judgment in whole or in part. The undertaking recites the amount of the judgment. In the condition it proceeds: "We, the undersigned, do agree," etc. In the second part it reads: "We, the said Chas. Justis, residing at Johnson's Ranch, in the county of Sutter, do further undertake," etc. "to become bound in the sum of six thousand eight hundred dollars," etc. It is signed by both Justis and Covey. An affidavit is appended, as made by both, that each is worth the amount specified in the foregoing undertaking.

The undertaking is one entire contract, though containing two several stipulations. It is the act of both the parties signing. There was no necessity for any mention of the names of the stipulators in the body of the paper to make it obligatory. All the use of this recital would be to show who executed the paper, and the signatures sufficiently indicate this fact. It is scarcely necessary to refer to authorities to establish this proposition.

Dore v. Covey.

---

But see Ex parte Fulton, 7 Cow. 484; Scott v. Whipple, 5 Greenl. 396.

We regard, therefore, the evidence offered of the admissions of Covey as to his intent in executing the instrument as wholly immaterial.

2. It is next contended that this undertaking is void under the Statute of Frauds, 13th Section, because no consideration is expressed in the writing. We cannot see how this point can be maintained. The writing shows that the defendant in the action, Hardenbergh, is about to take an appeal, and then, in the second part, recites that, whereas, he is desirous of a stay of execution, the stipulators undertake, etc. The statute accords the effect of a stay to the execution of the undertaking. This stay is sufficient consideration. The stay was had. The plaintiff below acquiesced in it, and the officers gave it effect, it seems, as a sufficient and valid undertaking. It is argued that this undertaking did not operate as a supersedeas, because the undertaking was not in precise conformity to statutory provisions, in two particulars: 1. Because the residence of the parties and their occupation were not inserted in it. 2. Because the penalty is less, by thirty-three dollars, than double the amount of the judgment. But it is well answered that the first direction was only designated for the benefit of the other party, and he could waive it, if he chose, just as a description of the person, age, etc. of the sureties.

We think the execution of the writing in less than double the amount of the judgment does not vitiate it as a statutory undertaking. This provision is merely directory. This principle was held in the case of Anderson v. Rhea, (7 Ala. 106.) That was a case on a statutory bond, on which, by the statute, summary judgment could be taken in the Clerk's office, or, rather, which being forfeited, had the effect of a judgment. The Court say: "The requisitions of the statute that the bond shall be taken in double the amount of the execution, and that it shall be stated that the property shall be delivered at twelve o'clock, noon, are directory merely. That the penalty of the bond was for less than double the amount of the execution, and that the defendant had the whole of the day to deliver the property in, were for her benefit, and she cannot complain of them." This was a proceeding at the instance of the surety to set aside the bond.

The case of Van Deusen v. Hayward, (17 Wend.) follows the same course of reasoning. Bronson, J. said in that case: "The Court has often had occasion to consider the sufficiency of appeal bonds, under the Act of 1824, and it has generally been said that the Appellant must comply strictly with the requirements of the statute, or he can derive no benefit from the appeal. The question has usually arisen on the motion of the Appellee to quash the proceedings. (4 Cow. 80, 540; 6 Id. 592, 593; 7 Id. 423, 468; 9 Id. 227.) Within the principle of these decisions, the appeal of Hayward might have been quashed, on motion, because the bond was less beneficial to the plaintiffs than the statute required. But the plaintiffs made no objection to the sufficiency of the bond. Hayward has had the full benefit of his appeal, and I think the defendants should not now be allowed to object that their own voluntary obligation was less onerous than it should have been. I will not say that this opinion can be reconciled with all the decisions that have been made in relation to appeal bonds, nor that all the cases on that subject are entirely consistent with each other; but upon general principles, I think the defendants should not be heard to make this objection. The bond was not contrary to law, nor against good morals. It contained all that the statute required, and was only wrong in the addition of a further clause, which rendered it more favorable to the obligors. Where the bond is more favorable to the Appellee than the statute requires, it has been repeatedly held that he cannot complain that the statute has not been followed. (5 Cow. 27; 8 Id. 138.) That principle is applicable to this case and should conclude the defendants." Ives v. Finch, (22 Conn. 101,) is to the same general effect. Clinton v. Phillips, Administrator, (7 Monroe, at page 119, bottom) entertains the same doctrine. (See, also, for the mode of interpretation of appeal bonds, Swain v. Graves, 8 Cal. 551.)

The Respondent's argument that the undertaking shall not stay execution unless made in precise conformity with the statutory rules, is answered by the authorities cited, which hold, in effect, that these provisions are intended for the benefit of the other party, and that he may waive them, just as if the statute declared that no judgment should be rendered without service of process; but the defendant might waive the process of service. This waiver was made by the plaintiff below. He considered the appeal as regularly made, made no motion to dismiss, issued no execution, and suffered the undertaking to have the full effect of a regularly executed instrument.

The execution of the paper, the delivery of it to the Clerk, filing it among the papers with the affidavit, and the actual suspension of proceedings, were, prima facie, a sufficient proof of delivery, if delivery is essential, as if the instrument were sealed.

The rulings of the Court below were not in accordance with these views, and the judgment is reversed and the cause remanded for a new trial.

The omission, in the record of a deed, to make a copy of the seal or seal mark to indicate the seal, does not vitiate the record. This is an action of ejectment for a lot in San Francisco: both parties deraign title from the same source, through various meane conveyances; the defendant claiming under a prior unrecorded title, accompanied by possession in himself or his tenants.

It appears from the record that the premises in question were originally granted by T. M. Leavenworth, Alcalde of San Francisco, to Charles Richardson, who, acting by his Attorney, John H. Brown, conveyed the same to Malachi Fallon, by a deed which was never recorded.

Afterwards the same property was conveyed by Charles Richardson to Whitcomb and Lien, and by them to the plaintiff. The deed from Richardson to Whitcomb and Lien, was under seal and duly acknowledged. It was recorded on the day after its execution; but on the books of the record there is no copy of seal, or mark, indicating that there was a seal to the instrument. At the time of the conveyance from Whitcomb and Lien to the plaintiff, defendant was absent from the State, and the premises were in the possession of his tenants, and plaintiff was a purchaser for a valuable consideration, and had no actual notice of the existence of the deed from Richardson to Fallon. The Referee reported a finding and judgment in favor of plaintiff, which report was set aside and a new trial granted, and from this order plaintiff appeals.

Two questions are presented by the record:

- 1st. Is the possession of a tenant notice of his landlord's title?
- 2d. Does the fact that the Recorder failed to make some mark upon his books to indicate that there was a seal to the conveyance recorded vitiate the record?

Upon the first point, the weight of authority is that possession (if notice at all under the recording act,) is notice of the title of the possessor alone, and no other. "Notice of a tenancy will not, it seems, affect a purchaser with constructive notice of the lessor's title. Therefore, if a person equitably entitled to an estate let it to a tenant who takes possession, and then the person having the legal estate, sells to a person who purchases bona fide, and without notice of the equitable claim, the purchaser must hold against the equitable owner, although he had notice of the tenant being in possession." (2 Sug. on Vendors, 558.)

In Flagg v. Mann, (2 Sum. 555,) Judge Story says: "It would be pushing the doctrine of constructive notice to a great degree of extravagance, to hold that a purchaser was bound to know, not only the title of the party in possession, but all its derivative sources. Indeed, the American Courts seem indisposed to give effect to this doctrine of constructive notice from possession, even in its most limited form." After referring to the authorities upon the proposition, he further says: "These cases do, as I think, admonish Courts of Equity in this country, when registration of deeds as matters of title is universally provided for, not to enlarge the doctrine of constructive notice, or to follow the English cases on this subject, except with a cautious attention to their just application to the circumstances of our country and to the structure of our laws." This view is consistent with the former rulings of this Court, and does not conflict with the opinion of the majority of the Court in Hunter v. Vance.

Dingman v. Randall.

---

Upon the second point there seems to be no direct decision.

The object of registration of a deed is to give notice to the public of the fact that the title to the property has passed from the vendor, and thereby prevent others from dealing with him as the owner. The conveyance itself is required to be copied into the record, in order that parties may determine its sufficiency and the character of the estate conveyed. To accomplish this end, it is not necessary that the seal should be copied upon the book; it is enough if it appear from the record that the instrument copied is under seal. This, we think, is sufficiently shown by the record of the conveyance from Richardson. The deed purports to be under seal, and to have been signed, sealed, and delivered, in the presence of the subscribing witness, who was the Notary before whom it was acknowledged.

The order setting aside the report of the Referee is reversed, and the cause remanded to the Court below, with instructions to enter judgment upon such report.

DINGMAN v. RANDALL et al.

WHERE a mortgagee released a mortgage made by two parties, and took a new mortgage made by one, to whom the other had meanwhile sold, the new mortgage being for a less sum, by five hundred dollars, paid at the time, and bearing a different rate of interest, it will require clear evidence of fraud, to induce a Court of Equity to interfere, and give the mortgage priority over intervening liens.

certain other mortgages and rights, claimed by virtue of a Sheriff's deed, made in pursuance of sale thereunder, on the ground of fraud.

Defendants, Enos and Williams, had judgment, and plaintiff appeals.

Tuttle & Hillyer, for Appellants.

B. F. Myers, for Respondent.

BALDWIN, J. delivered the opinion of the Court — TERRY, C. J. concurring.

In August, 1856, defendants, Randall and Enos, executed a mortgage to plaintiff, on a place known as "Smith's Ranch," to secure a debt of twenty-five hundred dollars, the purchase money. On 1st of December, 1856, these same defendants executed a mortgage on the same property to defendant, Emanuel Joseph, to secure the payment of their note for six hundred dollars. In June, 1857, Enos sold his interest in the property to Randall. On July 4th afterwards, Randall married defendant, Teresa, and they occupied the property as a homestead. On July 31st, 1857, defendant, Randall, executed a mortgage to defendant, Enos, to secure a debt of nine hundred dollars. In September, 1857, Enos assigned his mortgage and note to Joseph, who commenced suit on his and Enos' note, and foreclosed the mortgage by decree, October 27th, 1857. In November, 1857, Sheriff sold — Williams purchased at the sale, and Sheriff's deed executed June 14th, 1858.

July 31st, 1857, plaintiff discharged his mortgage, and took a new note and mortgage, signed by Randall alone.

Enos and Williams alone answer the bill. The foregoing facts are undisputed. Defendants, Randall and Joseph, confess by failing to answer.

There is no proof tending to show that, when the new mortgage was given, Dingman was to give ten months' extension on the old one, and was not to allow any other liens over his; and, also, that this arrangement was procured by fraud, for the purpose of letting in the junior mortgage of Enos and of Joseph, now held by Williams. That, by this fraud, of which it is charged all these parties had knowledge, and in which they participated, the plaintiff, unless he can get relief in equity, will lose his debt. And the case turns upon the proper decision of this question of fact. The proofs are not a little conflicting.

When Dingman released his old mortgage on Enos and Randall, he took the separate note of Randall, and the mortgage executed by Randall and wife, and received five hundred dollars in cash. He then surrendered the old papers, and executed a release of record of the old mortgage. The evidence is by no means satisfactory, that the arrangement was at all different from what the papers show; and a very clear case should be made before a Court will suffer them to be contradicted, or deny to the transaction the character which they impress upon it. It is true, one or two of the witnesses say that Dingman understood that the new arrangement was an extension of the old mortgage—so, in a loose sense, it was—but it seems to be an extension, deliberately made, on a new contract, with a new consideration—two and a half per cent. interest being included in the new note—and with a new party included and one of the old ones omitted.

It is not necessary to inquire whether Randall was a competent witness, as his testimony is not sufficient, if admitted, to alter the aspect of the case, as we consider it on the proofs. But the direct effect of his testimony would seem to be to make Enos pay one-half of his debt.

The homestead question is not so made that we can consider it, if there be anything in it.

The agreement at the sale not having been set up in the answer, is not involved in the decision of this case. If the plaintiff has any rights under that agreement, he can set them up in another form.

Decree affirmed.

HARRIS v. REYNOLDS et al.

THE words "tenant in possession" in Section 236 of the Practice Act, embrace the judgment debtor, as well as his lessee. The purchaser at Sheriff's sale of a "water ditch," is entitled to the rents and profits thereof from the date of the sale till the expiration of the time for redemption, as well from the judgment debtor in possession as from his tenant.

Where statutes use words and phrases of a well-known and definite meaning in the law, they are to be expounded in the same sense in the statute.

Harris v. Reynolds.

Where a judgment debtor remains in possession of a "water ditch" after Sheriff's sale, and collects the rents and profits during the six months following, he is a Trustee of the fund for the purchaser at the sale, and, if the fund be in danger of loss, a bill in equity to account, will lie.

APPEAL from the Eleventh District.

John Hume, for Appellant. 1. The phrase "tenants in possession" in the 236th Section of the Practice Act, does not include the owner of property. (Sampson v. Shaeffer, 3 Cal. 196; Ramirez v. Murray, 5 Id.; Tewksbury v. Emory, 5 Id.; Reynolds v. Lathrop, 7 Id. 43; McDevitt v. Sullivan, 8 Id. 592; Knight v. Fair, 9 Id. 117.) 2. Equity has no jurisdiction. Defendant is entitled to a jury to fix value of use and occupation.

Sanderson & Newell, and Hewes, for Respondent.

I. The word "tenant" is defined to be "one that holds or possesses lands or tenements, by any kind of title, either in fee, for life, years, or at will." (3 Tomlinson's Law Dic.; 2 Burrill's Law Glossary; 2 Bouvier's Law Dic.) The expression "tenant in possession" is a legal, and therefore a technical, expression, and when found in a statute, or a law book, has a fixed legal and technical meaning, and the Legislature in the one instance, and the writer in the other, are presumed to have used it in its legal and technical sense. (United States v. Magill, 1 Wash. C. C. 463; State v. Smith, 5 Humph. 394; Adams v. Turrentine, 8 Ire. 147; 4 Pick. 405; State v. Mace, 5 Md. 337; 8 Port. 404; 17 Vt. 479; 18 Me. 308; 12 Geo. 526.)

The Legislature having used a general expression, which includes the judgment debtor, the Courts must give that expression its broadest and most comprehensive meaning. (25 Miss. 571.) The Legislature not having attempted to define, or limit, or qualify, the words used, the Courts must look to the books to ascertain their meaning. (12 Pick. 223, 226; 26 Ala. 145.)

II. Bill in equity lies, because: 1. The Appellant, by reason of his position as Treasurer of the company, and the rules of the company, which require him to declare a dividend each month, and pay the same over to the parties entitled thereto, is a Trustee of all the proceeds of the canal, and holds them for the benefit of the owners, whoever they may chance to be.

2. By the sale, and by the operation of the law governing the sale, and fixing its consequences, the judgment debtor being in possession, and still vested with the legal title to the property, is made, as to the proceeds of the property, pending the time allowed for redemption, the Trustee of the purchaser, or his assignee, and holds those proceeds for his benefit, and must pay them over to him. (2 Story's Eq. Jurisp. Secs. 964, 839—841; 3 Daniel's Ch. Pr. 1965, and cases cited, 1958, 2008; Keys v. Bush, 2 Paige, 211; Haggarty v. Pittman, 1 Paige, 298.)

Harris v. Reynolds

---

BALDWIN, J. delivered the opinion of the Court — TERRY, C. J. concurring.

This bill is filed to settle and recover the value of the rents and profits of a certain ditch, or interest therein, bought by the plaintiff at Sheriff's sale. The defendants are in possession. The proceeds of the sales of water, etc. sought to be recovered arise from the property since the Sheriff's sale, and before the expiration of the period limited by statute for the redemption. Treating this species of property as real estate, subject to its incidents and laws, we are brought to consider, as the main point presented by this appeal, whether these intermediate rents or profits go to the purchaser at the Sheriff's sale, when the judgment debtor is in possession. This question involves the construction of the 236th Section of the Practice Act, (Wood's Dig. 198.) That Section is in these words: "The purchaser from the time of the sale until a redemption, and a redemptioner, from the time of his redemption until another redemption, shall be entitled to receive from the tenant in possession the rents of the property sold, or the value of the use and occupation thereof." It is very true, as argued by the Appellant, that a purchaser, by the mere fact of his purchase, does not get title to real estate. His right is rather the right to get a title in a given contingency, and the transaction an executory, not an executed, contract. But it does not follow, because he is not clothed with a perfect title, or even because he is not personally entitled to the possession, that he has no rights in the premises. He may have a perfect statutory right to the profits, without having a right to the subject out of which the profits proceed. Indeed, it is conceded by the Appellants that this is true as regards the party in possession, if that party is a tenant of the judgment

Harris v. Reynolds.

---

debtor. A privilege or redemption is given to the judgment debtor; but it is uncertain whether he will exercise it. Time is not given for the purpose of enabling the debtor to make a profit out of the estate, but for the purpose of enabling him to raise the money to redeem. There is no presumption that the property sells for less than its present value; and there is no compulsion upon the part of the debtor to redeem, if he is able, and if he does not, the purchaser runs the risk of the title, the depreciation or destruction of the property, and in fact, all the risks attending the ownership of property. As the law holds him to the responsibilities of owner, it entitles him to the benefits of owners, so far as the right to the profits is concerned; but it gives this right without allowing the purchaser to disturb the possession of the debtor. This redemption system is a highly artificial plan, devised with care by the Legislature, and introducing new and specific rules in respect to judicial sales. It must be supposed that the Legislature have used legal terms, according to their received legal interpretation.

The phrase "the tenant in possession," is a generic term, intended to designate the class of persons from whom the purchaser was to receive the rents. The language is not that, when a tenant of the debtor is in possession, the tenant shall pay the purchaser, or that the debtor, when in possession, shall not; but the phraseology designed, evidently, to fix a general right, applying to all cases of tenancy, for none are excluded.

It is not very easy to see the reason for such a distinction as that contended for. It would give but little help to the purchaser, since the debtor, on the eve of judgment, might change a possession of tenancy, and take possession personally; or change the terms of tenancy so as to make of little or no value the purchaser's right; and why should a debtor be any more inhibited from getting profit from rent than getting profit from use—in this case, from authorizing other persons to sell water, and selling it himself? The definition of "tenant in possession" embraces, within the natural and usual meaning of the words, a judgment debtor as well as his lessee. The owner in fee in possession is no less, in legal contemplation, a tenant, than the man who occupies under him. The definition of tenant is, "one that holds or possesses lands or tenements by any kind of title, either in fee, for life, years, or at will."

Harris v. Reynolds.

---

The rule of construction of statutes is plain. Where they make use of words and phrases of a well-known and definite sense in the law, they are to be received and expounded in the same sense in the statute. (United States v. McGill, 1 Wash. C. C. 463; Adams v. Turrentine, 8 Ire. 149; State v. Smith, 5 Hump. 396; Ex parte Vincent, 26 Ala. 145.)

The concluding words of the section of the statute we are considering lends some strength to the construction we give; for, after providing for the recovery of the rents of the property sold, the words "or the value of the use and occupation" are added; these latter words applying to, and covering, the case of the possession of the debtor.

If we could see a stronger reason for the distinction insisted on than we have been able to perceive, yet, as the language of the Act is precise, and makes no exception of the judgment debtor, we could not without interpolating a new provision into the statute, include a class of persons fully within the definition, any more than we could include a class not embraced by its terms.

The only other question is as to the remedy. It is argued that, conceding the plaintiff's right, a bill in equity of this sort is not the appropriate means of relief. But we think otherwise. The defendants being in possession of this property, were Trustees for the plaintiff. The profits consisted of many sales and transactions, requiring the settlement of a long and complicated account, which could not well be settled at law; besides, many other equitable circumstances exist here—the alleged insolvency of defendants; the partial conversion of the fund; the threatened loss of it; the interest of other parties requiring adjustment and settlement. The further fact that Reynolds was the Treasurer of the ditch company into whose hands the installments due on the interest sold as his came, is also of force in showing the propriety of this remedy. The whole bill, however, might well rest on these facts, that the defendants were merely Trustees of this fund for the plaintiff, and that the fund was in danger of loss; and these facts would uphold the power of chancery to protect the trust property.

Decree affirmed.

---

INDIAN CAÑON ROAD CO. v. ROBINSON et al.

Neither the general Incorporation Act, nor the Act of May 12th, 1853, concerning plank roads and turnpikes, gives any exclusive privileges to the corporation first established. Others may build a road, on or near the same line of travel.

The general doctrine in the United States now is, that the grant of a ferry, bridge, or road franchise, does not carry with it a restriction upon the granting power to make a similar grant to other grantees, though the last grant necessarily interferes with the profits and business of the first.

APPEAL from the Eleventh District.

For case, see opinion. The Court below sustained a demurrer for want of facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. Plaintiff appeals.

P. H. Sibley, for Respondent.

BALDWIN, J. delivered the opinion of the Court — TERRY, C. J. concurring.

The plaintiff claims to be a corporation, organized under the general statute of this State, passed May 12th, 1853, touching turnpike roads. The purpose of the corporation was to construct a turnpike road between the towns of Iowa Hill and Wisconsin Hill, in Placer County. The plaintiff complains that the defendants have threatened, and are going on to carry into execution the purpose of building another road of like character between the same points, and that the line of the road of defendants is near that of plaintiff and will take the same travel and custom, of which plaintiff claims the monopoly.

The plaintiffs, on these facts, pray an injunction.

This was refused by the Judge of the Eleventh District; and, we think, rightly. The point presented, most favorably stated for Appellant, is simply this: Does the grant of the franchise to the plaintiff exclude the right of all others to build a road on or near the same line? The old doctrine was as is now contended for. But the modern doctrine is to the contrary. Since the case of Charles River Bridge v. Warren Bridge et al. (11 Pet. 421,) the rule on this subject in the United States, as generally recognized, is that the grant of a ferry, bridge, or road franchise, does not carry with it a restriction upon the granting power to make a similar grant to other grantees, though the last grant necessarily interferes with the profits and business of the first.

---

---

The whole subject is thoroughly discussed in the case of Charles River Bridge v. Warren Bridge, (11 Pet. 421,) and in Dyer v. Tuskaloosa Bridge Company, (2 Porter, Ala. 296,) and the principle may now be considered so well settled, that it would be an affection of learning to parade the authorities.

Under our corporation law, respecting roads, etc. it never was intended to give to the company first organized for the construction of a road an absolute monopoly of all the travel along the line of the route. The consequences of such a doctrine would be startling. Some enterprising company might lay out a road between two prominent points in the mountain or other counties, and claim a perpetual monopoly of all the travel done along the line, however extended that line might be, or however large the travel. While the public interest requires the protection of capital in all the enterprises into which it may enter, the public safety requires, also, that all the leading highways or avenues of communication between towns and counties should not be monopolized by a few men who may have been more enterprising than the rest in first seizing upon the lines of communication. While the road of the plaintiff could not be trespassed upon, yet a parallel line of communication may be constructed by others, acting under the same general authority as that of the plaintiff.

Neither the general Act of Incorporation, nor the special Act to authorize the formation of corporations for the construction of plank or turnpike roads, (C. L. 291,) gives any exclusive privileges to such corporations to take all the travel upon the line. Even where such corporations have been chartered by express Act of the Legislature, it has been held that such an Act is not in the nature of an exclusive grant of all the travel between the termini. The question in respect to roads is somewhat different from that in respect to ferries and bridges; for, in respect to these, the law forbids even a license or grant by the Board of Supervisors of the county within a mile of that granted, except in certain contingencies. But here there is nothing of the kind. The evident intent of the Legislature was to leave this business open to individual or corporate enterprise. As many roads may be made between the same points, as capital can be found to make, and made by individuals, if they own, or can obtain the right of way, as well as by incorporated companies, so long as the property or possession of one is not invaded by the other.

Understanding this to be the case made by the bill, we affirm the judgment of the District Court.

WHITE v. FRATT, MORGAN, STANFORD, et al.

A BILL, quæ Hæret, and to enforce the specific execution of an agreement, lies only where there is no adequate remedy at law. But where the damages, resulting from the breach of such agreement, are susceptible of precise admeasurement, equity will not take jurisdiction, unless there are some peculiar equitable circumstances.

Where an indemnity bond is given to a Sheriff to hold him harmless, and pay any judgment which may be rendered against him by reason of his seizure of certain property, his remedy at law on the bond is clear for the amount of any such judgment, whether he be solvent or not, or whether his official sureties could be held or not, and a bill in equity will not lie.

Where a Sheriff seizes goods on two attachments in behalf of different plaintiffs, and the property being claimed by a third person, the plaintiffs in the attachment suits execute to the Sheriff separate indemnifying bonds, there is no joint liability between the plaintiffs to the Sheriff. Each bond must be sued on as an independent obligation.

Whether each obligor is liable to the Sheriff for the whole amount of any judgment against him, leaving the question of contribution to be settled between them; Quæry.

Where a bill in equity shows on its face that plaintiff is not entitled to relief, the defect may be taken advantage of in the Appellate Court, even though no demurrer be filed.

APPEAL from the Sixth District.

For facts see opinion. The Court below decreed that defendants, Schwartz & Bosler, and Stanford, pay to Wood, according to the prayer of the bill, their proportionate share of the balance due on Wood's judgment. Schwartz & Bosler having already paid one thousand five hundred and thirty-two dollars, there was due Wood one thousand six hundred and thirty-one dollars and sixty-one cents; and of this sum the Court decreed Stanford should pay one thousand and twenty-three dollars and thirty-one cents, and S. & B. one hundred and seven dollars. Stanford alone appeals.

Clark & Gass, for Appellant.

Bill in equity does not lie in this case, the plaintiff having an adequate remedy at law. Besides, the plaintiff avers his insolvency; and hence he cannot lose, and has no right to relief.

---

White s. Pratt.

---

(Champion v. Brown, 6 Johns. Ch. 404, 405.) A bill of peace will not lie, when the rights and responsibilities of the several parties neither arise from, nor depend upon, nor are in any way connected with, each other. Nor will a bill quia timet lie, unless the plaintiff may be subjected to loss, by the neglect, inadvertence, or culpability, of another. (Randolph's Adm'r v. Kenney et als. 3 Randolph, 394.)

Wallace & Rayle, for Respondent.

1. Defendant concedes the equity of the bill by failing to demur.
2. This is a proper case for specific performance. (1 Ver. 189; 6 Johns. Ch. 398; 2 Story Eq. Jurisp. 35, 36, and cases cited.)

BALDWIN, J. delivered the opinion of the Court — TERRY, C. J. concurring.

This was a bill, filed by the plaintiff, in which he avers that he was Sheriff of Sacramento County, on the 8th September, 1857. That, on that day, Schwartz & Bosler sued out an attachment, against Bullard & Son, for six hundred and twenty-four dollars, and placed it in the hands of plaintiff, as Sheriff; and that on the 10th September, 1857, defendant, Stanford, put in plaintiff's hands an attachment against the same Bullard & Son, for three hundred and seventy-two dollars; that the Sheriff executed these writs in their order of precedence as to time; when defendant, Wood, served a notice on the Sheriff, that he was the owner of the property, and demanded its surrender and return. On this, plaintiff notified these creditors of this demand, and requested an indemnifying bond, whereupon the defendants, Fratt and Morgan, for, and on behalf of, Schwartz & Bosler, executed a bond or undertaking of indemnity, in the usual form; and Stanford, on his own account, also executed a bond of indemnity. The bill further charges that judgment in both these attachment cases has been rendered, and that executions issued on them, a sale of the property had, and the money arising therefrom, paid over, viz: Schwartz & Bosler, six hundred and seventy-one dollars and thirty-one cents, and L. Stanford, three hundred and ninety-one dollars and eighty-three cents; that after the execution of these bonds, Wood instituted an action in the District Court of the Sixth District, and in January, 1858, judgment was had against the plaintiff and Schwartz & Bosler for two thousand four hundred and fifty dollars, and forty two dollars costs. On this judgment, execution was issued and returned "unsatisfied," for want of property. The bill avers that he has requested and demanded of Fratt and Morgan, and Stanford, to comply with the terms and conditions of their undertaking, and pay the judgment to Wood, but they have refused; that he, the plaintiff, is wholly insolvent, and cannot pay off the judgment; that, therefore, he has no remedy at law on the bond, thus exposing himself and his sureties, on his official bond, liable to be harrassed. The prayer is that these parties be decreed to pay this judgment.

The undertaking of Stanford is different in form from that of Schwartz & Bosler. The instrument, after reciting the premises, says: "I agree to save harmless the said White, and to pay any judgment or judgments which may be rendered against him by reason, or in consequence, of the levy of said attachment first aforesaid, or the sale of said goods under said execution."

This is a bill quia timet, and to enforce the specific execution of this agreement. The ground of the interference of chancery in such cases is, that there is no other adequate remedy. If a plain, speedy, unembarrassed, remedy exists at law, equity will not interpose. As a general rule, chancery will not interfere in cases sounding in damages. But there are exceptions to the rule; as where there was a contract for the sale of a large quantity of iron, to be paid for in a certain number of years, by installments, a specific performance was decreed, (3 Atk. 384; 1 Sim. & Stu. 607); and so of contracts for the delivery of certain timber at specified periods. (3 Atk. 383.) But in those cases, the jurisdiction is put on the ground that compensation in damages would not afford a full, complete, and satisfactory, remedy, and it is denied when this is attainable at law. And the jurisdiction attaches also in cases of apprehended injury, as by sureties, etc. where no loss has as yet followed. (2 Story's Eq. 35.) It has been held, in analogy to this last principle, that in cases of a general covenant to indemnify, although sounding in damages, equity will decree specific performance. Of this class of cases is Ranelough v. Hayes, 1 Vernon, 189; and Champion v. Brown, 6 Johns. Ch. 398; and Chamberlain v. Blue, 6 Blackf. 491, maintains the same principle. But we have not been able to find any case, where the damages resulting from a breach of a personal contract are susceptible of precise admeasurement, in the absence of some peculiar equitable circumstances, in which specific performance has been decreed. The general principle, which lies at the foundation of this jurisdiction, seems to ignore the existence of such a remedy.

The question arises, what would be the measure of the plaintiff's recovery for the breach of Stanford's obligation? It has been seen that the condition is to pay any judgment against White, recovered in consequence of the levy of Stanford's attachment, etc. For a breach of this duty of paying the judgment, when notified, if notice be necessary—what is the measure of Stanford's liability? We think very clearly that it is the amount of the judgment. We do not think that it is important whether White was solvent, or insolvent; or whether his official sureties could be held, or not. If a man sells his property, or contracts with another, on good consideration, that the latter shall pay his debt—for a breach of the obligation, the measure of damages would be the amount. The law supposes in such a case, that the payment of the debt is equivalent in value to the debtor to so much money in hand.

There have been great conflicts of decisions, and much discussion as to the measure of recovery in actions upon contracts for general indemnity and agreements for protection from general and specific liability. The New York cases are conflicting upon this subject. But the doubt and difficulty have arisen from the terms of the instrument—whether they imported a specific duty of protecting the party indemnified from a loss or the cause of it, or only amounted to a guaranty of reimbursement upon a payment by the indemnified. (Churchhill v. Hunt, 3 Denio, 321,) is a leading case. There the bond was to save harmless and indemnify the obligee against his liability as the maker of a promissory note, then held by a third person, and to pay the same, or cause it to be paid. It was held that the obligee might, without having paid anything, recover the amount of the note against the obligor upon the failure to pay the holder. The case was fully argued. The Court say: "The plaintiffs were undoubtedly entitled to recover the amount of the note and interest thereon;

White v. Pratt.

---

for to that extent the condition of the bond was express and absolute. (Post v. Jackson, 17 Johnson, 239, and authorities there referred to; In the matter of Negus, 7 Wend. 499.)

Thomas v. Allen, (1 Hill, 145,) is to the same effect.

These cases are very similar in the facts, and identical in principle with this case.

There was no obstacle to the plaintiff's recovery at law, and for precisely the same sum for which the defendant is responsible here, if the plaintiff were entitled to recover at all; and the rules governing the contract, and the defendant's liability on it, are precisely the same in law and equity.

It is true that other parties are joined in the suit, and a kind of joint liability sought to be created. But we do not see very clearly how this can be done. Stanford did not contract jointly with these other defendants. He is to be held on his own contract — not theirs; and, unquestionably, upon ascertained facts, the law affixes a definite measure of recovery to his liability. Whatever the equities, or rights, or liabilities, of these different obligors may be inter sese — a matter we cannot here decide — it is very clear that each of them, on his separate instrument, sustains his own independent position towards the plaintiff. It may possibly be that each is responsible to the plaintiff to the full amount of this entire judgment — leaving the question of contribution to be settled between them, or they may show that the measure of recovery is different on a trial of the whole case; but, as the plaintiff states his case, Stanford is either liable for the judgment, or not at all.

We cannot settle these questions, as, besides their difficulty, a case of great importance is now pending before us, in which they are directly presented; and it is not at all necessary to a decision of this case that we should now decide them.

This appeal is taken by Stanford alone, and it is enough to pass upon his case.

The ground here taken was not taken by demurrer. But this was not necessary; for, in an equity case, when the plaintiff's case as made by his will, shows that he has no title to the relief, this is an incurable infirmity which follows the case everywhere, and no decree can be affirmed which is shown by the bill to be erroneous in substance.

SWIFT v. KRAEMER *et al.

R, AN unmarried man, executed two mortgages upon a lot of land. Subsequently he marries, and then executes a new mortgage to persons who pay off the first mortgages upon their being released. The release of the old, and the execution of the new, mortgage, were on the same day. The wife did not sign the new mortgage. Held, that, in equity, the transaction is an assignment of the first mortgages in consideration of the money advanced by the second mortgagees; not the creation of a new incumbrance, but changing the form of the old.

In such case, neither R, nor a purchaser of the property from him after the death of the wife, can hold it free of the second mortgage.

APPEAL from the Twelfth District.

Bill in equity for an injunction.

John Revalk being the owner of certain property situate in San Francisco, on the twenty-eighth day of June, 1854, executed a note and mortgage for two thousand dollars, to Lorenzo Leck and Louis Fontacelli. On the nineteenth day of July, 1854, Revalk executed another note and mortgage on same property for fifteen hundred dollars to Respondent, Charles Kraemer; both of which mortgages were recorded on the day of their respective dates. On the _____ day of September, 1854, Revalk married; and from that day forward resided with his wife upon the mortgaged property. On the eleventh day of December, 1854, the mortgagees, Leck, Fontacelli, and Kraemer, surrendered their notes to Revalk, and executed releases of their respective mortgages, and on the same day, Revalk, alone, executed a mortgage to Respondents, Kraemer and Eisenhardt, to secure the payment of a promissory note of four thousand dollars, money loaned on that day to take up the two first mortgages. Respondents subsequently brought their action against Revalk to foreclose the last mentioned mortgage. Revalk appeared, admitted the execution of the note and mortgage, but claimed the premises as his homestead. The Court decreed the whole premises to be sold, with the exception of a small portion set apart as the homestead, from which decision Revalk appealed to this Court, but the appeal was dismissed at the July Swift v. Kraemer.

Term, 1857, on the ground that "the judgment in this case did not affect either Revalk or his wife, so far as the question of a homestead was concerned, and he alone had no right to appeal."

On the tenth day of October, 1856, the wife of Revalk died, leaving no issue. On the twentieth day of October, 1856, Revalk, for a valuable consideration, conveyed the premises in question, to Fox. And on the twenty-ninth day of October, 1857, Fox, for a like consideration, conveyed the same property to plaintiff.

Respondents, subsequent to the dismissal of Revalk's appeal, issued their order of sale, and on the seventh day of December, 1857, were about to sell the premises, when plaintiff, the then and present owner, brought his action, and enjoined the Sheriff's sale, on the ground that said sale, though void and conveying to the purchaser no title, would cast a cloud upon plaintiff's title, and otherwise do him irreparable injury.

On hearing, the Court dissolved the injunction, and decided that the mortgage of Revalk to Respondents, dated December 11th, 1854, was a lien on said premises to the extent of thirty-five hundred dollars, being the continuation of two prior mortgages executed by said Revalk before his marriage, and before any homestead right accrued—and for which sum and interest, from the eleventh of December, 1855, at the rate of two per cent. per month, judgment was entered on the tenth day of November, 1858.

Plaintiff excepted generally to the parol evidence offered by defendant, as to the time and circumstances of the execution of the releases, and of the new mortgage.

Plaintiff appeals.

Pixley & Smith, for Appellants.

I. The questions of homestead in this property have been decided by this Court. (Kraemer v. Revalk, 8 Cal. 75; Revalk v. Kraemer, Id. 66; Van Reynegan v. Revalk, Id. 75.)

These decisions are the law of this case. (Dewey v. Gray, 2 Cal. 374.)

II. The mortgage for four thousand dollars to Respondents, dated December 11th, 1854, was not a continuation of the two mortgages, one to Leck and Fontacelli, the other to Kraemer.

---

Swift v. Kraemer.

III. The parol evidence on the subject of these releases was improper. (17 Mass. 325; 4 Bro. Ch. 514; 4 Dorr, 65; 1 Johns. Ch. 429; 6 Hill, 219; 6 Vesey, 334 N.; 3 Stark on Ev. 1009; 3 Mason, 383; 1 Hill, 606; 1 Greenl. Ev. 275; Id. 276-278; 1 Phil. Ev. 549-566; 2 Stark Ev. 544-577; 2 Story's Eq. 3, 15-31.)

IV. A mortgage fairly released under seal, without fraud or mistake, is forever gone as a lien. (Fraser v. Inslee, 1 Greenl. Ch. R. 242; Sarewood v. Eldrich, 2 Id. 145; Wade v. Howard, 6 Pick. 492; In matter of Coster, 2 Johns. Ch. R. 502; Belding v. Manly, 21 Vt. 556; Lewis v. Starke, 10 Sm. & Mar. 128; Poylts v. Clark, 5 Pet. 480; Sugden on Vendors, Vol. 3, 438; Parry v. Wright, 1 Sim. & St. 369; Brown v. Stead, 5 Sim. 536; Stevens v. Godfrey, 4 Ship. 478; Phelan v. Olney, 6 Cal. 478; Taylor v. Bassett, 3 N. H. 298.)

V. The payment being made upon the same day that the mortgage in question was executed, does not make this payment and execution simultaneous transactions. (4 Kent's Com. 38, 39.)

VI. Recitals in a deed bind all parties to the deed, except where fraud, accident, or mistake, is shown to have occurred; therefore, Respondents cannot question the releases. (5 Ham. 194; 7 Id. 227.) The releases themselves disclose the intention, and they cannot be inquired into by reference to matters aliunde.

VII. Swift had no notice of Respondent's reserved rights under these mortgages. The notice to Smith (if any) was insufficient to charge Swift, and he is an innocent purchaser without notice.

VIII. Respondents cannot be substituted to the rights of all the prior mortgagees, for the reason that Leck & Fontacelli are not parties to this action, and Eisenhardt had no privity with either of the other mortgagees. (Taylor v. Bassett, 3 N. Hamp. 298.) The cancellation of the prior mortgage was evidence of the intention to abandon the lien.

Sidney V. Smith, for Respondent.

I. If Revalk and his wife were the Appellants, there could be no doubt as to the correctness of the decree of the Court below.

---

Swift v. Kraemer.

(Dillon v. Byrne, 5 Cal. 455; Birrell v. Schie, 9 Id. 104; Carr v. Caldwell, 10 Id. 380.) The only question is, whether the rule therein laid down extends to Appellant, Swift, who is purchaser of the property after the death of Revalk's wife. The mortgage of Respondents was of record, and imparted notice to Swift. And if it were competent for him to impeach its validity by parol evidence of a homestead, it was just as competent for the Respondents, by the same kind of evidence, to sustain it, which they did, by showing that, by the doctrines of subrogation, it was perfectly valid to the extent of the two prior mortgages, which had been made before any homestead had existed, and to cancel which it had been given. It was the duty of Swift, finding, as he did, a mortgage of four thousand dollars duly recorded, to inquire of the mortgagees as to the character of their claim. (1 Sug. Vendors, 8.) Swift relied on the fact of homestead as proving the mortgage null and void. But its invalidity did not depend alone on that fact. (Carr v. Caldwell, above.)

II. Respondents should have all the security which belonged to the mortgages to which they are subrogated. This action is a bill of review. (2 Barb. Ch. Prac. 90.) And on a bill of review a final decree can be opened and altered so as to make it conform to the justice of the case. (Bennett v. Winter, 2 Johns. Ch. 205.) The Court below not having authorized Respondents to foreclose their mortgage against the whole lot, this Court has the power to correct the decree. (Grayson v. Guild, 4 Cal. 122.)

BALDWIN, J. delivered the opinion of the Court — TERRY, C. J. concurring.

One Revalk, an unmarried man, in 1854, owned a lot in San Francisco; Leck and Fontacelli had a mortgage of two thousand dollars, and Kraemer a mortgage of one thousand five hundred dollars, on this lot. Revalk married in 1857, and, after his marriage, made the mortgage, the validity and effect of which this suit questions. His wife did not join in the mortgage. The consideration of this last mortgage was that Kraemer canceled his prior mortgage of one thousand five hundred dollars and gave five hundred dollars in cash, in addition, to Revalk, and one Eisenhardt paid the prior mortgage of two thousand dollars to Leck and Fontacelli. The release of the old, and the redemption of the new, mortgages, were done on the same day. Revalk's wife died, and Swift, the plaintiff here, purchased the mortgaged premises. He claims now that, as he knew that the property was homestead at the time of the last mortgage, he was a purchaser without notice of any adverse claim, and that he takes the title free of the claim of the mortgagees. We do not think so. So far as the five hundred dollars is concerned, probably, within a recent decision, the husband had no right to incumber the property to that extent. But, as to the debts secured by the original mortgage to Leck and Fontacelli, and Kraemer, we regard the cancellation of the old mortgages and the substitution of the new, as contemporaneous acts. It was not creating a new incumbrance, but simply changing the form of the old. A Court of Equity, looking to the substance of such a transaction, would not permit a release, intended to be effectual only by force of, and for the purpose of, giving effect to the last mortgage, to be set up, even if the last mortgage was inoperative. It would not permit Revalk to take Kraemer and Eisenhardt's money and apply it in extinguishment of a prior incumbrance, and then claim that the property should neither be bound by the new mortgage or the old. These last mortgagees would be, in equity, assignees of the debts they paid, and be subrogated to the rights of their assignors; for, in equity, the substance of the transaction would be an assignment of the old mortgages in consideration of the money advanced. This, in effect, has been held in Dillon v. Byrne, 5 Cal. 455; Birrell v. Schie, 9 Id. 106; Carr v. Caldwell, 10 Id. 380.

Nor does Swift stand in any better position than Revalk himself. Swift can only claim that he bought with notice of a parol fact — not that he was the purchaser of an apparent legal title, and ignorant of any better title or equity. In other words, he bought with knowledge of the fact, which seemed to show a title in Revalk and wife. But this fact may be explained. What existed in parol might have been explained by parol. The mortgage on record was, at least, sufficient to lead him to inquiry, and then he was bound to make full inquiry. That would have resulted in information as to the true state of things. But we are not aware that it has ever been held that a party is estopped except by his own act or deed, or that of his privies. Revalk's posseesion of the premises, with his wife, was no estoppel of Kraemer to show that the premises were not homestead. If they seemed to be, from the fact of this family occupancy, and Swift bought on the strength of this appearance, he took the risk of this appearance turning out to be the reality; and, if he was deceived, it is one of the unfortunate blunders common to all speculation.

The decision of this Court in the numerous cases of Revalk touching this property, make nothing for the Appellant, for this question was not involved in those cases; and facts are not settled by judicial precedents, but only questions of law.

and equity interferes to prevent a multiplicity of suits. 3. The taxes raised each year are for specific purposes, and are held in trust by the Common Council, and equity will compel the proper application of the fund. We seek not to interfere with the Common Council in the exercise of its legislative functions, but to prevent the Mayor and Treasurer acting under an unconstitutional ordinance. (15 Barb. 213-264; 13 Id. 567; 16 Id. 392; 24 Id. 187; 12 How. Pr. R. 496; 3 Id. 441; 3 Edw. Ch. R. 421; 22 Conn. 552; 1 Barb. Ch. Pr. 640; 6 Paige Ch. 88.)

II. Municipal corporations have no power or authority, except what is expressly granted by their charters. (Low v. City of Marysville, 5 Cal. 2-14; Angell & Ames on Cor. 97; 13 Mass. 271; 2 Denio, 110; 4 Pet. 164; 2 Cal. 524.) That clause in the charter authorizing the Common Council "to make appropriations for any object of city expenditure," must be limited to those particular objects which are specified in Sec. 7 of the charter, and which are purely of a municipal character. (5 Cal. 214; 13 Mass. 278; 22 Conn. 552; 2 Denio, 110; 4 Pet. 170.) If money is required for any other than the ordinary purposes, it must be raised by an extraordinary tax, sanctioned by a vote of the citizens. (City Charter, Sec. 16.)

The Council were not authorized to employ any person to assist the City Attorney, or to perform his duties. (3 Cal. 122; Charter, Sec. 39; 12 Mo. 446.)

BALDWIN, J. delivered the opinion of the Court — TERRY, C. J. concurring.

This was a bill filed by the plaintiff, a tax payer of Sacramento City, to restrain the payment of five thousand dollars, appropriated by the late city authorities to Alpheus Felch, as a fee for contesting before the Supreme Court of the United States, the title of John A. Sutter, to lands within the limits of the city.

Leaving out minor questions, the principal point on which the case turns, is, whether the Common Council had power to pass this ordinance.

The charter authorizes the City Council "to make by-laws and ordinances, not repugnant to the Constitution and laws of the United States, or of this State; to make appropriations for objects of city expenditure; to purchase, receive, and hold, for the use of the city, real and personal estate; and to pass such other by-laws and ordinances for the regulation of said city as they may deem necessary."

---

---

It seems to be conceded that the city claimed certain real estate within the municipal limits which might be injuriously affected by the litigation in question.

We are not aware of any well recognized rule of construction which goes to the extent of holding that under a general provision like this, the power of protecting the interests of the city by the employment of counsel, is denied to the city authorities. The legal protection of the property may be as much involved in procuring competent Attorneys, or counsel, as in paying the costs and expenses of defending actions brought for the recovery of its real or personal property. We apprehend if a delinquent Treasurer escaped with the money of the city to San Francisco, the city would be authorized under the old charter, to employ Attorneys there to recover the money; or if bonds of the city had been improperly sent to New York for sale, that the authorities might employ a lawyer there to restrain their negotiation. The duty of protecting the public property carries along with it the duty to employ the usual means of protecting it. Legal assistance stands, as a means for the protection of property, in direct relation to the general power to hold, acquire, preserve, and protect it. There is no difference in this respect between one sort of protection and another, between the charge of the lawyer and the charge of the Clerk, between laying out money to buy a safe to keep the money in, and laying out money to employ a lawyer to recover the money improperly withheld. It is true, the charter provides that an attorney shall be elected by the people to attend to the business of the city; but this does not prevent the employment of other counsel when it is impossible for the Attorney of the city to discharge the required duty. Nor is it important that the suit was one in which the United States was nominally or beneficially a party. The interest of the city would be the same in securing a peculiar and particular attention to the litigation as if she were the sole party contesting with the claimant of the property.

We say nothing here of the policy, or justice, or motive, of this act.

Findla v. City of San Francisco.

---

It is urged with great force that the tax-payers have been made by this ordinance to pay out of their own property for clouding and defeating its title. If this claim involved only a contest between two sets of titles, represented nearly equally by the people of the city, unquestionably such partial and oppressive procedure as would tax one-half for the benefit of the other half, and make the former contribute the means to destroy their own titles, would be so flagrant an abuse of power in the representatives of all, as to call for the restraining powers of the Courts.

But the case is not so presented. As it stands here, it professes to be the mere effort of the city authorities, who were the Trustees of the city property, to protect the true estate, by an expenditure which seems to us to be within the limits of their power. Whether they should have exercised it is another question. That is a question of legislative expediency, with which we have nothing to do.

Judgment reversed, and cause remanded for a new trial.

FINDLA v. CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO.

THE Ayuntamiento of San Francisco, in 1850, by an order, authorised its Alcalde to grant to plaintiff "a quantity of land, in conformity with the survey of the town, as near as possible to the location of" certain other lots which plaintiff was to surrender to the town. The Alcalde accordingly conveyed, by deed, to plaintiff, a lot which had been previously granted by the town to one Gerke. Held, That an action for the breach of covenants of warranty in this deed will not lie against the city.

The true meaning of the order is, that the Alcalde was to grant the city's land only, and neither the town nor its successor is bound for an act done beyond the limit of its authority.

Whether a city can bind itself by a contract purporting to dispose of property to which it has no claim; quæry.

APPEAL from the Fourth District.

The defendant demurred to the complaint, as set forth in the opinion, that it did not contain facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. The demurrer was sustained, and plaintiff appeals.

Waller & Moore, for Appellant.

F. P. Tracy, for Respondent.

Findla v. City of San Francisco.

---

BALDWIN, J. delivered the opinion of the Court — TERRY, C. J. concurring.

The complaint in this singular case sets out, that about the 18th of March, 1850, the Ayuntamiento, or Town Council of San Francisco, then a pueblo, made an order authorizing the Alcalde, J. W. Geary, to receive back certain grants of lots, made to the plaintiff by the authorities of the town, in September, 1848, to cancel them, and to grant to plaintiff, in lieu thereof, an equal quantity of land in conformity with the survey of the town, as near the location of the former lots as could be given.

Geary, acting, or professing to act, as Alcalde, made a deed under this order, to the plaintiff, for a lot, which had before been conveyed to one Gerke; and it is for a supposed breach of the implied covenants of warranty in this deed that this suit is brought.

But the Respondent's counsel reply to this complaint that it shows no cause of action, for the true meaning of the order is, that the officer of the city was only authorized to grant the city's land, and not Gerke's land; and, therefore, neither the town nor its successor is bound for an act done beyond the limit of its authority. Indeed, it would be very questionable whether the town itself, under the power to dispose of its own property, could bind itself by a contract purporting to dispose of property to which it had no claim. But, certainly, when it authorizes its agent to make a deed for its own land, that authority does not impart to the agent a right to bind it to convey or warrant the title to a lot belonging to a stranger.

Thus, it has been held in Mississippi, in several cases, that where a Commissioner, under an order of sale from the Probate Court to sell real estate of the intestate, sold land not belonging to it, the sale was void as exceeding the authority of the agent, and the notes given for the purchase-money not recoverable.

The demurrer was properly sustained.

Judgment affirmed.

 Whitney v. Buckman.

---

WHITNEY v. BUCKMAN.

THAT property mortgaged is so indefinitely described as not to pass title by sale on foreclosure, is no objection to the enforcement of the mortgage against the mortgagor.

Where the description was, that "certain tract or parcel of land situated in said county of Napa, consisting of a pre-emption claim of one hundred and sixty acres, and commonly known as the 'Soda Springs,' and embracing the said springs, and the improvements thereunto belonging, and being about five miles from Napa City, in a northerly direction, together with all and singular the tenements," etc.; Held, to be prima facie sufficient.

The right to a pre-emption in public land is not assignable; but the possession of public land, whether taken for the purpose of getting a pre-emption right, or any other purpose, or the land itself, may be mortgaged; and if the mortgagee gets no title through the mortgage, this is not an objection to be raised by the man who makes it.

If a mortgage under seal expressly declares and recites an indebtedness, this is sufficient evidence of the indebtedness in a foreclosure suit. No law requires any note, bond, or the like, in addition to such a mortgage.

An affidavit by defendant, in effect acknowledging the debt for which suit is brought, is admissible in evidence for plaintiff, though made in a former suit between the parties. And although the affidavit was unnecessary, still, this being an equity case, defendant cannot complain that plaintiff proved his case too clearly, or introduced redundant testimony, because the mortgage was uncontradicted and conclusively established the debt.

Errors in the computation of interest should be corrected by motion, in the Court below.

APPEAL from the Seventh District.

Bill to foreclose a mortgage executed by defendant to Sullivan & Allen, and by them assigned to plaintiff. The mortgage runs, that the defendant, "for and in consideration of the sum of ten thousand dollars, to him, defendant, in hand paid by the parties of the second part, Sullivan & Allen, doth grant, bargain, sell, and confirm, unto the said parties of the second part, etc. all the undivided one-half of all that certain tract or parcel of land situated in said county of Napa, consisting of a pre-emption claim of one hundred and sixty acres, and commonly known as the 'Soda Springs,' and embracing the said springs and the improvements thereunto belonging, and being about five miles from Napa City, in a northerly direction, together with all and singular the tenements," etc.

"This conveyance is intended as a mortgage to secure the payment of ten thousand dollars, payable two years from date, with interest at the rate of two per cent. per month, interest payable annually, and if not paid at the expiration of the first year, to be added to, and become a part of, the principal, and thereafter to bear the same rate of interest."

Whitney v. Buckman.

---

To this complaint the defendant demurred: 1. Statute of Limitations. 2. Insufficient allegations to constitute a cause of action.

The Court overruled the demurrer, and defendant filed his answer verified, containing: 1st. A general denial of every allegation in the complaint, except the execution of the mortgage. 2d. A special denial of any indebtedness or consideration whatever for said mortgage. 3d. A denial of any promise by defendant to pay said sum of ten thousand dollars, or any part thereof. 4th. The Statute of Limitations.

Upon the trial, plaintiff offered in evidence, the mortgage with the assignment to him; an affidavit of defendant made by him for the purpose of obtaining a discharge of an attachment levied upon his property at the instance of the plaintiff in another action; and a letter from defendant to E. L. Sullivan, both, in effect, acknowledging this mortgage debt.

Plaintiff rested.

Whereupon defendant moved the Court to dismiss plaintiff's bill, upon the following grounds:

1st. Because the mortgage is upon a pre-emption claim, and is therefore null and void.

2d. Because it does not describe the lands either by metes and bounds, or any other such description as would enable the Court to enter a decree of sale thereof; nor does the complaint contain any better description or location of the same. Neither has plaintiff attempted to locate said land by testimony, or to show that the land by the name of "Soda Springs," has any existence or location in fact, or that there are any boundaries whatever to the same.

3d. Because there is no proof of any consideration for the execution of said mortgage, other than the recital in said complaint and mortgage, defendant in his answer having plead want of consideration, under oath.

4th. Because plaintiff has failed to show the existence of any debt whatever.

5th. Because if there was any debt existing at the time of the execution of the mortgage, more than two years having elapsed before the commencement of the action, plaintiff was precluded from recovering.

6th. Because plaintiff having failed to prove a transfer of the debt, a transfer of the mortgage alone, conferred no right of action on the plaintiff.

 Whitney v. Buckman.

---

The Court overruled the motion, and entered judgment for plaintiff.

Defendant appeals.

Langdon, Hopkins & Pond, for Appellant.

1. The mortgage contained no sufficient description of the premises. 2. The mortgage of a pre-emption claim is null and void. (7 Smedes & Marsh. 234; Act of Congress, March 3d, 1853; Act of March 1st, 1854.) Under this Act, this mortgage is also void, because under the Act of Congress, 1841, Sec. 12, "all assignments and transfers of the right hereby secured, prior to the issuing of the patent shall be null and void." (Brislois v. Sibley et al. 1 Minn. 230; Dillingham v. Fisher, 5 Wis. 475; Hudson v. Milner, 12 Ala. 659.)

A. Thomas, for Respondent.

1. A bond or covenant to pay, is not essential to a mortgage. (4 Kent, 145; King v. King, 3 P. Wm. 358; Mellar v. Lees, 2 Atk. 494; Elder v. Rose, 15 Wend. 218; 10 Id. 675; 2 Bac. Abr. 279; 2 Cow. 536; 1 Chitty, 101, 102, 299, 346; Congor v. Lancaster, 6 Yerg. 477; McCarty v. Beach, 10 Cal. 461; Tartar v. Hall, 3 Id. 263; Chitty, 101, 102, 299, 346.)

2. Defendant is estopped from setting up that the mortgage is void, because of insufficient description, or because it is upon a pre-emption claim. (3 Cal. 263; 4 Id. 247; Houseman v. Chase et al. 12 Id.)

BALDWIN, J. delivered the opinion of the Court — TERRY, C. J. concurring.

There are no merits in this appeal, either in justice or in law.

1. If the property is indefinitely described, so that no title could pass from the sale on foreclosure, this defect is as much the fault of the maker as the taker of the mortgage; and it is no just objection on the part of the mortgagor, that the mortgagee has got, or will get, nothing from the security. We think, however, the property prima facie is sufficiently described.

2. There is nothing in the fact that this is public land. We have recognized the title, resting on possession in public land, in cases innumerable; all the ditch and mining claims in the State rest on the same basis. The mortgage does not pretend to transfer to the mortgagee the right to a pre-emption; this is not assignable, but the possession of public land, whether taken for the purpose of getting a pre-emption right, or any other purpose, may be mortgaged, or the land itself; and if the mortgagee gets no title through the mortgage, this is not an objection to be raised by the man who makes it.

---

Whitney v. Buckman.

---

3. The mortgage expressly recites and declares an indebtedness. This is evidence, under the seal of the party, that there existed that indebtedness, at least for the purpose of the foreclosure of the security, unless, indeed, we should hold that if a man says, in a casual conversation, he owes another money, that declaration is evidence of the debt; but if he solemnly asserts it under seal, it is not. The mortgage does not show that any separate paper evidencing the debt — as a note or bond — was ever executed; and we know of no authority which requires it.

4. The affidavit and letter of defendant, acknowledging, in effect, the debt, though unnecessary, were admissible; but the evidence was conclusive without these proofs, and the defendant, in an equity case, cannot complain that his adversary proved his case too clearly, or introduced redundant testimony, when there is no contradiction of that which sufficiently establishes the fact. If the proof were wholly inadmissible in such a case as this — the mortgage uncontradicted establishing conclusively the debt — we should not reverse for the cause assigned.

5. The Statute of Limitations had nothing to do with the case. The mortgage shows a debt due within the statute period.

6. If there was error in the computation of interest, the defendant should have moved to correct it below. But we are not satisfied there was such error. If we were, we would not be disposed to correct the decree on account of it, but should permit it to stand, leaving the excess over the proper amount to go as compensation to the Respondent on account of this appeal.

Decree affirmed.

CITY OF OAKLAND v. CARPENTIER et al.

CHARTERS of corporations are special grants of power. The corporation has no powers except those expressly given, or which are necessary to the exercise of those expressly given.

The powers delegated by the government to municipal corporations, are trusts, not subject to be delegated by the corporations.

Under the Act of 1852, incorporating the town of Oakland, the corporate and municipal powers were lodged in a Board of Trustees. The Board had power "to lay out, make, open, widen, regulate, and keep in repair, all streets, bridges, ferries, public places, and grounds, wharfs, docks, piers, slips, sewers, and alleys, and to authorize the construction of the same." Under this clause the Board, by ordinance, gave defendant the exclusive privilege of laying out, establishing, constructing, and regulating, wharfs, etc. within the city, for thirty-seven years. Held, that the ordinance was void, as being a transfer of the corporate powers of the Board; and that the present city of Oakland, being the successor in law of the town of Oakland, can come into equity to have the ordinance declared void, and the wharfs, etc. held by defendants thereunder, delivered up.

Where the charter of a city vests the corporate powers in a "Board of Trustees to consist of five members, who shall be elected," etc. and the law provides, that "at all meetings of the Board a majority of the Trustees shall constitute a quorum to do business," a majority of those elected can organize and act at the first meeting, as well as at any subsequent meeting.

If defendant, by conspiracy with others, procured them and himself to be elected to the Board of Trustees, for the purpose of defrauding the town of this property and these franchises, for his benefit, the whole transaction is illegal.

And if defendant, as member elect of the Board, neither resigning nor qualifying, took advantage of his position to advance his personal interests, at the expense of those of the corporation, it was a fraud for which equity will hold him responsible.

Nor would a ratification by a subsequent Board, fraudulently elected by defendant's efforts, validate the transaction.

The statute of limitations would not begin to run until after the election of a new and innocent Board.

An equitable action to set aside a fraudulent deed of real estate, when the effect would be to restore the possession to the defrauded party, is an action for the recovery of real estate, and governed by the Statute of Limitations applicable to such actions.

APPEAL from the Third District.

Thompson, Irving & Pate, for Appellant.

1. The deed and ordinances were void, because five trustees were elected, and only four qualified. If the Board was first legally constituted by the election and qualification of five members, as required by law, (Act May, 1850,) then a majority could perform any official duty; not otherwise. (Leonard v. Darling-ton, 6 Cal. 123.) Hence, these deeds and ordinances are void. Where a deed, upon its face, purports to be executed in conformity to law, and the want of authority to execute it does not appear upon the deed, then the Court will declare the deed fraudulent and void, and will direct its cancellation or a reconveyance. (See 2 Story's Eq. 694: 1 Newland on Contracts, Ch. 94, p. 493; 1 Story's Eq. 91.)

---

City of Oakland v. Carpentier.

---

2. Had the Board been properly constituted, yet the grant of the exclusive privilege of constructing wharfs, piers, docks, and of regulating the tolls thereon, and receiving the same, was null and void. These were public rights inherent in the corporation, and inalienable by the Trustees. (Minturn v. Larue et al. McAlister's C. C. R. 370; Charles River Bridge, 11 Peters, 545; Fanning v. Gregor, 16 How. 524; Thatcher v. Dartmouth Bridge, 18 Pick. 501; Mills v. St. Clair, 8 How. 569; Susquehanna Canal Company v. Bonham, Sergt. & Rawle.)

3. The charges of fraud in the complaint are sufficient.

4. It is contended that the act of limitations is a bar, and is available on demurrer.

The 17th Section, upon which the Respondent relies, applies only to actions other than those for the recovery of real property. Where suit is instituted for the recovery of real estate, although that real estate may have been obtained by the fraud of the defendant, it cannot be limited by the section relied on, for this would lead to the absurd conclusion that the Legislature meant to shield a possession obtained by fraud, by a limitation shorter than that fixed for the recovery of real property, or its rents, or servitudes, where no fraud exists.

Besides, the suit is instituted against Horace W. Carpentier, a Trustee of an express trust, who has obtained possession of property committed to his charge by a fraudulent combination with his co-Trustees, and hence the statute of limitations is no bar. The case comes up to the principles on which Courts of Equity, in the exercise of their jurisdiction, repudiate the bar of the act of limitations in cases of trust.

E. W. F. Sloan, for Respondent.

I. Where a number of persons are intrusted with powers not of a mere private confidence, but partaking of a general nature, when all have met, a majority can conclude a minority, and their act will be that of the whole. The cases of corporations go further; there, it is not necessary they should meet; it is enough if notice be given. (Per Ayre, Ch. J. in Grindley v. Barker, 1 Bos. & P. 236; Attorney-General v. Davy, 2 Atkyns, 212; King v. Burton, 3 T. R. 592; Rea v. Bellringer, 4 T. R. 822.) Nor can there be any difference in principle or reason, between the case of a resignation by one member after his election and qualification, and that of a refusal or failure by one to qualify after an election. It seems not to be necessary, even, that the whole number should be elected. (Matter of the Union Ins. 22 Wend. 599; Vide Ex parte Willcocks, 7 Cow. 408.)

---

City of Oakland v. Carpentier.

---

II. As to the fraud, perhaps an act in the nature of a private Act of the Legislature, can be annulled for fraud. (10 Amer. Jurist, 297, and cases cited.) This is not exactly a private act. But Appellant cannot attack the act, and yet claim rights under it. The fraud alleged in passing the ordinances, and in making the conveyances to Carpentier, are vague. How can a Court notice it? What is the injury to Oakland? It nowhere appears that the grant of the land or wharf privileges was made without consideration, or upon inadequate consideration. The grant was "upon conditions." Carpentier was to construct the wharfs at his own expense, and it does not appear that these conditions were unfair to the town, or that C. has failed to perform them. Neither the deed nor the ordinances are set forth. In short, it does not appear from the bill how Oakland has been injured; and courts do not decide on abstract questions. The fraud alleged must have injured some one. (Chittenden v. Craig, 2 Bibb, 474; 1 Story's Eq. Juris. Sec. 203.) This is a case in which relief can only be granted upon terms. It is a case in which the plaintiff must offer to do equity to the defendants. The bill makes no such offer, and is clearly demurrable for that reason. (1 Story's Eq. Jur. Sec. 64; 2 Id. Secs. 693, 694.) The ratification by ordinance in 1853, was made with a full knowledge of the facts. Chancery has no power to rescind contracts arbitrarily; and where new stipulations have been made concerning them, the Court will not interfere. (3 J. Ch. 23; 17 J. R. 437; Sadler v. Robinson, 2 Stew. 510; 1 Story's Eq. Juris. Sec. 203; Gas Co. v. City of San Francisco, 9 Cal. 453.)

III. The Statute of Limitations constitutes a complete bar to the relief sought; and is available on demurrer. (Vide Story's Eq. Plead. Secs. 503, 750, 751; 1 Dan. Ch. Pr. 623, 624, Perk. Ed.;) Sublette v. Tinney, 9 Cal. 423.) Our Statute of Limitations applies alike to suits in equity and actions at law. It was suggested by counsel for the Appellant, that the case does not fall within the provisions of the 3d Chapter of the Act of Limitations; that the second chapter is the only one applicable to suits in respect to real estate. Chapter 2 does not apply to proceedings for the purpose of setting aside legal titles as fraudulent, but to an action for the recovery of possession after a successful determination of the former proceedings.

---

City of Oakland v. Carpentier.

---

Whether this case comes within the provisions of Section 19, or the second class in Section 17, it is still barred.

There is no pretence of recent discoveries; on the contrary, whatever is known must have been discovered at the time.

The wharf privilege is but a chattel interest, and clearly falls within the second class of cases mentioned in Section 17.

The right or power of the corporation to demise for a term the right of constructing wharfs, and the taking of wharfage, cannot be questioned. (Kent's City Charters; Costar v. Brush, 25 Wend. 631.)

BALDWIN, J. delivered the opinion of the Court — TERRY, C. J. concurring.

This is a bill in equity filed by a municipal corporation to set aside a contract or lease made of certain franchises and real estate. The bill charges that the city of Oakland is the legal successor of the town of Oakland by Act of the Legislature, passed March 25, 1854. That the town of Oakland was incorporated by law on the 4th of May, 1852, and, by the same Act, was vested with a title to certain lands comprising the water front within the corporate limits; also, with certain privileges touching the erection of wharfs, docks, etc.; that, by the Act incorporating the town of Oakland, the corporate and municipal powers were lodged in a Board of Trustees, to consist of five members, whose election was given to the qualified voters of the town, the election fixed on the second Monday in May in each year, and the term of office one year, and until their successors were qualified. That an election for Trustees occurred in pursuance of the Act, but only four of them qualified as Trustees; and, at a meeting of the four persons so elected and qualified, a resolution, purporting to be an Ordinance, was passed, whereby the Trustees pretended to convey to one Horace W. Carpentier and his representatives the exclusive right and privilege of constructing wharfs, piers, and docks, at any point within the corporate limits of the town of Oakland, with the right of collecting wharfage and dockage as he might deem reasonable, upon certain conditions expressed in the ordinance. That, by this pretended ordinance, and for the considerations therein set forth, a pretended grant was made to the said Carpentier and his assignees or legal representatives, with all the improvements, rights, and interests, belonging to said town, in and to the lands lying within the limits of the town of Oakland. That Carpentier afterwards, by fraud, procured certain men to be elected again as the Board, who ratified this contract; that the first ordinance was fraudulent, Carpentier having procured himself to be elected Trustee for the purpose of getting it and having his agents on the Board of Trustees. Various other charges of fraud are made, some of which will be noticed in the course of the opinion.

The defendants filed a demurrer to the bill. The ground is, that it does not state facts sufficient to show a cause of action, and that the claim of the plaintiff, as stated, is barred by the Statute of Limitations. Final judgment was rendered on the demurrer in favor of the defendants, the plaintiff declining to amend his bill.

Several important questions are raised by the record.

1. Had the Trustees of the town of Oakland power to grant to Carpentier the exclusive right and privilege of constructing wharfs, piers, and docks, at any point within the corporate limits of the town, with the right of collecting wharfage and dockage, at such rates as he might deem reasonable, for the period of thirty-seven years?

The charter of the town of Oakland is to be found in the Acts of 1852, page 180. By Section 3d of that Act it is provided: "The Board of Trustees shall have power to make such by-laws and ordinances as they may deem proper and necessary; to regulate, improve, sell, or otherwise dispose of, the common property; to prevent and extinguish fires; to lay out, make, open, widen, regulate, and keep in repair, all streets, roads, bridges, ferries, public places, and grounds, wharfs, docks, piers, slips, sewers, wells, and alleys, and to authorize the construction of the same, and, with a view to facilitate the construction of wharfs and other improvements, the lands lying within the limits aforesaid, between high tide and ship channel, are hereby granted and released to said town; provided, that said lands shall be retained by said town as common property, or disposed of for the purposes aforesaid; to regulate and collect wharfage and dockage; to secure the health, cleanliness, ornament, peace, and good order, of said town; to organize and support common schools; to license and suppress dram shops, horse-racing, gambling-houses, and houses of ill-fame, and all indecent or immoral practices, shows, and amusements; to regulate the location of slaughter-houses, stables, and places for the storage of gunpowder; and to pass such other laws and ordinances as, in their opinion, the order, good government, and general welfare, of the town may require."

---

City of Oakland v. Carpentier.

---

The rules in relation to the construction of charters of corporations are familiar. They are special grants of power emanating from the paramount authority. The corporation, owing its existence to the law, is precisely what the law makes it. It has no powers except those expressly given, or which are necessary to the exercise of those expressly given. The general legislative power residing in the State Government may delegate to a municipal government some portion of its own powers; but these grants are held in subordination to the general power, and are not construed as taking from that government any other powers or rights than those clearly granted. These delegated powers, given for local objects, are regarded as trusts confided to the hands in which they are placed, and are not subject to be delegated by the repositories of them. To this Board of Trustees, as has been seen, was given power "to lay out, make, open, widen, regulate, and keep in repair, all streets, roads, bridges, ferries, public places, and grounds, wharfs, docks, piers, slips, sewers, and alleys, and to authorize the construction of the same." Under these general terms it is claimed that this Board had a right to authorize Carpentier to enjoy the exclusive privilege of laying out, establishing, and constructing, wharfs within the city at pleasure, and fix the charges, for a period of thirty-seven years. It is not difficult to see that such a construction is not warranted by the provisions of this Act. The charge in the bill is not that Carpentier agreed, or was allowed, to construct a wharf, or any number of wharfs; that, by contract, he was authorized, and bound himself, on certain terms and conditions, to do this; but that to him, in exclusion of the right of everybody else, and of the corporation itself, was imparted the sole privilege, not only of constructing all wharfs, but of laying out, establishing, and regulating, them, too. This amounts, not to the grant of a license or privilege to erect a wharf, or all the wharfs, laid out or ordered by the council, but the grant of an exclusive right to lay out and construct them at his own convenience, in his own way, and to hold and use them on his own terms; and, if he did not choose to exercise this privilege, the corporation is prevented from giving the privilege to any one else; and so of docks, piers, and the like. If, by a sweeping ordinance of this sort, an exclusive and comprehensive privilege like this could be given to Carpentier, it is hard to see why the opening, repairing, and regulating, of streets and roads should not be given to him exclusively, as a privilege, with a right to charge and collect what tolls or charges for using them he might please, since, as has been seen, the very same words apply to these public easements as to docks, and piers, and wharfs. We do not regard this ordinance as an exercise of a power under the charter, but as a transfer of the corporate powers intrusted to this Board to this favored grantee. What power of regulation is left after an unconditional grant of the exclusive privilege of all the wharfs, and docks, and piers, and a lease for thirty-seven years of all the lands, and a right to fix such tolls as the grantees please, and this without any obligation to build or construct any, it is not easy to see. If the grant had been to the city of San Francisco, in the same words, and the city authorities had granted the exclusive privilege to one man to construct all the wharfs along the line of the bay, and fix his own toll, we suppose no one would question that the grant exceeded the powers of the agents of the corporation.

---

The general power over the wharfs and docks is like the general power over the streets and highways. The corporation must exercise the general powers which the term "regular" implies. This general power involves the determination of the questions whether a wharf shall be constructed, when, how, in what places, on what terms, how kept, and what charges shall be exacted for the use? These police regulations are essential to the interest of the city, its commerce, its health, possibly, certainly its convenience and general prosperity. It might, as we have intimated, just as well be said that the Board could by ordinance delegate to Carpentier the power of opening all streets and alleys, anywhere in the town, when he chose, or widening them, where he chose; to run an alley through any one's lot, or to make a sewer near any man's door, at his pleasure; but it would be rather a startling proposition to say that he could hold — through an ordinance — the exclusive privilege to do all these things, and charge for them what he chose; and that no one else — nor the town itself — had a right to do any of them. And the same reason precisely which denies the power to make this grant, applies to the grant of the exclusive privilege of constructing all the wharfs he may choose, he determining, of course, where these wharfs shall be, the number, the dimensions, the kind, the toll, and every matter concerning them — comprehended within the term "regulation." The reason is that this power of regulation is a political power, and therefore, the transfer of it is the transfer of a power of municipal legislation; which authority is not in its nature alienable. It is not the transfer of so much property; it is the transfer of a power to create, and control, and regulate, a certain species of franchise, the creation, control, and regulation of which, are powers of the political department. It is no answer to say that after a wharf is constructed by the authority of the corporation, it might be sold as property; the reply to this is, that the establishment of it is of the province of the corporation; and that it can no more give a general privilege to one man to establish wharfs, when, where, and as, he chooses, than it could give the same right to open streets when, where, and as, he chose, within the limits of the city — the privilege being given for his own profits, use, and benefit.

City of Oakland v. Carpentier.

---

The principle upon which these general views rest, has been fully supported by the United States Circuit Court for the Districts of California, in the case of Minturn v. Larue, (1 McAll. 370,) involving the construction of this charter.

The power is given the Board "to regulate and to collect wharfage and dockage"; but this power is not exercised, but ceded, by a grant allowing the grantee to regulate it as he pleases.

City of Oakland v. Carpentier.

---

It will not do to say that the lands lying between high tide and ship channel, are ceded to the city; this does not deprive the argument of its force, that the establishment of wharfs, docks, etc. is one of its corporate powers, and that no wharf can be so constructed, unless such wharf be so laid out by the order, or with the leave, of the corporation — which cannot be by the general cession of a privilege to another to establish, when, where, and how, he pleases. We understand the Supreme Court of Massachusetts, in Fay, petitioner, (15 Pick. 255,) to intimate this doctrine, when it is said — speaking of the right of the city of Boston to grant a ferry — “Even if the city, by their authorized agents, had made a grant of a ferry or other franchise, claiming to be owners thereof, with express or implied covenants for an exclusive enjoyment of such franchise, this would not prohibit or restrain the Mayor or Aldermen from exercising the powers vested in them by statute, to license a ferry required by public convenience and necessity. Such authority is vested in them as Trustees for the public, to be exercised for the public good, and cannot be restrained by the covenant of the city, though such covenant happens to be executed by the same agents.” But how much stronger would have been the statement of the venerable Judge, C. J. Shaw, if in that case a general grant had been made of the exclusive privilege of establishing all the ferries on a river, or between the shores of Boston and Chelsea, with the right to select the places at which to exercise the privilege, or, if exercised, to charge what ferriage they chose. This would be, not to make the grantee a licensee of a ferry right, but the assignee of the privilege of making and unmaking ferry franchises at pleasure; indeed, it would be transferring all the powers of government over the subject, to one individual.

We see no distinction in this charter between a wharf or dock, in or upon a navigable stream, and a ferry right or bridge. They are all of the same class of interests, and the same powers over all of them are given in the same words.

But if there was a difference, the charter giving this power and right of regulation to this corporation over the subject, it is held as a political power, and must be exercised by those to whom it is confided. The power to lay out and regulate wharfs being given to the council, cannot be exercised by Carpentier.

---

We think, then, that this general grant of this exclusive privilege is wholly void, as exceeding the powers of this corporation; and that the plaintiff, the successor of the old town, has a right to come into equity to remove this impediment, constituted by these proceedings, from the free and beneficial exercise of its corporate functions and property. The plaintiff stands here as a Trustee, administering important trusts, and charged with responsible duties to the public, which cannot be safely discharged so long as doubts hang upon its title to property, and to the exercise of its control over its franchises; and, like any other Trustee, has the right to seek the aid of equity to remove obstructions to the performance of its duties. It is difficult to see how else the plaintiff could vindicate its right. The claim of the defendants in this respect is incorporeal. They assert that certain franchises have been ceded to them, and that the plaintiff has parted with them; the plaintiff, claiming only to hold these franchises and the administration of them in trust for the public, would be without any relief, if equity could not aid in removing this difficulty; for it could neither build wharfs nor authorize others to build them, as long as its powers and rights were denied. Nor do we perceive what form of legal action would give an adequate remedy.

This view disposes of the demurrer, for it is general — going to the whole bill; and if the bill contains, in any part, a complete cause of action, the general objection to it, for want of equity, fails.

What effect the invalidity of this grant of this general privilege has upon the grant of the land, the bill does not enable us to determine. Neither the ordinance nor the deed is set out, as they should have been, in the bill. It is charged in the complaint, it is true, that the land between high tide and ship channel, and this exclusive privilege, were conveyed in the same instrument; but in what relation the land stood to this privilege, or what were the particular considerations or inducements to the grant of the land, we are not distinctly informed. If the land were conveyed merely or mainly to give effect to this illegal purpose, probably the incident would fall with its principal.

The charter is, perhaps, the most defective upon the statute book, and this is saying a great deal. A perverse ingenuity seems to have been exercised to make it as lame and loose as possible. The joint labors of Malaprop and Partington could scarcely have made such a collocation or dislocation of words and sentences. Among other things, it gives the Board of Trustees power "to license and suppress dram-shops, horse-racing, gambling-houses, and houses of ill-fame, and all indecent and immoral practices, shows, and amusements." However general the words of this charter, the received rules of construction require us to construe them in reference to the substantive purposes expressed. The act gives power "to regulate, improve, sell, or otherwise dispose of, the common property; to prevent and extinguish fires; to lay out, make, open, widen, regulate, and keep in repair, all streets, roads, bridges, ferries, public places, and grounds, wharfs, docks, piers, slips, sewers, wells, and alleys, and to authorize the construction of the same, and with a view to facilitate the construction of wharfs and other improvements, the lands lying within the limits aforesaid, between high tide and ship channel, are hereby granted and released to said town; provided, that said lands shall be retained by said town as common property, or disposed of for the purposes aforesaid." Now, looking into this jumble of incoherent and contradictory verbiage, the questions arise: To what other improvements, besides wharfs, was it designed that this water-front should be applied? or what are "the purposes aforesaid," for which it might be disposed of and how disposed of? It may well be doubted whether, under this charter, the Town Council, being bound to lay out and regulate these wharfs, streets, and docks, an unconditional sale or lease of the land necessary to be retained to accomplish and give effect to this power could be made, especially if accompanied with this was a renunciation of all dominion or control over the land necessary for the site of these docks, streets, or wharfs. But, perhaps, it is not necessary to decide these points now, as they can be presented more satisfactorily when the facts are better developed.

City of Oakland v. Carpenter.

2. It is contended by the Appellant that this ordinance and deed are void, for the reason that the Board of Trustees were not legally organized; that though five were elected, (Carpenter being one,) all did not qualify; and that, though a majority of the members of such a public body may act after the organization, it requires all the members to make the organization.

City of Oakland v. Carpentier.

---

Section 2d of the charter is in these words: "The corporate powers and duties of said town shall be vested in a Board of Trustees, to consist of five members, who shall be elected," etc. Nothing is said in this Act further, as to the number required or mode of corporate action. In the first section, the town is declared to be incorporated under the provisions of the Act of 1850, to provide for the incorporation of towns. (C. L. 114.) The third section of this last Act provides that the Board of Trustees shall assemble within ten days after their election, etc.; and, Section 4th: "At all meetings of the Board a majority of the Trustees shall constitute a quorum to do business."

We can see no reason for holding that a majority of the members elected to this Board should not as well be held empowered to act at the first, as at any subsequent, meeting of it.

3. The next question is as to the alleged fraud in procuring this grant by Carpentier. Some astute and forcible criticism is employed by the counsel for the Respondent upon the complaint. The facts are not as fully stated as is desirable in such cases. The complaint is defective in not averring fully the terms of the ordinance and the contract, and the particular injury resulting to the plaintiff from the alleged fraud; nor are the fraudulent practices of the defendant, Carpentier, in procuring the election of the first Board, or his procuring the election of the second, nor the circumstances attending the ratification of the first contract, nor the promises or agreements made by him on or as inducing the execution and delivery of the deed, fully set out. But as the bill may be amended, on the return of the cause, in these particulars, and as the general questions have been discussed, we proceed to consider them.

It is alleged that Carpentier procured men, who were his agents or conspirators with him, to be elected to this Board, for the purpose of getting them to defraud the town, for his benefit, of all this property and these franchises; and if he got himself elected to this place, in order to help the contrivance through, whether by this influence, or by keeping out some one else who might have opposed the scheme, then this was sufficient to brand the whole transaction with illegality. Nay, more, if Carpentier put himself in the position of a member elect of this Board, neither resigning nor qualifying, and took advantage of this position to advance his personal interests, at the expense of those of the corporation, this was a fraud for which a Court of Equity would hold him responsible. He would occupy the position, really, of a Trustee dealing for his own profit with the subject of the trust, and his conduct would be scrutinized with the jealousy with which equity regards the interested dealings of an agent with the principal, in respect to the subject of the trust. Nor would a ratification by a subsequent Board, if the members were fraudulently elected, or procured to be elected, by Carpentier, have any effect in validating the transaction. Carpentier could not protect his fraud by the sanction of his own associates united to affect, together, an illegal enterprise.

If these facts be made to appear, the Statute of Limitations would not begin to run until after the corporation thus defrauded, got out of the hands of the confederates, and an opportunity were afforded innocent agents coming to the management of the affairs of the town, to look into and ascertain the true state of things. Knowledge on the part of the guilty agents of the corporation of the criminal fact is not notice to the corporation of such fraud, so as to give the advantage of this notice to the equally guilty associate of those agents. If this were the law, an agent could always protect himself by joining in a conspiracy to defraud his principal with a convenient friend, who received the principal's property, and who might claim against the principal that the agent had notice of the fraud.

4. The next and last point is that the Statute of Limitations of three years applies and bars the claim of the plaintiff to set aside this deed. By Art. 17th, Sec. 17, (Wood's Digest, 47,) is given the limitation of certain actions. The section is: "Actions other than those for the recovery of real property can be commenced as follows: * * * within three years. An action for relief on the ground of fraud, the cause of action in such case not to be deemed to have accrued until the discovery by the aggrieved party of the facts constituting the fraud."

We think that this provision has no relation to an equitable proceeding to set aside a fraudulent deed of real estate when the effect of it is to restore the possession of the premises to the defrauded party. In such a case, the action is substantially an action for the recovery of the real estate; indeed it is literally.

---

---

Express fraud, generally, as well avoids a deed at law as in equity, and it would be strange if, after three years, a party could set up the fraud in avoidance of the deed at law, and a different rule prevail in equity. This is really an action for the recovery of real estate, and the plaintiff is no worse off because fraud has been committed upon him, nor the defendant in any better situation, than if the latter had innocently bought and entered under an imperfect title.

For the reasons assigned, the judgment below must be reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings, in accordance with this opinion.

On petition for rehearing, BALDWIN, J. delivered the following opinion — FIELD, C. J. concurring:

Petition for rehearing denied. The opinion modified so as to leave open for future revision the question of the validity of the contract with Carpentier, under the ordinance referred to in the opinion.

PALMER et al. v. VANCE & MELVIN.

In a bond given to release property seized on attachment, the obligors undertook to pay, on demand, to plaintiffs in the action, the amount of the judgment and costs, not to exceed three thousand dollars, which plaintiffs might recover. In the bond the action is recited as for one thousand six hundred dollars. Upon delivery of the bond the property was returned to the debtor. Plaintiffs in the action had judgment for an amount exceeding the penalty of the bond. Held, that recovery may be had on the bond to the extent of the penalty.

Such a bond is not a statutory undertaking, but is valid as a common law obligation.

The mistake in the recital, as to the amount for which attachment issued, may be explained and corrected by parol.

Execution against the judgment debtor, in such case, is not a condition precedent to suit on the bond.

A bond given voluntarily to the Sheriff, on delivery of the property, is valid at common law.

APPEAL from the Fourth District.

Demurrer to complaint.

The bond is as follows, to wit:

"In the Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco:

Chas. W. Crosby and Albert Dibblee v. A. T. Ladd and Frank D Richardson.

---

Palmer v. Vance.

---

Whereas, the above named plaintiffs have commenced an action in aforesaid Court against the above named defendants, for the recovery of one thousand nine hundred and seventy-six dollars and eight cents; and, whereas, an attachment was duly issued and served, as will more fully appear by the Sheriff's return on the process in said cause.

Now, therefore, the undersigned, residents of the city and county of San Francisco, in consideration of the premises, and in consideration of the release from attachment of the property attached as above mentioned, do hereby jointly and severally undertake, in the sum of three thousand dollars, and promise to the effect that, if the plaintiff shall recover judgment in said action we will pay to the plaintiff, upon demand, the amount of said judgment, together with the costs, not exceeding in all the said sum of three thousand dollars.

Dated at San Francisco, this the 5th day of March, 1855.

"City and County of San Francisco, ss.:

A. T. Melvin and R. H. Vance, whose names are subscribed as the sureties to the above undertaking, being severally duly sworn, each, for himself, deposes and says: That he is worth double the sum in said undertaking specified as the penalty thereof, over and above all his debts and liabilities, exclusive of property exempt from execution.

(Signed)

R. H. VANCE. [L. s.]

Subscribed and sworn to before me this 5th day of February, A. D. 1855.

[L. s.] L. W. SLOAT, Notary Public."

John Reynolds, for Appellant.

1. The undertaking sued on is not good as a statutory undertaking, and the Sheriff had no authority, as Sheriff, to take the same, under the statute, after his levy had been made; and he acted as the agent of Crosby & Dibblee. (Prac. Act. Secs. 123, 125, 136, 137.)

2. The complaint shows that the only description of the action in the Superior Court, against Ladd & Richardson, is by reference to the amount for which that action was brought, and this description did not correspond to the record introduced.

---

Palmer v. Vance.

---

3. No breach was shown of the undertaking upon which this suit was brought.

4. This undertaking is to pay the debt of another. (Low v. Adams, 6 Cal. 277; Prac. Act. Secs. 120, 134; Grant v. Naylor, 4 Cranch, 224.)

5. No mistake can be shown in such a written undertaking. (Grant v. Naylor, 4 Cranch, 224; State v. McGouveny, 20 Ohio, 93.)

6. No parol proof can be given to vary or explain a written contract. (Osborn v. Hendrickson, 7 Cal. 282.)

C. H. S. Williams, for Respondent.

1. The reference in the undertaking to the sum for which judgment was claimed in the prayer of the complaint in the attachment suit, was unnecessary and immaterial. The description of the suit was sufficient and complete without it. The undertaking promised to pay, on demand, whatever sum should be recovered, not exceeding three thousand dollars. (Dodges v. Potter, 18 Barb. 201; Pierce v. Parker, 4 Met. 20; Jackson v. Clark, 7 John. 217; Lamb v. Reston & Wife, 5 Taunt. 207.)

2. No execution against the judgment debtor was requisite, because the undertaking was a positive agreement on the part of defendants that they would pay on demand, and the release of the property was sufficient consideration. (Aud v. Magruder, 10 Cal. 282.)

TERRY, C. J. delivered the opinion of the Court — BALDWIN, J. concurring.

This is an action upon a bond given to release property attached.

It appears that suit was instituted by Crosby & Dibblee against Ladd & Richardson, for the sum of two thousand nine hundred and seventy-six dollars and eight cents, and an attachment issued which was levied on property of the debtors, sufficient to satisfy the debt.

In order to procure the release of the property attached, the defendants executed the obligation sued on, by which they undertook to pay on demand to the plaintiffs in the action the amount of the judgment and costs, not to exceed three thousand dollars, which plaintiffs might recover in such action; which is, by mistake, described in the undertaking as a suit to recover one thousand six hundred and seventy-six dollars and eight cents.

---

Palmer v. Vance.

---

Upon the execution and delivery of the bond, the property attached was returned to the attachment debtor. Judgment was recovered in the action for an amount greater than the penalty of the bond, and this action is instituted by plaintiff, to whom the bond was assigned, to recover the amount of the penalty.

Judgment was rendered below for the plaintiff, and defendant, Vance, appealed.

We are not able to discover any error in the record. The paper sued on is not a statutory undertaking, but being founded upon a sufficient consideration, is valid as a common law obligation for the payment of money. A bond taken by the Sheriff is not void for want of conformity to the requirements of the statute, which, while prescribing one form of action, does not prohibit others; and a bond given voluntarily upon the delivery of property, is valid at common law. (Whitsett v. Womack, 8 Ala. 466.)

There was no error in permitting the mistake in the recital of the bond — as to the amount for which the attachment issued — to be explained and corrected by parol evidence.

In Pierce v. Parker, (4 Met. 84,) the Court say:

“It is a well settled principle of law, that where an instrument which is offered to prove the subject matter described differs in one or more particulars from the thing described, evidence is admissible to show their agreement or identity, notwithstanding such misdescription.”

(See, also, 18 Barb. 201; 2 Parsons on Con. 67, 76.)

In the case of Meredith v. Richardson, (10 Ala. 828,) the recital of the bond sued on was erroneous, both as to the amount of the execution and the names of the parties. Yet it was held that these errors might be explained by parol evidence. The Court said: “It is supposed, however, there is a variance between the obligation and the legal proceedings, which is incapable of aid from parol proof, and which prevents it from having any effect. The supposed variance is the omission of the names of some of the defendants, in the recital of the execution, and the omission to conform to the terms named in the condition with it. Although these were sufficient to destroy the effect of the bond, as a strict compliance with the statute, they do not render it invalid. It is a strained and forced conclusion to say that, because the execution issued against Lunsford, it will be concluded that it issued against him alone. This might be correct as a prima facie intendment; but certainly is open to explanation. If we look to the contract evidenced by the bond, it will be seen the description of the execution is no part of it. The levy, and the redelivery of the cotton to the debtor, is the consideration, or inducement, for him and his sureties to undertake it shall be forthcoming at a particular time and place. The sum due on the execution is of no sort of importance, except for the purpose of ascertaining the damage which may flow from a breach of the condition. It would be a monstrous absurdity, that engagements of the most solemn nature might be avoided because of the misrecital of the facts, or circumstances, which induced them. It is a general proposition, that meets us everywhere, that the consideration, even when set out in a deed, may be explained by parol evidence. (Cowan & Hill's Notes, 1441.) Nor are decisions lacking on the precise point we are now considering. In Hewlett v. Chamberlayne, (1 Wash. Va. 367,) the forthcoming bond omitted entirely to set out the amount of the execution, yet the court held this to be no objection in an action of debt, although a motion for a summary judgment had been refused, because of the non-conformity of the bond to the execution. In Stockton v. Turner, (7 J. J. M. 192,) an injunction bond recited the judgment enjoined, as for two hundred and eighty dollars and fifty cents, when the true sum was two hundred and eighty-eight dollars and fifty cents, yet the Court sustained the bond, on the ground of an estoppel. It is said the recital of a particular fact in the condition of the bond, will estop the obligor from denying it. (Willés, 9.)

---

Palmer v. Vance.

---

On the other hand, when the recitals do not constitute a part of the contract, it is said by Chief Justice Kent to be a settled rule that even a mistake in the recital of a bond does not vitiate it, for it is no essential part of the bond. (Talmadge v. Richmond, 9 John. 85. See, also, St. John v. Dagges, Hob. 130; Coke Litt, 352, b; Wessinger v. Crook, 7 Ala. 710.) In accordance with these principles, a bail-bond was held to be good, although the Christian names of both the plaintiffs were misstated in the bond, (Colburn v. Downs, 10 Mass. 21,) and a bastardy bond was sustained when the condition was to answer a complaint made in 1816, instead of 1833, when it was really made. (18 Pick. 257.)”

Chester v. Miller.

---

There is no force in the objection that execution is not shown to have issued against the judgment debtors. The undertaking of the defendants is not that the attachment debtor should pay the judgment, but a distinct and positive agreement that these defendants would pay the amount on demand. This agreement is shown to have been supported by a sufficient consideration, and there is no reason why they should not be held to a strict compliance with its terms.

Judgment affirmed.

CHESTER v. MILLER et al.

Error has jurisdiction to vacate a judgment fraudulently altered, so as to include a defendant not served with process, and not originally included in the judgment.

No objection to this jurisdiction, that the judgment was on its face void; because the plaintiff was liable to be harassed by it, and defendants were in the act of enforcing it.

When the record shows, in general terms, the appearance of parties, the appearance will be confined to those parties served with process.

If there be any rule requiring the payment of a debt, in judgment, or a denial of its justice, before a party, complaining of judgment without notice to him, can ask equity to vacate it, that rule cannot apply to the case of judgment rendered for a penalty under a penal statute.

An alteration by the Court, of a judgment, without notice, so as to include a party not served with process, if not void, is voidable at the election of the party.

APPEAL from the Third District.

For case see opinion. The complaint, in addition to the statement in the opinion, charges conspiracy on the part of defendants to defraud plaintiff out of his property; that Miller is irresponsible.

---

Chester v. Miller.

---

A. T. Wilson, for Appellants.

1. The demurrer was well taken. The allegations of the bill make out no case under any head of chancery jurisdiction. (E. L. White v. S. B. Harris, Oct. Term, 1856; Story's Eq. Jurisp. Sec. 894, p. 898; Addington v. Allen, 11 Wend. 375; 1st head note and opinion of Mr. Senator Tracy, 408; Kinder v. Macy, 7 Cal. 206; Porter v. Herman, 8 Id. 619; Snow v. Halstead, 1 Id.; Hardwick v. Forbes' Adm's, 1 Bibb, 212.)

2. Both Clark & Brocklebank, Attorneys-at-Law, appeared and put in an original and amended answer for Chester, in the Justice's Court. It is immaterial whether they were authorized by Chester or not to do so, until he shows that they are not solvent. (Denton v. Noyes, 6 Johns.; Suydam v. Pitcher, 4 Cal. 280; Welton v. Garibardi, 6 Id.)

Again, the defendants in the suit, in the Justice's Court, had appealed to the County Court, and if the judgment was wrong in the Justice's Court, Chester had ample opportunity to correct it in the County Court.

Latham & Sunderland, for Respondent.

I. There was no service on Chester, in the suit of Müller v. McDonald et als. and no appearance by him. The Court, in that case, therefore, acquired no jurisdiction over his person, and the judgment, if any was rendered against him, was void. The original answer filed was for McDonald only. When the record recites in general terms the appearance of the parties, such appearance will be confined to those parties served with process. (Edwards v. Traner, 14 S. & M. 76.)

II. The execution having been levied, could not thereafter be amended. (Toof v. Bently & Harris, 5 Wend. 276.)

Equity will relieve in cases like this. Chester had no notice of the amendment until it was too late to appeal. The judgment, then, upon its face was valid, and a Court of law could give him no adequate, if any, relief. Other executions could issue. They would be regular upon their face, and protect the officer who might serve them. (2 Story's Eq. Jurisp. Sec. 887.)

BALDWIN, J. delivered the opinion of the Court — TERRY, C. J. concurring.

---

Chester v. Miller.

---

Bill filed to vacate and set aside a judgment in an action of forcible entry and detainer. The bill states that judgment was rendered by a Justice of the Peace, 3d September, 1856; that no process was served on the plaintiff, who was one of the defendants in that action; that execution issued on 5th of September, 1856, against the other defendants who had appeared, and that the defendants, finding that they could not make the money of those defendants, "some how" got possession of the Justice's docket, and interlined the name of the plaintiff in the judgment, and also altered the execution by a like insertion, and are proceeding now to make the money on such process. The defendant, Wilson, demurred to this complaint. The Court below overruled the demurrer.

Afterwards the defendants answered the bill, and, on the trial, a decree was rendered for the plaintiff.

The evidence, on the trial, was conflicting as to whether Chester did or did not appear by Attorney.

1. The judgment, as originally entered, and the execution, as originally issued, were entered and issued as if he had not appeared, and seem subsequently, and without notice, to have been altered. The Judge below having found that there was no appearance for Chester, on this conflicting proof, we do not feel disposed to review his judgment.

2. The only other question is, as to the remedy. Has equity jurisdiction of this case? Though not very explicitly stated, the charges in the bill amount to a charge of fraud — the fraudulent alteration of records. The remedy by appeal might suffice in ordinary cases, if the record showed a want of service as to Chester; but it seems that Chester inquired if judgment had been rendered against him, and was informed that it had not — at least, there is proof to that effect. It was not until after execution of the writ of possession, that the alteration in the writ was made. Nor is there any proof that there was notice of this alteration to Chester until it was too late to appeal from this summary judgment. It will not do to say that the judgment on the face of it was void; the plaintiff was liable to be harassed by it, and the defendants were in the act of enforcing it against him. (3 Story's Eq. Sec. 887.)

3. It is said that the Attorney, Brocklebank, appeared for all

---

---

the parties, Chester included, and that this is evidenced by an answer to which his name is signed. But it is held that the recital of an appearance is never conclusive, and where the expression is general, it is confined to those parties who have been served with process. (Miller v. Ewing, 8 S. & M. 421; Torney v. Jordan, 4 How. Miss. 401; Dean v. McKinstry, 2 S. & M. 213; Edwards v. Tooner, 14 S. & M. 76.)

But Brocklebank does not profess in this answer — which seems to be only an amendment to an answer of Powell McDonald, signed by Clark as Attorney — to appear for the plaintiff here.

Nor does it anywhere more distinctly appear that Chester appealed from the judgment. Indeed, the evidence, if it is to be believed, shows that he neither considered himself, nor did the Justice consider him, a party affected by the judgment; for the appeal was taken by the parties for whom Clark, Blake, and Brocklebank, appeared, on the 4th of September, 1856, which was before the alteration was made in the execution.

It must be remembered that this is a highly penal statute under which judgment was obtained, and that the rule of equity, that a party must do equity before he can ask it, has no application, if that rule requires the payment of the debt in judgment or a denial of its justice, before the party complaining of judgment, without notice to him, could go into equity to set it aside. If there be any such rule as the Appellant insists, it has no application to the case of a judgment rendered for a penalty against a party so amerced without notice.

This is not a bill in equity for a new trial, but a bill filed to set aside a judgment which was properly entered at first, in effect, for the defendant, Chester, and subsequently, without any authority, altered so as to appear as a judgment against him. The Justice of the Peace, after having entered the judgment according to law, had no right to alter it without notice to defendant, Chester, so as to make it an illegal and improper judgment. The entry of the judgment after the return of the verdict was a final act, and the alteration subsequently, at least without notice to Chester, was, if not void, such an abuse of the authority of the Justice. (Chester never having been served with process, and, therefore, not being within the power of the Court,) as to render the whole proceeding voidable at his election. The Justice might as well, six months after the first entry, have amended the judgment so as to include any other stranger to the proceeding.

Gregory v. McPherson.

---

We think the judgment should be affirmed.

APPEAL from the Seventh District.

The case is stated in the opinion of the Court.

E. W. F. Sloan, for Appellant.

I. If the copy of the grant, signed by the Governor and countersigned by the Secretary of the State, annexed to, and forming part of, the expediente in the archives of the government, is not to be regarded as primary evidence, it was admissible, as the next best evidence. (Minor v. Tillotson, 7 Pet. 99, 100; vide also, Proprietors of Braintree v. Battles, 6 Vt. 399; Renner v. Bank of Columbia, 9 Wheat. 596; The King v. Inhabitants, etc. 4 Maule & Sel. 48.)

II. 1st. The expediente was properly admissible as primary evidence — as evidence of the highest character known to the law.

It is a public record of public official acts, performed by public

---

Gregory v. McPherson.

---

agents of the government, whilst performing public duties, in disposing of portions of the public domain, preserved in a public office, under the charge and in the custody of duly constituted officials.

Records and public documents of that kind constitute the highest character of evidence, both under the rules of the civil and of the common law. (1 Starkie's Ev. 160-173; B. N. P. 229; Patterson v. Winn, 5 Pet. 241; U. S. v. Arredondo, 6 Id. 728.)

2d. If the original expediente in the public archives is to be regarded in the light of a record or public official document, a sworn copy or exemplification was properly admissible in evidence. (1 Stark. Ev. 181-185; B. N. P. 294; 1 Starkie's Rep. 183; 4 Campb. 372; 6 Cow. 751.) Not only records, but all public documents which cannot be removed from one place to another, may be proved by means of a copy proved on oath to have been examined with the original. (1 Stark. Ev. 155; Hedden v. Overton, 4 Bibb Rep. 406; Commonwealth v. Alburger, 1 Whart. 472; Kingston v. Lesley, 10 Serg. & R. 387.)

3d. It is not indispensable to the introduction of such proof, that the official signatures or seals appearing to the originals on file, should be first proved, provided they are found in the proper repository. (Ross' Lessee v. Cutshall, 1 Binn. 399; Williams v. Sheldon, 10 Wend. 659.)

4th. It was suggested in the Court below that the exemplification offered in evidence was certified to be the copy of a copy. It was certified to be a copy of the record returned into the office of the Surveyor-General of the Secretary of the Board as directed by law. In point of fact, however, it was traced from the original — the mistake is in the form of the certificate.

It has, sometimes, been held that the copy of a copy is inadmissible, solely on the ground, however, that it was not compared with the original, and, therefore, by necessity not proved to be a true copy of the original. (Winn v. Patterson, 9 Pet. 663-677.)

In this case, however, the copy offered in evidence was carefully compared with the original. As a sworn copy, therefore, there is no pretended foundation for the objection. Besides, when transcripts are made out and lodged in public officers by authority of the government, a copy therefrom cannot be objected

---

Gregory v. McPherson.

---

to as being the copy of a copy. (Videll's Heirs v. Duplantier, 9 La. 525; Hedden v. Overton, 4 Bibb, 406.)

III. The principal objection made to the decisions of the Board of Land Commissioners and the District Court, was that they were res inter alios.

Another objection has been suggested, to the effect that the Board of Commissioners did not properly constitute a Court:

"It is not essential to the reception of evidence of this nature that the inquiry should have been made by virtue of some judicial authority, and by means of witnesses examined on oath; it is sufficient if made by virtue of competent authority on behalf of the public, and on sufficient matter of public interest." (1 Stark. Ev. 168, 169; F. N. 228; Vicar of Kellington v. Trinity College, 1 Wils. 170; 4 Camp. 126; Tooker v. Duke of Beaufort, 1 Burr. 146; 4 Dow. 297, 320.)

But the proceedings before the Board are judicial. Evidence is heard, and the title to real estate tried and decided.

IV. The deed of conveyance by one of the executors to the plaintiff of the premises was sufficient to pass the estate.

It is a rule of the common law, that where a mere naked power is conferred upon two or more, as a matter of personal trust and confidence, without any provision to the effect that a less number may execute it, such power must be executed by all jointly; and there is no survivorship. (Co. Litt. 112 b; 10 Pet. 564; 2 Humph. 379.)

This was cured by the Statute of Henry 8, Chap. 4, which provided that, when part of the executors refused to take upon himself or themselves the administration, etc. then a sale by those who do act should be good.

Under the Statute of Henry 8, a mere neglect to act has been held to be a refusal. (4 Munf. 345; 4 Yerger, 16; 1 Bat. & Dev. 329; 2 Green, N. J. 383.)

Our statute goes further still. (Comp. Laws, 382, Sec. 47.)

The doctrine, however, in regard to the execution of powers of sale contained in wills has no application to the case at bar.

The sale was not made under power given by the will of Juana Sanchez de Pacheco. It was made pursuant to the decree of the Probate Court.

---

Gregory v. McPherson.

---

John Currey, for Respondent.

I. The papers offered in evidence by plaintiff, purporting to be a copy of an expediente were properly excluded.

It is questionable whether an expediente is a public record in any legal sense. If it be a public record it is of a mixed nature, partaking both of a public and private character. (1 Stark. Ev. 100; 1 Greenl. Ev. Sec. 474.) In which case it cannot be adduced by a party in support of his claim against a stranger. (1 Greenl. Ev. Sec. 493; Highland Turnpike Co. v. McKean, 10 John. 154; Res. v. Mothersall, 1 Stra. 93.)

The word "record" imports something of more permanence than the deposit of papers in the form of an expediente in a public office.

Books of public offices, journals of legislative bodies, and official registers, are of the character of public records which, by the common law, are admissible as competent evidence of the facts they contain. (1 Greenl. Ev. 493.) But they must be accompanied by proof, that they come from the proper repository. (Id. Sec. 485; 1 Stark. Ev. 158, 183.)

Where the nature of the case admits, some proof must be given of some act done in reference to the documents offered in evidence, as a further proof of their genuineness. (1 Greenl. Ev. Sec. 143.)

The expediente, a copy of which was offered by defendant as primary evidence, was not preserved in the form of a record, but merely in the form of a deposited manuscript without even an indorsement thereon or an entry thereof to indicate when the same was deposited.

The document purporting to be a grant made by Governor Figueroa to Juana Sanchez de Pacheco, a copy of which the plaintiff alleges he offered in evidence, falls under the rule by which the competency of the expediente, as evidence per se, shall be adjudged; because such grant or copy thereof, attached to the expediente was not preserved in any book of record.

The copy of the grant offered on the part of the plaintiff requires that it should be noted or registered in the corresponding or proper book; yet it was not pretended on the trial, nor did it appear by the certificate of the Surveyor-General, that the copy produced was from any book or register. (United States v. Cambuston, 20 How. 61.)

The copy of the pretended grant was a copy of the copy annexed to the expediente. A grant when made by the Governor was delivered to the grantee, and sometimes a copy thereof was annexed to the expediente, but this was not invariably the practice; and such copy did not properly constitute a part of the expediente.

The originals, of which the papers offered in evidence purported to be copies, would not, if produced, have been evidence per se of the matters therein contained; but proof of the genuineness of such originals would have been required. (1 Stark. Ev. 151, 152.)

The rule of evidence established by the authorities cited on behalf of Appellant in relation to the proof of exemplifications of the class of documents and records mentioned in those authorities, is not controverted. The answer is that an expediente and Mexican grant do not, nor do either of them, fall within any rule there mentioned. There is no great seal, or seal of a Court of record, importing verity of the document or record sought to be given in evidence.

II. The evidence of the existence of a grant, delivered, on behalf of the Mexican nation, to Juana Sanchez de Pacheco, embracing the land in controversy, was slight and unsatisfactory; and the evidence of the loss of such grant was insufficient. (1 Greenl. Ev. Sec. 558.) But before any evidence can be given of the loss of a written instrument it must appear that such instrument existed. (1 Greenl. Ev. Sec. 549.)

III. The evidence of the genuineness of the alleged existing expediente, and copy of the grant thereto annexed, by the production of a traced copy thereof, with the testimony of a witness that he had on a former occasion, at the Surveyor-General's office, examined the signatures of the various persons signed to the several documents composing such expediente, and that such signatures were genuine, was insufficient and incompetent.

Before secondary evidence can be given of a deed or other instrument of writing, a proper cause therefor should be assigned; no such cause was assigned on the trial. For aught that appeared, the custodian of the originals could have been compelled by subpœna duces tecum to have produced them. If the originals could not have been removed from their repository, still, they could have been proven by the depositions of witnesses at, or convenient to, the office of the Surveyor-General. Defendant had a right to inspect the originals.

1st. In order that he might be enabled to cross-examine the witness understandingly in relation thereto, and especially as to the question of their genuineness.

2d. In order that he might impeach them by showing that they were fraudulent and void. (1 Greenleaf's Ev. Sec. 446; Stark. Ev. 96.) The defendant insists that he had the right to see the paper, and also the writing and stamps constituting the original documents; from all, or from some portion of which, it might have appeared that the originals were fabrications for unlawful and sinister ends.

The Appellant's counsel not only relies upon the ground that the copies offered in evidence were exemplifications of a record, but that they should have been admitted as sworn copies.

The law requires the best evidence of which the nature of the thing to be proved is capable. If the best evidence cannot be obtained, the next best in degree should be produced. "Exemplifications," says Ch. Baron Gilbert, "are of better credit than any sworn copy." (Gilbert's Ev. 14; 10 Mod. 126.) If the original, or the record thereof, itself, would not be evidence, a sworn or certified copy would not. (Kerns v. Swope, 2 Watts, 75; Winn v. Patterson, 9 Peters, 676, 677.)

Before a copy can be given in evidence, it should appear that the witness by whom it is to be proved such, had compared it with the original, in the mode prescribed by law. (1 Greenl. Ev. Secs. 506, 264, 565, 566.)

The copy of the alleged grant sought to be proved by Salvio Pacheco, was but a copy of a copy. A copy of a copy is not admissible, whatever be the mode of its authentication. (Whitacre v. McIlhany, 4 Munf. 310; Morris v. Venderen, 1 Dall. 65; Gilbert's Ev. 9.)

IV. The exemplifications of the decrees of the Board of Land Commissioners, and of the United States District Court, were properly rejected.

---

Gregory v. McPherson.

---

No objection was made to the proof of these decrees by exemplifications thereof, but only as to their competency or effect.

The objection to such decrees as evidence, was not so much because they were res inter alios acta, as for the reason that they were incompetent evidence for the purpose of which they were offered, to wit: to establish the genuineness of the alleged title of Juana Sanchez. It had appeared, before the decrees were so offered in evidence, that an appeal from the decree of the District Court had been granted. (20 How. 261; see, also, 6 Id. 106; 13 Id. 150, 151.)

Were it admitted that the proceeding in cases of California land claims before the Board of Land Commissioners, or before the Federal Courts, is a proceeding, as it is technically termed, in rem, and that therefore the final decree in such a case is binding against all persons, even then such decrees were not only incompetent for the purpose of establishing the usual necessary legal consequences of such a decree, but were still more objectionable as proofs of the supposed genuineness of the alleged expediente and grant in question. (1 Stark. Ev. 228.)

The objection of the competency of these decrees as evidence was two-fold:

1. It appeared that the decree of the Commissioners was reversed, and that the decree of the District Court was not final. (See Sanders v. Whitesides, 10 Cal. 89, 90.) An appeal suspends the judgment, and no action will lie on it. (Marshall v. Lester, 1 N. Car. Law Rep. 100.) The order granting the appeal was sufficient, and by it the cause was removed to the Appellate Court. (Buckingham v. McLean, 13 How. 151.)

2. The whole proceedings upon which the decrees were founded were not produced.

This was necessary, if the design was to prove anything more than the fact that such decrees were made. (1 Greenl. Ev. 511: Jones v. Randall, 1 Cow. 17.) In no case is a decree, standing alone, receivable to prove the facts upon the supposed existence of which it was rendered. (Stevens v. Jack, 3 Yerg R. 403; Lovell v. Arnold, 2 Munt. 267; Hollingsworth v. Barbour, 4 Pet. 466; Gilb. Ev. 7 Ed. 17.)

V. The plaintiff failed on the trial to establish, by competent

---

Gregory v. McPherson.

---

evidence, title in himself to the land in controversy, as successor in interest of Juana Sanchez de Pacheco.

The proceedings, in the Probate Court, were unauthorized and void. (Jones v. Reed, 1 John. Cas. 20.) No intendment is made in favor of the regularity of proceedings of Courts or officers of inferior or special jurisdiction. (Bloom v. Burdick, 1 Hill, 130; Denning v. Corwin, 11 Wend. 651; Van Etten v. Jilson, 6 Cal. 19; Small v. Gwinn, 6 Id. 449; Whitwell v. Barbier, 7 Id. 64; Feillett v. Engles, 8 Id. 76; Foot v. Stevens, 17 Wend. 483; Hart v. Seizas, 21 Id. 40; Haynes v. Meeks, 10 Cal. 110.)

The petition for the sale of the land did not set forth the amount of personal estate that had come to the hands of the executors, nor the condition or value of the respective portions or lots of the real estate of which the testatrix died seized, nor the ages of the heirs or devisees. (Comp. Laws 399, Secs. 154, 155.)

No officer can acquire jurisdiction by deciding that he has it. (Sibley v. Waffle, 16 N. Y. Rep. 190; Schneider v. McFarland, 2 Com. 462; Prosser v. Secor, 5 Bart. 611, 612; Harrington v. The People, 6 Barb. 610; see, also, Becket v. Selover, 7 Cal. 215; Pond v. Pond, 10 Id. 120; Schneider v. McFarland, 2 Com. 462, 463; Comp. Laws, 399, 400, Secs. 154-163.)

The requirements of the statute are not directory. The petition, setting forth the facts as required by Section 155, is necessary to give jurisdiction to the Probate Court. (Davison v. Gill, 1 East, 64; see, also, Atkins v. Kinan, 20 Wend. 249; Sheldon v. Wright, 1 Selden, 523, 624; Ford v. Wadsworth, 15 Wend. 449; Harrington v. The People, 6 Barb. 610.)

The plaintiff, as the purchaser at the sale made by the executor, was bound to show affirmatively the existence of the facts on which the right to sell was made to depend. (Sharp v. Spier, 4 Hill, 86; Striker v. Kelly, 7 Id. 29.)

Another objection to the evidence of title offered by plaintiff is, that the whole proceeding had in the Probate Court was had by one of the executors only. (Toller's Law of Executors, 30: 4 Kent's Com. 325.) Executors are but one person in law, and the acts done by one of several, relating to the delivery, sale, or release, of the testator's goods, are deemed the acts of all, for they have a joint and entire authority. (Murray v. Blatchford,

---

Chester v. Miller.

---

Bill filed to vacate and set aside a judgment in an action of forcible entry and detainer. The bill states that judgment was rendered by a Justice of the Peace, 3d September, 1856; that no process was served on the plaintiff, who was one of the defendants in that action; that execution issued on 5th of September, 1856, against the other defendants who had appeared, and that the defendants, finding that they could not make the money of those defendants, "some how" got possession of the Justice's docket, and interlined the name of the plaintiff in the judgment, and also altered the execution by a like insertion, and are proceeding now to make the money on such process. The defendant, Wilson, demurred to this complaint. The Court below overruled the demurrer.

Afterwards the defendants answered the bill, and, on the trial, a decree was rendered for the plaintiff.

The evidence, on the trial, was conflicting as to whether Chester did or did not appear by Attorney.

1. The judgment, as originally entered, and the execution, as originally issued, were entered and issued as if he had not appeared, and seem subsequently, and without notice, to have been altered. The Judge below having found that there was no appearance for Chester, on this conflicting proof, we do not feel disposed to review his judgment.

2. The only other question is, as to the remedy. Has equity jurisdiction of this case? Though not very explicitly stated, the charges in the bill amount to a charge of fraud — the fraudulent alteration of records. The remedy by appeal might suffice in ordinary cases, if the record showed a want of service as to Chester; but it seems that Chester inquired if judgment had been rendered against him, and was informed that it had not — at least, there is proof to that effect. It was not until after execution of the writ of possession, that the alteration in the writ was made. Nor is there any proof that there was notice of this alteration to Chester until it was too late to appeal from this summary judgment. It will not do to say that the judgment on the face of it was void; the plaintiff was liable to be harrassed by it, and the defendants were in the act of enforcing it against him. (2 Story's Eq. Sec. 887.)

3. It is said that the Attorney, Brocklebank, appeared for all

---

---

the parties, Chester included, and that this is evidenced by an answer to which his name is signed. But it is held that the recital of an appearance is never conclusive, and where the expression is general, it is confined to those parties who have been served with process. (Miller v. Ewing, 8 S. & M. 421; Turney v. Jordan, 4 How. Miss. 401; Dean v. McKinstry, 2 S. & M. 213; Edwards v. Tooner, 14 S. & M. 76.)

But Brocklebank does not profess in this answer — which seems to be only an amendment to an answer of Powell McDonald, signed by Clark as Attorney — to appear for the plaintiff here.

Nor does it anywhere more distinctly appear that Chester appealed from the judgment. Indeed, the evidence, if it is to be believed, shows that he neither considered himself, nor did the Justice consider him, a party affected by the judgment; for the appeal was taken by the parties for whom Clark, Blake, and Brocklebank, appeared, on the 4th of September, 1856, which was before the alteration was made in the execution.

It must be remembered that this is a highly penal statute under which judgment was obtained, and that the rule of equity, that a party must do equity before he can ask it, has no application, if that rule requires the payment of the debt in judgment, or a denial of its justice, before the party complaining of judgment, without notice to him, could go into equity to set it aside. If there be any such rule as the Appellant insists, it has no application to the case of a judgment rendered for a penalty against a party so amerced without notice.

This is not a bill in equity for a new trial, but a bill filed to set aside a judgment which was properly entered at first, in effect, for the defendant, Chester, and subsequently, without any authority, altered so as to appear as a judgment against him. The Justice of the Peace, after having entered the judgment according to law, had no right to alter it without notice to defendant, Chester, so as to make it an illegal and improper judgment. The entry of the judgment after the return of the verdict was a final act, and the alteration subsequently, at least without notice to Chester, was, if not void, such an abuse of the authority of the Justice. (Chester never having been served with process, and, therefore, not being within the power of the Court,) as to render the whole proceeding voidable at his election. The Justice might as well, six months after the first entry, have amended the judgment so as to include any other stranger to the proceeding.

Gregory v. McPherson.

---

We think the judgment should be affirmed.

APPEAL from the Seventh District.

The case is stated in the opinion of the Court.

E. W. F. Sloan, for Appellant.

I. If the copy of the grant, signed by the Governor and countersigned by the Secretary of the State, annexed to, and forming part of, the expediente in the archives of the government, is not to be regarded as primary evidence, it was admissible, as the next best evidence. (Minor v. Tillotson, 7 Pet. 99, 100; vide also, Proprietors of Braintree v. Battles, 6 Vt. 399; Renner v. Bank of Columbia, 9 Wheat. 596; The King v. Inhabitants, etc. 4 Maule & Sel. 48.)

II. 1st. The expediente was properly admissible as primary evidence—as evidence of the highest character known to the law.

It is a public record of public official acts, performed by public

---

Gregory v. McPherson.

---

agents of the government, whilst performing public duties, in disposing of portions of the public domain, preserved in a public office, under the charge and in the custody of duly constituted officials.

Records and public documents of that kind constitute the highest character of evidence, both under the rules of the civil and of the common law. (1 Starkie's Ev. 160-173; B. N. P. 229; Patterson v. Winn, 5 Pet. 241; U. S. v. Arredondo, 6 Id. 728.)

2d. If the original expediente in the public archives is to be regarded in the light of a record or public official document, a sworn copy or exemplification was properly admissible in evidence. (1 Stark. Ev. 181-185; B. N. P. 294; 1 Starkie's Rep. 183; 4 Campb. 372; 6 Cow. 751.) Not only records, but all public documents which cannot be removed from one place to another, may be proved by means of a copy proved on oath to have been examined with the original. (1 Stark. Ev. 155; Hedden v. Overton, 4 Bibb Rep. 406; Commonwealth v. Alburger, 1 Whart. 472; Kingston v. Lesley, 10 Serg. & R. 387.)

3d. It is not indispensable to the introduction of such proof, that the official signatures or seals appearing to the originals on file, should be first proved, provided they are found in the proper repository. (Ross' Lessee v. Cutshall, 1 Binn. 399; Williams v. Sheldon, 10 Wend. 659.)

4th. It was suggested in the Court below that the exemplification offered in evidence was certified to be the copy of a copy. It was certified to be a copy of the record returned into the office of the Surveyor-General of the Secretary of the Board as directed by law. In point of fact, however, it was traced from the original — the mistake is in the form of the certificate.

It has, sometimes, been held that the copy of a copy is inadmissible, solely on the ground, however, that it was not compared with the original, and, therefore, by necessity not proved to be a true copy of the original. (Winn v. Patterson, 9 Pet. 663-677.)

In this case, however, the copy offered in evidence was carefully compared with the original. As a sworn copy, therefore, there is no pretended foundation for the objection. Besides, when transcripts are made out and lodged in public officers by authority of the government, a copy therefrom cannot be objected

---

Gregory v. McPherson.

---

to as being the copy of a copy. (Videll's Heirs v. Duplantier, 9 La. 525; Hedden v. Overton, 4 Bibb, 406.)

III. The principal objection made to the decisions of the Board of Land Commissioners and the District Court, was that they were res inter alios.

Another objection has been suggested, to the effect that the Board of Commissioners did not properly constitute a Court:

"It is not essential to the reception of evidence of this nature that the inquiry should have been made by virtue of some judicial authority, and by means of witnesses examined on oath; it is sufficient if made by virtue of competent authority on behalf of the public, and on sufficient matter of public interest." (1 Stark. Ev. 168, 169; F. N. 228; Vicar of Kellington v. Trinity College, 1 Wils. 170; 4 Camp. 126; Tooker v. Duke of Beaufort, 1 Burr. 146; 4 Dow. 297, 320.)

But the proceedings before the Board are judicial. Evidence is heard, and the title to real estate tried and decided.

IV. The deed of conveyance by one of the executors to the plaintiff of the premises was sufficient to pass the estate.

It is a rule of the common law, that where a mere naked power is conferred upon two or more, as a matter of personal trust and confidence, without any provision to the effect that a less number may execute it, such power must be executed by all jointly; and there is no survivorship. (Co. Litt. 112 b; 10 Pet. 564; 2 Humph. 379.)

This was cured by the Statute of Henry 8, Chap. 4, which provided that, when part of the executors refused to take upon himself or themselves the administration, etc. then a sale by those who do act should be good.

Under the Statute of Henry 8, a mere neglect to act has been held to be a refusal. (4 Munf. 345; 4 Yerger, 16; 1 Bat. & Dev. 389; 2 Green, N. J. 383.)

Our statute goes further still. (Comp. Laws, 382, Sec. 47.)

The doctrine, however, in regard to the execution of powers of sale contained in wills has no application to the case at bar.

The sale was not made under power given by the will of Juana Sanchez de Pacheco. It was made pursuant to the decree of the Probate Court.

---

Gregory v. McPherson.

---

John Currey, for Respondent.

I. The papers offered in evidence by plaintiff, purporting to be a copy of an expediente were properly excluded.

It is questionable whether an expediente is a public record in any legal sense. If it be a public record it is of a mixed nature, partaking both of a public and private character. (1 Stark. Ev. 100; 1 Greenl. Ev. Sec. 474.) In which case it cannot be adduced by a party in support of his claim against a stranger. (1 Greenl. Ev. Sec. 493; Highland Turnpike Co. v. McKean, 10 John. 154; Rez. v. Mothersall, 1 Stra. 93.)

The word "record" imports something of more permanence than the deposit of papers in the form of an expediente in a public office.

Books of public offices, journals of legislative bodies, and official registers, are of the character of public records which, by the common law, are admissible as competent evidence of the facts they contain. (1 Greenl. Ev. 493.) But they must be accompanied by proof, that they come from the proper repository. (Id. Sec. 485; 1 Stark. Ev. 158, 183.)

Where the nature of the case admits, some proof must be given of some act done in reference to the documents offered in evidence, as a further proof of their genuineness. (1 Greenl. Ev. Sec. 143.)

The expediente, a copy of which was offered by defendant as primary evidence, was not preserved in the form of a record, but merely in the form of a deposited manuscript without even an indorsement thereon or an entry thereof to indicate when the same was deposited.

The document purporting to be a grant made by Governor Figueroa to Juana Sanchez de Pacheco, a copy of which the plaintiff alleges he offered in evidence, falls under the rule by which the competency of the expediente, as evidence per se, shall be adjudged; because such grant or copy thereof, attached to the expediente was not preserved in any book of record.

The copy of the grant offered on the part of the plaintiff requires that it should be noted or registered in the corresponding or proper book; yet it was not pretended on the trial, nor did it appear by the certificate of the Surveyor-General, that the copy

Gregory v. McPherson.

---

produced was from any book or register. (United States v. Cambuston, 20 How. 61.)

The copy of the pretended grant was a copy of the copy annexed to the expediente. A grant when made by the Governor was delivered to the grantee, and sometimes a copy thereof was annexed to the expediente, but this was not invariably the practice; and such copy did not properly constitute a part of the expediente.

The originals, of which the papers offered in evidence purported to be copies, would not, if produced, have been evidence per se of the matters therein contained; but proof of the genuineness of such originals would have been required. (1 Stark. Ev. 151, 152.)

The rule of evidence established by the authorities cited on behalf of Appellant in relation to the proof of exemplifications of the class of documents and records mentioned in those authorities, is not controverted. The answer is that an expediente and Mexican grant do not, nor do either of them, fall within any rule there mentioned. There is no great seal, or seal of a Court of record, importing verity of the document or record sought to be given in evidence.

II. The evidence of the existence of a grant, delivered, on behalf of the Mexican nation, to Juana Sanchez de Pacheco, embracing the land in controversy, was slight and unsatisfactory; and the evidence of the loss of such grant was insufficient. (1 Greenl. Ev. Sec. 558.) But before any evidence can be given of the loss of a written instrument it must appear that such instrument existed. (1 Greenl. Ev. Sec. 549.)

III. The evidence of the genuineness of the alleged existing expediente, and copy of the grant thereto annexed, by the production of a traced copy thereof, with the testimony of a witness that he had on a former occasion, at the Surveyor-General's office, examined the signatures of the various persons signed to the several documents composing such expediente, and that such signatures were genuine, was insufficient and incompetent.

Before secondary evidence can be given of a deed or other instrument of writing, a proper cause therefor should be assigned; no such cause was assigned on the trial. For aught that appeared, the custodian of the originals could have been compelled by subpoena duces tecum to have produced them. If the originals could not have been removed from their repository, still, they could have been proven by the depositions of witnesses at, or convenient to, the office of the Surveyor-General. Defendant had a right to inspect the originals.

1st. In order that he might be enabled to cross-examine the witness understandingly in relation thereto, and especially as to the question of their genuineness.

2d. In order that he might impeach them by showing that they were fraudulent and void. (1 Greenleaf's Ev. Sec. 446; Stark. Ev. 96.) The defendant insists that he had the right to see the paper, and also the writing and stamps constituting the original documents; from all, or from some portion of which, it might have appeared that the originals were fabrications for unlawful and sinister ends.

The Appellant's counsel not only relies upon the ground that the copies offered in evidence were exemplifications of a record, but that they should have been admitted as sworn copies.

The law requires the best evidence of which the nature of the thing to be proved is capable. If the best evidence cannot be obtained, the next best in degree should be produced. "Exemplifications," says Ch. Baron Gilbert, "are of better credit than any sworn copy." (Gilbert's Ev. 14; 10 Mod. 126.) If the original, or the record thereof, itself, would not be evidence, a sworn or certified copy would not. (Kerns v. Swops, 2 Watts, 75; Winn v. Patterson, 9 Peters, 676, 677.)

Before a copy can be given in evidence, it should appear that the witness by whom it is to be proved such, had compared it with the original, in the mode prescribed by law. (1 Greenl. Ev. Secs. 506, 264, 565, 566.)

The copy of the alleged grant sought to be proved by Salvio Pacheco, was but a copy of a copy. A copy of a copy is not admissible, whatever be the mode of its authentication. (Whitacre v. McIlhany, 4 Munt. 310; Morris v. Venderen, 1 Dall. 65; Gilbert's Ev. 9.)

IV. The exemplifications of the decrees of the Board of Land Commissioners, and of the United States District Court, were properly rejected.

all cases to make and exhibit an inventory of the personal estate, within six months after the grant of administration. And without any reference to that provision, he must accompany his petition for a sale of land by an account of the personal estate and debts, as far as he can discover the same. If the general inventory had been previously filed, and there was no account beyond a reference to that document, it would not, I think, be sufficient, and the order to sell could not be supported. I have already remarked that the requirement of an account is wholly independent of that relating to the inventory; the one must be furnished, although the other may be on file. There is good reason for such a rule. The administrator, before the application for a sale, may have discovered personal estate of the intestate, of which he had no knowledge at the time the inventory was filed; debts due the intestate, which were deemed bad at the time of making the inventory, may have proved available, either in whole or in part, and property which was appraised, may have advanced in value. It is, therefore, proper, as well as a plain requirement of the statute, that there should, in all cases, be an account at the time of the application for a sale of real estate."

This case, and the principles on which it rests, seem to be well supported by a long list of authorities, cited from the highest Courts of judicature.

This view is decisive of this case upon the merits. The plaintiff, upon his own showing, having no title or right to recover, the Court did not err in directing a nonsuit; nor did it err to the injury of the plaintiff in ruling out his proof; for, admitting the testimony excluded, it gave no right of action.

Several other questions have been well argued in the briefs, but it is not necessary to decide them.

Judgment affirmed.

TERRY, C. J. delivered the following opinion:

I concur in the judgment upon the ground that the proceeding to procure the sale of the property was taken, the sale conducted and the deed executed by only one of the executors of the deceased, Juana Sanchez de Pacheco, when it appears that letters testamentary were issued to two, both of whom qualified. With the last ground taken in the opinion of my associate I am in-

BALDWIN, J. delivered the opinion of the Court — TERRY, C.J. concurring.

Suit brought on a guaranty of a promissory note. "For value received, we guaranty the payment of the within note." No averment of demand or notice is made in the complaint; the defendants demurred. The Court sustained the demurrer, and the question is, whether this guaranty is an unconditional obligation to pay the amount of the note.

The authorities are conflicting in other States, and the ablest jurists are divided in opinion upon the question. Probably, in number, the preponderance is in favor of the rule of conditional liability, though it may well be questioned if the weight of argument be not on the other side. But early in the history of our jurisprudence, it has been held that notice is necessary in such cases, as in cases of indorsement, (Briggs v. Waldo, 2 Cal. 486,) and this after full discussion. Subsequently, in Pierce v. Kennedy, (5 Cal. 138,) the same doctrine was reaffirmed. Unless in cases of a manifest departure from what we esteem the true and well settled line of decision, we are not disposed to overrule the solemn decisions of the Court, for a long time acquiesced in, and which, probably, have furnished standards by which the contracts and business of the State have been regulated.

Judgment affirmed.

CASES DETERMINED

THE SUPREME COURT

JULY TERM, 1859.

THE PEOPLE v. KEENAN.

In a criminal case, if the Court below impose upon counsel, against their consent, a limitation of time for argument before the jury, it is done at the risk of a new trial, if it be shown by the uncontradicted affidavits of the counsel, that the prisoner was deprived, by the limitation, of the opportunity of a full defense; for this is his constitutional right, without which he cannot be lawfully convicted.

Courts have a large discretion over the conduct of proceedings before them, and may limit counsel to reasonable time. But in capital cases this should be done, if at all, only in very extraordinary and peculiar instances.

APPEAL from the Fifteenth District.

For facts see opinion.

BALDWIN, J. delivered the opinion of the Court — TERRY, C. J. concurring.

The defendant was convicted of the crime of murder in the first degree, and now appeals from the judgment.

Without noticing other errors, it is sufficient for the disposition of this case to consider a single point made by the prisoner's counsel.

The bill of exceptions states:

People v. Keenan.

"And be it further remembered that, on the trial of said cause the Court, before the counsel commenced their argument and after the evidence was closed, ruled that each counsel in the case should be restricted to an hour and a half in making his argument to the jury, to which ruling of the Court, defendant, by his counsel, then and there duly excepted, on the ground that there was no rule of the Court, nor ever had been any rule of the Court, established, restricting counsel to any particular length of time in the argument of a criminal case before a jury; and on the ground that the evidence, so far as proving the charge against defendant laid in indictment was concerned, was altogether circumstantial and presumptive, and very voluminous, being the evidence of some fourteen different witnesses, many of whom were examined at great length, so that that length of time would be quite insufficient for counsel for defendant to do their client full and ample justice in the argument of said cause. The Court overruled the objection, and the defendant, by his counsel, then and there excepted.

And be it further remembered that, on the trial of said cause, when C. F. Lott, one of defendant's counsel, had argued said cause to the jury an hour and a half, (the time allowed by the ruling of the Court,) and was stopped by the Court, that he, said C. F. Lott, one of defendant's counsel, moved for further time in which to finish his argument to the jury, stating as a reason therefor that he had not had sufficient time to answer all the arguments of the counsel for the people, who opened the argument to the jury, and had not had time to do justice to his client in the argument of the cause by noticing all the circumstances and evidence connected with the case — which motion the Court then and there overruled, and to which ruling of the Court the defendant, by his counsel, then and there duly excepted."

Afterwards, on motion for a new trial, the counsel for the prisoner filed affidavits as follows:

"State of California, County of Butte — District Court, Fifteenth Judicial District:

The People v. Keenan, charged with murder. Charles F. Lott, being duly sworn says, that he is one of the counsel for defendant in this cause, that in the argument of said cause to the jury, he was limited to one hour and a half; that at the expiration of said time he wished to proceed with the argument further to the jury, and that the Court would not allow him to do so unless the further time should be taken from the allotted time of this colleague, which affiant refused to do.

That it was utterly impossible to present a full and fair argument of the cause of defendant to the jury in that time, there being fourteen witnesses examined, and the testimony being voluminous and all circumstantial, and that he believes the case of defendant was prejudiced by said rule of the Court, made after the evidence was closed to the jury.

"State of California, County of Butte — Fifteenth Judicial District Court, November Term, 1858:

The People of the State of California v. H. Keenan. Thomas Wells, being duly sworn, says, that at the recent trial of defendant in the above entitled cause, he was one of said defendant, Keenan's, counsel; that by the ruling of the Court, restricting counsel of defendant to one hour and a half, he, affiant, was deprived of noticing several important points of the evidence, and many of the material facts and circumstances in the case, that the same were evidence, facts, and circumstances, which affiant verily believes that it was his duty to have noticed in the argument of said cause, if he had had an opportunity of so doing; and affiant further states that many points — material ones — were presented to the jury in said cause by the evidence and arguments of the Prosecuting Attorney, which, in the limited time allowed by the ruling of the Court, he could not notice, review, answer, or explain, to the jury, and that affiant verily believes that thereby the rights of his client, Hubert Keenan, were prejudiced.

Nothing appears upon the record contradicting the facts recited in these affidavits.

We do not dispute the right of the District Judge to control and direct the proceedings of the Court, so that the time be not wasted in arguments, disputes, and contentions, having no tendency to bring about a fair and legal disposition of judicial business. An enlarged discretion must necessarily be given him over this subject; and we should certainly with great reluctance disturb the exercise of that discretion in any given case. Nor do we here question the right of a District Judge to limit counsel to a reasonable time in their arguments to the jury, though from the danger to which this power is exposed, it is, perhaps, better, if ever done at all in capital cases, that it should only be done in very extraordinary and peculiar instances. It is, unquestionably, a constitutional privilege of the accused to be fully heard by his counsel. An opportunity must be afforded him for full and complete defense; and it is very difficult for a Judge to determine what effect a given line of argument may have upon a jury, of some one of them, or what period may be necessary to enable counsel to present, in the aspect deemed by them important, the case of their client. The minds of men are so differently constituted, that one advocate may require much more time for the statement and elaboration of his views than another. These observations apply with particular force to cases depending upon circumstantial testimony, where law and fact are so intimately blended that it is frequently necessary to argue the law to the jury in connection with matters of proof. It is impossible to deny that, if the constitutional privilege of being heard by counsel, be allowed at all, it must be so admitted as that the prisoner may have the benefit of a complete discussion of all the matters of law and evidence embraced by the case. In this instance, the Court limited the time for the argument against the prisoner's consent: at the expiration of that time, the counsel applied for an extension of it; and the affidavits of counsel of respectability and standing show that they were prevented by this restriction from a full and fair defense of their client; and this showing is fortified by the nature of the case, and the large mass of testimony before the jury.

The Court below erred in refusing to grant the new trial. If it imposes a limitation of time upon counsel against their consent, this must be done at the risk of a new trial, if it be shown by uncontradicted affidavits that the prisoner was deprived by the limitation of the opportunity of a full defense: for this is his constitutional right, without which, he cannot be lawfully convicted.

---

Judgment reversed, and cause remanded for a new trial.

PRADER v. GRIM & COOPER.

~~The usual bond being given, an order was made to show cause (Aug. 29th) why an injunction should not issue. A restraining order, "in the meantime," was issued. The case was continued until Oct. 10th, when, on hearing, the order was dissolved, injunction denied, and suit dismissed. Action on the bond. Held, that the restraining order embraces the time between its issuance and the hearing, and that damages may be had beyond Aug. 29th.~~

~~Counsel fees for dissolving this order are recoverable on the bond. And this, though the fee was paid after August 29th, provided the retainer were before.~~

APPEAL from the Sixth District.

The case is stated by the Court. The Court below, having ruled out all evidence of damage after August 29th, nonsuited plaintiff. The rulings will be understood by reference to the brief of Appellant. Plaintiff appeals.

Smith & Hardy, for Appellant.

1st. The restraining order was continued from time to time in the Court below, and the sureties were responsible during its continuance.

2d. The Court below erred in excluding evidence of the payment of counsel fees for the dissolving of the injunction. (Alb. Thae v. Quan Wan et al. 3 Cal. 217.)

3d. The Court below erred in ruling as matter of law that the restraining order terminated on the 29th day of August, 1856, and was not in force after that time. The order to show cause at that time was to bring the restrained party into Court, and the party was in Court, and under control of the restraining order until discharged or relieved by order of the Court.

---

The defendants were sureties. The only question is, what did the sureties undertake? Simply to be responsible for any damages that might accrue up to the day to show cause why an injunction should not issue. A surety is only liable according to the strict letter of his undertaking. (McGovern et al. v. State of Ohio, 20 Ohio, 93, and cases cited.)

Again: The statute does not provide for an undertaking upon an order to show cause. (Pr. Act, Sec. 116.) And this cannot be enforced as a common law agreement. Besides, unless authorized by statute, it being an undertaking to pay the debt or obligation of another, should express the consideration.

The plaintiff was not entitled to counsel fees for dissolving injunction. There was nothing to be dissolved. The temporary order granted, expired by its own limitation. The order staying, etc. until that time, was not a question after it was granted.

Again: Another undertaking was required and given before the motion for an injunction was argued, and by different sureties.

It is not alleged that any counsel fees were paid to procure the dissolution of an injunction, but merely to defend the suit upon its merits.

BALDWIN, J. delivered the opinion of the Court — TERRY, C. J. concurring.

The defendants are sureties on an undertaking, executed to procure for one White a temporary injunction restraining the plaintiff from transferring or disposing of certain property, etc.

The Judge made an order in this form: "On filing the complaint in this cause, and bond in the sum of one thousand dollars, let the defendants show cause before this Court on Friday next, the 29th August, 1856, at the opening of the Court on that day, why an injunction should not issue in accordance with the prayer of the complaint; and in the meantime let an order issue restraining the defendants, as prayed for in said complaint." The order issued, after reciting these matters, and the citation to appear on the 29th August, proceeds: "In the meantime you, the said Prader, are enjoined," etc.

The undertaking was made by defendants to Joseph Prader,

William A. Prader, and Prescott Robinson (Receiver), and after reciting the facts, is conditioned generally to pay damages.

The case was continued, nothing having been done by the Court in reference to this preliminary order of injunction until the 20th September, when, upon a showing by the plaintiff here, the Court required a new bond of White, in the penalty of two thousand five hundred dollars, which was given, with new sureties.

On the 10th October, afterward, the Court dissolved the restraining order, and the motion of White for injunction was denied. On the 27th of the same month White's suit was dismissed.

The damages complained of are for injury sustained by the plaintiff between the giving of the first and second bond; and plaintiff insisted that he was entitled to recover damages after the day set for the hearing of the motion for this preliminary injunction, viz.: 29th August, 1856, and also for an Attorney's fee for procuring the injunction to be dissolved.

The first question turns on the meaning of the order, for the undertaking is broad enough to cover these damages, unless restrained by the order. The order did not spend its force on the day set for the hearing. The restraint was not designed to be limited by a date, but by an event. The order was made to give the Court an opportunity of acting on the application, and to keep the property in litigation within the power of the Court until it did so act.

The language of the order is not that the defendant be restrained in the meantime, but in the meantime let an order issue restraining, etc. If, however, this were the language, the proper meaning, probably, would be, that the interim spoken of was designed to embrace the period intervening between the date of the mandate and the hearing of the application. If, from any cause, the Judge took no order on the 29th August, the defendant could not have removed the property. If this be the true construction of this order, as we think it is, the Court erred in refusing to permit the plaintiff to prove damages beyond the 29th August.

If the counsel fee were for procuring the dissolution of, and defending against, this order, that is a ground of "recovery"

Prader v. Purkett.

---

within the meaning of the undertaking; and this though the actual payment of the money were beyond the time limited, if the retainer were before. (3 Cal. 217.)

But, for the first error assigned, the judgment must be reversed and cause remanded.

PRADER v. PURKETT et al.

Even if a Chancellor has no power, under the 116th Section of the Practice Act, to require an undertaking upon the issuance of the restraining order, still, having taken jurisdiction of the general subject of litigation, he has power, aside from the statute, to order such undertaking, or to make any other order in the progress of the case, for the furtherance of the objects of the litigation, and the protection of its subject matter.

An undertaking in such case, reciting, that it is made in pursuance of the order of Court requiring a bond in the suit in which a restraining order was already in force, sufficiently expresses a consideration. The order for the bond and the undertaking must be taken together.

The pendency of a suit between parties at the time of issuing a restraining order, is sufficient to give the Court jurisdiction to issue the order. And the regularity of its exercise cannot be collaterally impeached.

Where there are several obligees in such an undertaking promising to pay "said parties enjoined," etc. suit may be brought in the name of one alone, if he be beneficially entitled to the fruits of the recovery.

Summers v. Farish, (10 Cal. 350,) affirmed.

APPEAL from the Sixth District.

August, 1856, Ami M. White obtained a restraining order from the Sixth District Court, in a suit by her against plaintiff, Joseph Prader and Prescott Robinson. This order was issued by the Judge, before complaint filed, in a usual form, thus: "On filing the complaint in this cause, and bond in the sum of, etc. let defendant show cause, etc. why an injunction should not issue, and in the meantime let an order issue restraining," etc. Upon the hearing of the rule against defendants, made at the same time, to show cause why an injunction should not issue, the District Court made an order requiring said Ami White to file a new bond in the sum of twenty-five hundred dollars in said cause. The complaint in this suit then avers, that, "in pursuance of which order, and in consideration of the continuance of the restraining order aforesaid, the defendants, J. H. Purkett and Mark Sheldon, on the part of said Ami M. White in the suit aforesaid, executed a bond in words and figures as follows, to wit:

---

Prader v. Purkett.

---

“ District Court of the Sixth Judicial District:

Ami M. White v. Joseph Prader et al.

Whereas, by an order of Court, made on the 20th day of September, 1856, the plaintiff was required to file a bond in the sum of twenty-five hundred dollars in this suit, wherein was granted an injunction order restraining and enjoining, Wm. A. Prader and P. Robinson, Rec. etc. now therefore, we the undersigned, residents of the county of San Francisco, in consideration of the premises and of the issuing of the said injunction orders, do jointly and severally undertake, in the sum of twenty-five hundred dollars, that the said plaintiff will pay to the said parties enjoined such damages, not exceeding the said sum of twenty-five hundred dollars as said party may sustain by reason of said order of injunction, if the said District Court finally decide that the said plaintiff was not entitled thereto. Dated this 29th of September, 1856.

(Signed)

J. H. PURKETT,
MARK SHELDON.”

The complaint further avers, that Joseph Prader and Robinson, two of the obligees in the bond, were nominal parties to the suit, the entire interest being in the plaintiff herein.

Defendants demurred for defect of parties, and want of facts to constitute cause of action. Demurrer sustained, and final judgment for defendants. Plaintiff appeals.

Hoge & Wilson, for Respondents.

1. This action is not on the usual undertaking executed on procuring an injunction in pursuance of Sec. 115 of the Practice Act.

2. No injunction was ever issued, but only an order to show cause why an injunction should not issue, and in the meantime, there was a restraining order under Sec. 116 of the Practice Act. The statute makes no provision for any undertaking under this section.

3. The instrument sued on has no seal — is no bond at all — it is a mere common law simple contract, and must be tested by the law applicable to such contracts. It has no legal consideration on its face. That form, if under seal, might be good, the seal importing a consideration. If, in pursuance of the statute,

Prader v. Purkett.

---

it might draw force and validity from it, as it stands it is a mere nude pact on its face. The complaint shows no consideration sufficient to bind these defendants outside of the face of the instrument.

4. The defendants being sureties, "have a right to stand upon the very terms of their contract." (Miller v. Stewart, 9 Wheat. 680; Chitty on Cont. 527.) The terms of the undertaking and its plain meaning as a common law simple contract (if a contract at all,) are to pay all the defendants in the original suit such damages — that is, joint damages — as they might sustain by reason of that restraining order. There were three obligees. This action is only brought by one of the obligees, and it is alleged that the other two suffered no damage.

On this instrument, no individual damage to one is recoverable. There is then no breach of the instrument. It is not the case of a proper breach, and the right to recover for that breach vested in one by assignment or operation of law. There never was any joint damage, and none other is embraced in the plain language of the instrument.

This (if anything,) is a "contract for the payment of one sum to three parties," and all three should be "properly joined as plaintiffs." (Wallis et al. v. Dilley et al. 7 Md. 237; see, also, Armstrong v. Robinson, 5 Gill & J. 413; Elbe v. Purdy, 6 Wend. 630-632, and cases cited; Clover v. Painter, 2 Barr, 47.)

5. The restraining order was made by the Judge before the complaint was filed, and consequently he had no jurisdiction or power to make it. It was a nullity.

If the original restraining order was a nullity, there was nothing upon which a continuance could operate, and plaintiff was never enjoined or restrained at all.

Smith & Hardy, for Appellants, cited: Summers v. Parish, (10 Cal. 347.)

BALDWIN, J. delivered the opinion of the Court — TERRY, C. J. concurring.

This is an action on an undertaking executed in a chancery case, pursuant to the order of the Judge for a temporary injunction. It is objected that the statute does not provide for an undertaking in such a case. But whether this point be sustained by a right interpretation of the statute or not, we think that as the Chancellor had taken jurisdiction of the general subject, he had power to make this order as any other order in the progress of the case, for the furtherance of the objects of the litigation, and the protection of the subject matter of it.

---

Gregory v. Haynes.

---

2. It is next objected that the paper is void because expressing no consideration. But taking the order and the undertaking together, we think it does sufficiently express the consideration.

3. The order under which this undertaking was executed was made on the 29th of September, 1856, and we understand that at that time there was a suit pending between the parties mentioned in the complaint. This was enough to give the Court jurisdiction and the regularity of the exercise of it cannot be collaterally impeached.

4. The suit was properly brought in the name of the party beneficially entitled to the fruits of recovery, though there were several obligees, as we held in the case of Summers v. Farish, (10 Cal. 350.)

We think the demurrer was improperly sustained.

Judgment reversed, and cause remanded.

On rehearing, BALDWIN, J. at the July Term, 1860, delivered the opinion of the Court — FIELD, C. J. and CORN, J. concurring.

We passed on this case at a former term. We have since reviewed the opinion, at the instance of the Respondent's counsel. We see nothing to change the judgment before directed; and nothing in the points, which are purely technical, requiring further elaboration. The former opinion is adopted as explanatory of the grounds of our decision.

Judgment reversed, and cause remanded.

GREGORY v. HAYNES et al.

A DECREE reciting that "this action having been continued, in consequence of the death of the plaintiff, by his executor, Samuel Webb, and the jury having found a verdict for the plaintiff, it is now ordered," etc. clearly shows the suggestion of the death of the original plaintiff, and a continuance of the cause or a revival of it, in the name of the executor. At all events, any irregularity in this respect cannot be attacked collaterally.

Gregory v. Haynes.

A purchaser of land subsequent to a suit brought against his vendors to quiet title, and to a notice of Ms pendens filed in the County Recorder's office, is a mere volunteer, who takes subject to any decree in the suit.

This decree is conclusive as to plaintiff, who was the executor of deceased, with general power under the will to sell the real estate of his testator, and conclusive as to the defendants and their vendee, the purchaser here.

A defendant in ejectment, entering under a deed executed by order of a Court of competent jurisdiction, enters under color of title. He is not a naked trespasser, and may set up an outstanding title in a third person.

Mere prior possession of land, cannot prevail against the present possession of defendant, taken under claim of title derived, regularly or not, from the rightful owner.

Defendant had been let into possession under judgment in ejectment by him against C. This judgment is afterwards reversed. C sells to G. Held, that defendant's possession was sufficient, until restored by due course of law, to break the force of the claim of G, based upon the prior possession of C.

If an executor, claiming power under a will to sell, and in possession under judgment against C as above, execute a deed to defendant, who takes possession thereunder, then defendant can set up outstanding title in the executor or his testator, as against C, even though he could not, from defects in his deed, or want of power in the executor, assert title against the estate of deceased.

Quere, whether, under our statute, an executor with power in the will to sell real estate, may not sell without the preliminary proceedings required for the sale of real estate of deceased persons to pay debts; and, whether such sale would be a nullity, if approved by the Probate Court?

APPEAL from the Fourth District.

The facts appear in the opinion.

John Gregory, Appellant, in person.

The positions taken by Appellant appear in the opinion of the Court. And, as authorities were not cited, it is not deemed necessary to give the argument.

Robert C. & Daniel Rogers, for Respondent, as to the effect of the decree in the suit of Wenborne v. Barton & Wife, cited: 1 Gr. Ev. Sec. 528; Harvey v. Richards, 2 Gall. 229; Hibshman v. Dulleshan, 5 Watts, 183; 1 Salk. 276; 3 Id. 151; 3 East, 346; Emburg v. Connor, 3 Com. 522; Marsh v. Pier, 4 Rawle, 288, 289; 17 Serg. & R. 319-324; and argued, as to the point, that the death of Wenborne was not properly suggested; that the decree cannot be for this attacked collaterally; and, further, that there was no irregularity. (Stearns v. Aguirre, 7 Cal. 443.)

The principle that a defendant must connect himself with the outstanding title has never been adopted, except where the action is brought solely upon prior actual possession, and where the defendant is a mere trespasser. (Bird v. Lisbras, 9 Cal. 1.)

Appellant relies upon strict title alone.

The title to the premises was in Wenborne before the alleged

---

Gregory v. Haynes

second conveyance was made by Boston and wife to Calderwood, as was conclusively shown by the judgment in the suit of Wenborne v. Boston & Wife. (Littleton v. Cross, 3 B. & C. 317.)

Webb having been put in possession by decree of Court in the ejectment against Calderwood, had both title and possession. The decree was conclusive. (McPherson v. Cunliff, 11 Serg. & R. 422; Snyder v. Sugden, 6 Binn. 429.) So with the order of the Probate Court directing the executor to make a deed to C. C. Webb.

BALDWIN, J. delivered the opinion of the Court — TERRY, J. J. concurring.

Ejectment for a lot in San Francisco. The complaint sets forth a deraignment of title from Hyde, Alcalde of San Francisco, in 1847, through a number of mesne conveyances to the plaintiff. The answer admits the original source of title; but denies that, on the 3d day of June, 1854, when one Sarah Boston, and William Boston, her husband, conveyed the lot to one David Calderwood, they had title to the same, as complaint charges. and defendants therefore deny that the said Sarah and William conveyed the property to David Calderwood. The plaintiff claims in his complaint, title by or through this conveyance.

The answer sets up, further, that on the 13th of February, 1854, William Boston and Sarah Boston, by their Attorney in fact, specially constituted, conveyed to a certain John A. Wenborne the premises in question; that Wenborne died on the 4th June, 1854, leaving a will, wherein Samuel Webb was left his executor, with power to sell his estate without order of sale: that on the 25th September, afterwards, Samuel Webb sold this property to C. C. Webb, which sale was confirmed by the Probate Court, and on the 29th February, 1856, C. C. Webb sold and conveyed to defendant, Haynes.

The answer sets up a further defense: that on the 18th May, 1854, Wenborne, then being in life, filed a bill to quiet title to the premises, in the Superior Court of San Francisco. The bill was filed against William Boston and wife—a notice of lis pendens was filed at the same time in the office of the County Recorder. The suit was tried on the——day of October, 1854, and a verdict rendered for the plaintiffs, and a decree rendered in accordance with this finding.

Gregory v. Haynes.

---

The present case was tried by a jury, and a verdict for the defendants rendered, and judgment accordingly.

On the trial, divers exceptions were taken by the plaintiff, and these constitute the matters for revision on appeal.

It will be observed that the plaintiff, in deraigning his title, shows that on the 3d of June, 1854, Boston and wife conveyed to Calderwood. This was by quitclaim deed. To break this chain of title, the defendants aver that before this time, viz: on the 13th of February, 1854, Boston and wife conveyed, by their Attorney in fact, to Wenborne, from whom the defendants deduce title, and the defendants further assert that in May, 1854, Wenborne brought suit to quiet title, a notice of lis pendens being filed. A decree was rendered in this suit in October, 1854.

Several objections are made to this decree: 1. It is said that it was rendered after the death of Wenborne, and is therefore void. We do not understand the record as showing this fact. The decree is: "This action having been continued, in consequence of the death of the plaintiff, by his executor, Samuel Webb, and the jury having found a verdict for the plaintiff, it is now ordered," etc. We think this recital clearly shows, whether with formality or not, the suggestion of the death of the original plaintiff, and a continuance of the cause, or a revival of it, in the name of the executor. If there was any irregularity in all this, it cannot be corrected in this collateral way.

The effect of the lis pendens was to make a subsequent purchaser from Boston and wife a mere volunteer, affected by the judgment rendered, or which might be rendered in the suit, of the pendency of which notice was given.

The next suggestion is as to the effect of this decree. This suit embraced the precise matter in controversy here, that is to say, the title to this property. The plaintiff, Wenborne, claimed the title as against Boston and wife, and Webb was the executor of Wenborne, with general power to sell the real estate of his testator. He had qualified and taken upon himself the executorial office. The decree was, therefore, conclusive as to the plaintiff, Webb, and Boston and wife, and equally so as to the vendee of Boston and wife becoming such subsequently to the suit, and the filing of the lis pendens. It is argued, however, that there was some proof of prior possession by Calderwood.

Gregory v. Haynes.

and the plaintiff, or his predecessors, and that no connection was shown between the defendants and the title of Webb or Wenborne; and it is argued that the defendants could not, therefore, shelter themselves under the outstanding title of Webb or Wenborne, and that they had none in themselves.

For the purpose of showing a connection between the claim of defendants and the title of the executor, a paper purporting to be an order of confirmation of sale of the premises to C. C. Webb by the executor, was produced. This order was made by the Probate Court, and recited the will, the appointment and qualification of the executor, and his report of a sale of the property of the testator under the directions of the will, and a sale of the lot to C. C. Webb; and it confirms the sale and orders a deed to be made to the purchaser. The deed from the executor to C. C. Webb, and from the latter to the defendant, was shown. The will was offered by the defendants, but, for some reason, excluded by the Court.

It is very true that this Court has held that a mere trespasser cannot set up an outstanding title in a third person. (Bequette v. Caulfield, 4 Cal. 278.) But this rule does not cover the case at bar. The defendants entering under a deed executed under order of a Court of competent jurisdiction, entered under color of title. They do not stand in the condition of a naked trespasser. Whether the title was good or not, there was an entry shown under claim of title. But as in the action of Webb, Executor, v. Boston & Wife, the effect of the decree was to declare the title in the executor, additional force is given to this view. We do not see how the mere fact of a prior possession by Calderwood or Gregory, could prevail against the present possession of defendant, taken under claim of title derived, whether regularly or not, from the rightful owner. (Jackson v. Morse, 16 Johns. 197.)

But, in addition to this, there was evidence tending to show that the executor, Webb, had been let into possession under judgment in ejectment by him against Calderwood, before Calderwood's sale to Gregory, and though this judgment was afterwards reversed, yet this possession was sufficient, until restored by due course of law, to break the force of the claim derived from the mere fact of prior possession. If the executor of Wenborne, claiming power to sell and the right of possession, executed a deed to C. C. Webb, who sold and conveyed to the plaintiff, and the latter took possession accordingly; and, especially, if Webb had before recovered and taken the actual possession, we think, even if the defendants could assert no title as against the estate of Wenborne, there would be enough in these facts to justify the defendants in setting up this outstanding title, under which they assumed to enter.

It is not necessary to pass upon the title of the defendants, as the facts are not fully before us. But, it is not shown, that, under our statute, an executor, with power in the will to sell the real estate, is forbidden to sell without taking the preliminary proceedings prescribed by the general law for the sale of real estate of deceased persons, when necessary for paying debts, and especially, that such sale would be a nullity if approved by the Probate Court. But it is not necessary for us to decide this.

Various other points are made in the briefs, but it is not necessary to notice them, the view we have taken of the case being decisive of it on the merits.

Judgment affirmed.

SMITH v. SPARROW.

Levitt v. Tobias, 10 Cal. 577, and King v. Huggins, 5 Cal. 82, affirmed. Where suit is pending in one Court on a note of defendant, though no summons has been served and no appearance made, he cannot bring a bill in equity, in another Court, to enjoin the collection of the note, or to cancel it, the averment being, simply, that he has a good defense to the note.

APPEAL from the Thirteenth District.

The complaint avers in substance that, in settlement of a transaction between the parties, plaintiff gave defendant a note. That, afterwards, discovering the amount was too much, in consequence of deceit practised by defendant, plaintiff induced defendant to make a new computation of interest, etc. and to agree to surrender the note upon payment by plaintiff of twenty-six hundred and fifty dollars, about one-half the note. That he paid the money, defendant took it, and then refused to surrender the note. Prayer for an injunction against suit on the note, and for surrender, etc. etc.

Smith v. Sparrow.

Defendant demurred, and the demurrer was overruled; but the Court sustained a plea in abatement, that defendant, before the commencement of this suit, had brought suit on the note in the Twelfth District Court, which suit was there pending, although defendant therein (plaintiff here) had not been served with process.

Plaintiff appeals from a judgment dismissing his bill.

D. W. Perley, for Appellant, argued: that filing a complaint, and issuing a summons in one District Court, there being neither service nor appearance, do not give that Court exclusive jurisdiction, so that no other suit between the same parties, touching the same subject matter, can be entertained by another District Court, until the final disposition of the first suit. When the Respondent, on the 14th day of March, filed his complaint in the Twelfth District Court, that Court obtained jurisdiction of the subject matter of that suit; but it did not then obtain, nor has it yet obtained jurisdiction of the person of the defendant in that suit. (Johnson v. Comstock, 6 Hill, 10; Brown v. Ferguson, 2 Denio, 196.)

The Practice Act, providing that suits shall be commenced by filing the complaint, and issuing summons, does not prescribe the time when the Court shall obtain exclusive jurisdiction. Jurisdiction, to be exclusive, must be both of the person and subject matter, and the Court which first obtains jurisdiction of both, must try the whole case. The District Court for the county of Stanislaus, first obtained this jurisdiction over both, and erred, therefore, in sustaining the plea in abatement.

BALDWIN, J. delivered the opinion of the Court — TERRY, C. J. concurring.

We think the Court below did not err to the prejudice of the Appellant in dismissing his bill. The bill alleges merely that the plaintiff has a legal defense to a promissory note held by the defendant. In Lewis v. Tobias, (10 Cal. 577,) we held that equity will not interfere in such cases, unless under peculiar circumstances. We do not understand this to be a proceeding under the 527th Section of the Practice Act. If it were, it comes within the principle of Kiny v. Hall & Huggins, (5 Cal. 82.)

LIENING, PUBLIC ADMINISTRATOR v. GOULD.

PLEADINGS in Justices' Courts are not held to much strictness. Where plaintiff avers he is administrator in fact of the intestate, and this is not denied in the answer, no further proof of plaintiff's right to sue is requisite. Paying part of a note when all is due is no consideration for an agreement to extend the time of payment. If, after verdict, no motion be made for new trial, the Supreme Court will not review the testimony.

APPEAL from the County Court, Colusa County.

Suit in a Justice's Court by plaintiff, as Public Administrator, on a note of defendant to one Kurtz, deceased.

The complaint sets out the note, avers plaintiff to be administrator in fact of the estate of John Kurtz, deceased, and that defendant has promised to pay, etc.

Defendant answered by claiming that deceased had made him a gift of the note, had agreed to extend the time of payment to the fall of 1858, this suit having been brought in May, and plead a set-off of thirty-five dollars.

The Justice gave plaintiff judgment for the amount of the note and interest, less the thirty-five dollars. Defendant appealed to the County Court, where plaintiff had verdict and judgment for the whole note.

Defendant asked the Court to instruct the jury "as in case of nonsuit," because plaintiff had failed to make proof of his letters of administration. The Court refused, and defendant excepted. Defendant appeals.

L. Sanders, Jr. for Appellant, relied mainly on the want of proof of letters of administration, citing: 2 Chit. Pl. 24-36; 1 Chit. 358.

No motion for new trial is necessary to enable this Court to correct errors of law. (Brown v. Tolles, 7 Cal.)

N. Greene Curtis & George Cadwalader, for Respondent.

Fairchild v. The California Stage Company.

---

There being no motion for new trial, this Court will not review the testimony. (Ingraham v. Gildermeister, 2 Cal. R. 483.) Nor will it interfere with a verdict on conflicting testimony.

BALDWIN, J. delivered the opinion of the Court — TERRY, C. J. concurring.

The points of Appellant are not well taken. Pleadings in Justices' Courts are not held to much strictness. The complaint is substantially good. The plaintiff alleges that he is administrator in fact of the intestate. This is not denied in the answer. The failure to make the proof of the plaintiff's title to sue, therefore, was no ground for a nonsuit.

There was no consideration for the alleged agreement of extension; paying a part of a note was not enough when all was due.

The only matter in controversy really was as to the credit of thirty-five dollars claimed by defendant, as to which the proof was somewhat conflicting.

We do not see that any statement appears so authenticated as to enable us to review the testimony; for there was no motion for a new trial; but we should not, under the circumstances, be disposed to interfere if a motion had been made for a new trial, and a proper statement settled.

Judgment affirmed.

FAIRCHILD v. THE CALIFORNIA STAGE COMPANY.

IN suits against common carriers, damages for pain of mind are recoverable. Proprietors of stage coaches are not insurers or warrantors of the safety of passengers, to the same extent with common carriers of goods. But they are liable for the slightest neglect. They are held to extraordinary diligence and care. And, in case of injury, the presumption, prima facie, is, that it occurred by the negligence of the coachman. The onus probandi is on the proprietors to show no negligence, and, that the injury was occasioned by inevitable casualty, or by some cause which human care and foresight could not prevent. It is not error for a Court to refuse an instruction asked, stating an abstract or general proposition of law, when it has already so charged the jury as to embrace such proposition, or so much of it as is applicable to the case. If the ends of justice require, it is both the right and the duty of the Court to permit a witness to be recalled, after a party has closed his case.

APPEAL from the Tenth District.

Fairchild v. The California Stage Company.

---

In addition to the instructions set forth in the opinion, the others referred to are as follows:

Second Instruction. — “That if the jury believe that a want of proper skill or care of the driver, placed the passengers in a state of peril, and they had at that time a reasonable ground for supposing that the stage would upset, or that the driver was incapable of managing his horses, the plaintiff is entitled to recover, although the jury may believe, from the position in which the stage was placed by the negligence and recklessness of the driver, that the movement of a portion of the passengers may have increased the peril, and even caused the stage to upset. In such a case the fault is first with the driver, and the defendants are liable.”

Seventh Instruction. — “If the jury find that the defendants were carriers of passengers, then the law requires that they should employ drivers having competent skill, well acquainted with the road they undertake to drive over, and they must provide them with steady horses, a coach, and harness, of sufficient strength and properly made, and the coach must be properly loaded. If there is the least failure in any of those things the duty of the coach proprietors is not fulfilled, and they are responsible for any injury or damage that happens on the account thereof.”

On the trial, the defendant asked the following “instruction,” which was refused:

“That if the jury believe from the evidence, the driver of defendant’s stage coach used all due and necessary diligence, and that the upsetting of the stage-coach was the result of accident or misfortune, then they should find for the defendants.”

Reardan & Smith, for Appellant, to the point that carriers of passengers are responsible only for want of due care and skill, cited: Burke v. C. & O. R. R. 13 Wend. 626; Boycs v. Audum, 2 Pet. 156; Mauvy v. Talmy, 2 McLean, 161, 162; 9 Met. 13 — 15; 21 Conn. 253; 2 Greenl. Ev. Sec. 253 and note, and Sec. 267, and note; 21 Wend. 618; 2 Kent, 769.

Fairchild v. The California Stage Company.

---

The admission of new evidence, if any was offered after close by defendant, was matter of discretion in the District Court. (6 Barb. 132.)

BALDWIN, J. delivered the opinion of the Court — TERRY, C. J. concurring.

This action was brought to recover damages for certain injuries sustained by the plaintiff by the careless overturning of a stage-coach in which she was a passenger. A verdict was rendered for the plaintiff for two thousand two hundred and fifty dollars damages. A motion for a new trial was made and overruled.

The main questions arise on certain instructions given and refused. It is not deemed necessary to notice at large the points — that the evidence did not warrant the verdict, and that the damages are excessive. We have read the body of proofs in the case, and think that they make a proper subject of inquiry for a jury, whose verdict either way we would not disturb. Nor, if the injury to the plaintiff be anything like as great as some of the medical witnesses suppose, is there any pretense for the interposition of this Court, on the ground of a gross mistake, or palpable abuse of discretion of the jury in assessing damages.

We proceed to consider the instructions: "It is objected that the second instruction asked by the plaintiff should not have been given, because it assumes the fact of recklessness of the driver," etc. But this is a misapprehension on the part of the counsel. We understand the charge to be hypothetical.

2. The third instruction is objected to, but it seems that instruction was refused.

3. The fourth instruction is objected to, because it asserts that the plaintiff, if entitled to recover, may recover damages for "mental anguish." We cannot see why compensation should not as well be given for pain of mind as pain of body.

4. The seventh instruction is objected to, because it assumes deficiencies which did not exist. We think there is nothing in the objection.

It is next objected that the Court erred in not giving the first and fifth instruction asked for by the defendant.

Fairchild v. The California Stage Company.

---

The first is in these words: "That the proprietors of a stage-coach do not warrant the safety of passengers in the character of common carriers."

This was refused. It is evident that this refusal was not based upon the denial of the proposition asserted, for the Court had already, in a variety of forms, given clear indications of a different opinion, and afterward, in several distinct instructions, gave, in effect, and in clearer and more concrete form, the proposition asked, to the jury.

The converse of the principle embodied in the instruction cannot be maintained. It is true that proprietors of stage-coaches are common carriers, and that common carriers are insurers or warrantors (with two or three exceptions) of the goods they undertake to carry; but the difference in the character of the subjects of the conveyance, between men and things, creates this difference in the rule applying to them respectively. Mr. Story's work on Bailment, (Art. 9, Sec. 590,) discusses this whole subject with his usual learning and ability. He says: "Having considered the rights, duties, and obligations, of carriers of goods for hire, we may now pass to the consideration of those of carriers of passengers. It has been already stated that carriers of passengers merely for hire, are subject to the same responsibility as carriers of goods for hire, at the common law, so far as respects the baggage of the passengers. But, as to the persons of the passengers, a different rule prevails. Attempts have been made to extend their responsibility as to the persons of passengers, to all losses and injuries, excepting those arising from the act of God, or from public enemies. But the support of this doctrine has been uniformly resisted by the Courts, although a strict responsibility as to the carriage of the persons of passengers is imposed upon such carriers."

Speaking further of the responsibility and duties of this class of carriers, he says, Section 592: "In the next place, they are bound to provide coaches reasonably strong and sufficient for the journey, with suitable harness, trappings, and equipments, and to make a proper examination thereof previous to each journey. In other terms, they are bound to provide road-worthy vehicles, suitable for the safe transportation of the passengers. If they fail in any of these particulars, and any damage or injury occurs to the passengers, they will be responsible to the full extent thereof. Hence, it has been held, that if there is any defect in the original construction of a stage-coach, as for example, in an axletree, although the defect be out of sight, and not discernible upon a mere ordinary examination, yet, if the defect might be discovered by a more minute examination, and any damage is occasioned thereby, the coach proprietors are answerable therefor. The same rule will apply to any other latent defect, which might be discovered by more minute examination and more exact diligence, whereby the work is not road-worthy, and a damage thereby occurs to any passenger. In this respect there does not seem to be any difference between the case of a coach which is not road-worthy, and of a ship which is not seaworthy, as to the implied obligations of the owner.

---

Fairchild v. The California Stage Company.

---

SEC. 593. In the next place, they are bound to provide careful drivers, of reasonable skill and good habits, for the journey, and to employ horses which are steady, and not vicious, or likely to endanger the safety of the passengers. In the pithy language of an eminent Judge, it may be said that, 'The coachman must have competent skill, he must be well acquainted with the road he undertakes to drive, he must be provided with steady horses, a coach and harness of sufficient strength and properly made, and also lights by night. If there is the least failure in any of these things, the duty of the coach proprietors is not fulfilled, and they are responsible for any injury or damage that happens.'

SEC. 594. In the next place, they are bound not to overload the coach, either with passengers or luggage, and they are to take care that the weight is suitably adjusted, so that the coach is not top-heavy, and made liable to upset."

Many cases are cited by the author in support of these propositions — but it is unnecessary to cite them, as it is believed the authorities are uniform to this leading doctrine, unless the case of Boyce v. Anderson, (2 Peters, 150,) be an exception; and if it be, it is, in effect, overruled by the later case of Stokes v. Saltonstall, (13 Id. 181.)

In Farish & Co. v. Reigle, (11 Grattan Va. R. 711,) the question was directly raised, whether a stage-coach proprietor was responsible for more than ordinary diligence. But the Court, Mr. Justice Daniel delivering the opinion, unanimously held that he was. The Court approve of the doctrines of Mr. Justice Story quoted herein. We extract from the opinion, as it states the law as we understand it fully and distinctly.

Fairchild v. The California Stage Company.

---

"The liabilities of such carriers naturally flow from their duties. As they are not, like common carriers of goods, insurers against all injuries, except by the act of God, or by public enemies, the inquiry is naturally presented—what is the nature and extent of their responsibility? It is certain that their undertaking is not an undertaking absolutely to convey safely. But although they do not warrant the safety of the passengers, at all events, yet their undertaking and liability go to the extent that they and their agents possess competent skill, and that they will use all due care and diligence in the performance of their duty. But in what manner, (the author asks,) are we to measure this due care and diligence? Is it ordinary care and diligence, which will make them liable only for ordinary neglect? Or is it extraordinary care and diligence, which will render them liable for slight neglect? As they undertake for the carriage of human beings, whose lives, and limbs, and health, are of great importance, as well to the public as to themselves, the ordinary principle in criminal cases, where persons are made liable for personal wrongs and injuries arising from slight neglect, would seem, (he says,) to furnish the true analogy and rule. It has been accordingly held that passenger-carriers bind themselves to carry safely those whom they [admit] into their coaches, as far as human care and foresight will go, that is, for the utmost care and diligence of very cautious persons; and of course they are responsible for any, even the slightest, neglect." (Section 601.)

In Sec. 601 a—the further proposition is stated, that "when injury or damage happens to the passengers, by the breaking down or overturning of the coach, or by any other accident occurring on the ground, the presumption prima facie is, that it occurred in the negligence of the coachman; and the onus probandi is on the proprietors of the coach to establish that there has been no negligence whatsoever, and that the damage or injury has been occasioned by inevitable casualty, or by some cause which human care and foresight could not prevent; for the law will, in tenderness to human life and limb, hold the proprietors liable for the slightest negligence, and will compel them to repel, by satisfactory proofs, every imputation thereof."

Fairchild v. The California Stage Company.

Notwithstanding what we have said, we do not feel disposed to reverse this judgment because of the refusal of the Judge below to give this instruction. The Court had already given full and explicit instructions to the jury, placing the law of the case before them, in accordance with the views we have taken of it. The effect of these instructions was clearly to ignore the idea that the defendant was responsible according to the stringent rules governing the contracts of common carriers for the conveyance of goods. The jury, after the responsibility of the defendant was placed on different and nearly contrary grounds, could scarcely have required the instruction asked in order to understand that the defendant was not bound as insurer of the safety of the passengers. But not laying too much stress on this, we think that the charge itself is too indefinite, and was calculated to mislead the jury. While it is true that the proprietors of a stage-coach do not warrant the safety of passengers in the same sense that they warrant the safe carriage of goods, yet they do warrant that safety so far as to covenant for the exercise of extraordinary diligence and care to insure it; and they do this as common carriers. The proposition asked was merely abstract, and the Court fully and more explicitly gave the same charge in the second, third, and fourth, instructions, asked by defendant. We do not understand that a Judge is bound to repeat over and over again a proposition of law already announced in different forms; especially is it not bound to give an abstract proposition, or even a general proposition, when it has already charged, or at the time gives distinctly the law upon the particular facts, and when its charges necessarily embrace the general proposition, or all of it at all applicable to the case before the jury.

The same observations are applicable to the fifth instruction refused.

There is no merit in the last point taken, that the Court permitted a witness to be recalled after the plaintiff had closed his case. This was a matter of discretion, and it was not only the right, but, if the ends of justice required it, the duty of the Court to recall him.

Judgment affirmed.

Canfield v. Bates.

CANFIELD v. BATES.

UNDER our statutes, undertakings are on the same footing with bonds. Where an instrument, purporting to be a bond on appeal, contains words of obligation, and has a scroll opposite the name of one of the two signers, who contemporaneously verify the instrument as their bond, it is the bond of both.

A refusal by the County Court, on appeal from a Justice, to permit an amendment of the complaint, is matter of discretion, and there being no affidavit of materiality, nor any showing of the importance of the amendment, this Court will not interfere.

APPEAL from the County Court, Contra Costa County.

Forcible entry and detainer. The Justice rendered judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appealed to the County Court, filing with the Justice an instrument, in the following words, to wit:

"Know all men by these presents, that we, John Zellers and José Silva, are held and firmly bound, unto John Canfield, in the penal sum of three hundred dollars, well and truly to be paid, firmly by these presents.

The condition of this undertaking is such that, whereas, John Canfield has recovered judgment against Philip Betz, in an action of forcible entry and detainer, before E. P. Weld, Esq. Justice of the Peace, in and for Township No. 1, Contra Costa County, on the 24th day of June, 1858, and the said Betz has taken an appeal to the County Court of Contra Costa County. Now we, John Zellers and José Silva, agree and bind ourselves to pay all costs of such appeal, and abide the order the Court may make therein, and pay all rent, and other damages justly accruing during the pendency of such appeal; provided, the County Court affirms said judgment, or by the judgment of the County Court, said defendant is made liable to costs, rents, or damages.

JOHN ZELLERS,

JOSE SILVA. [L. S.]

State of California, County of Contra Costa, ss:

We, John Zellers and José Silva, sureties in the foregoing bond, being duly sworn, each for himself, depose and say: that he is a resident and householder in this county, and that he is worth the amount specified in the within bond, in property in this State, unincumbered and liable to execution, and not subject to the homestead law.

E. F. WELD, Justice of the Peace.

Approved June 27th, 1858.

E. F. WELD,
Justice of the Peace."

The defendant did not file an affidavit under the 16th Section of the Act of 1858, p. 90. Plaintiff served notice on defendant to have his sureties justify, which notice was disregarded. At the trial the counsel of plaintiff moved to dismiss the appeal, because of the insufficiency of the bond, assigning as reasons: 1st. That the bond had not a sufficient seal. 2d. That the sureties failed to justify after notice, excepting to them, had been served upon defendant. 3d. That no affidavit was made under the statute of 1858. The Court overruled the motion, and plaintiff excepted.

Plaintiff also, just before the trial, asked to amend his complaint, by inserting an unlawful detainer, no affidavit being offered. The Court refused leave, and plaintiff excepted.

The cause having been tried before the Court, judgment was rendered for defendant. Plaintiff appeals.

John Wilson, for Appellant, to the point that the paper filed as a bond on appeal to the County Court, is no bond, cited: 1 Blackf. 240; Herman v. Herman, 1 Bald. C. C. R.; Grimsby v. Riley, 5 Mo. 280; Glascock v. Glascock, 8 Id. 577; 7 Gill & John, 285; 1 Munf. 487; Taylor v. Glasser, 2 Sergt. & Rawle, 502.

J. Franklin Williams, for Respondent.

1. The terms "bond" and "undertaking," are synonymous in our statutes as to appeals. (Wood's Dig. 211, Art. 1082, Sec. 348; p. 469, Sec. 16.) 2. A scroll with letters [L. a.] is a good seal. 3. The statute did not require the sureties to justify; an approval by the Justice is sufficient. (Sec. 16, last cited.) 4. Plaintiff could not amend by substituting a new cause of action, to wit: unlawful detainer. (9 Cal. 46.)

Sam. Bell McKee, also, for Respondent, argued: that the bond on appeal was properly conditioned, had two sufficient sureties, and was approved by the Justice; and that the affidavit, required by the Act of 1858, is only necessary when a stay of restitution is demanded; that even if the term "bond," as used in the statute, ex vi termini, imports a sealed instrument, still, the instrument in question is a sealed instrument. It purports to have been made under the hands and seals of the parties. There is a scroll to the name of one of the signers. A scroll is a seal. (Hastings v. Vaughan et al. 5 Cal.)

Where there is a seal to the signature of one of the parties to an instrument signed by two or more persons, and the instrument recites that it was sealed by the parties thereto, it is a manifest adoption by each one of the seal. (Flood v. Vanus, 1 Black, 102; Davis v. Burton, 3 Scam. 41; McLean v. Wilson, Id. 50; Bohannon v. Lewis, 3 Monroe, 376; State Bank v. Bailey, 4 Pike; Carter v. Chandron, 21 Ala. 72; Bowman v. Robb, 6 Barr.)

The motion to amend the complaint as proposed, was properly denied, because, in actions of this kind, "amendments to a complaint in matters of form only can be allowed." (Sec. 20, Act concerning Forcible Entry, etc. Wood's Dig. 470.)

BALDWIN, J. delivered the opinion of the Court — TERRY, C. J. concurring.

We think the judgment should be affirmed.

1. The bond, if not technically such, was substantially, a compliance with the statute. Taking all of our statutes together, the obvious design was to put an undertaking on the same footing as a bond. This instrument contains words of obligation, and has a scroll, [L. s.] opposite the name of one of the signers. This is enough when the paper is executed by both, who, contemporaneously, verify the instrument by affidavit, as their bond, to make it the deed of both.

2. The refusal to grant the amendment, was matter of discretion, which we do not think proper to interfere with. There was no affidavit of the materiality of the amendment, nor any other showing that it was important.

3. The bond seems to have been approved by the Justice, and this is sufficient.

We do not think this a case in which we can review the evidence.

Judgment affirmed.

Kelsey v. Abbott.

KELSEY, RESPONDENT, v. ABBOTT & EDWARDS AND J. G.
CLARK, APPELLANTS.

- WHEREAS a party made defendant in a foreclosure suit, as claiming some interest in the land, sets up, as a full defense, a tax title, he cannot object, afterward, that equity has no jurisdiction over tax titles.
- An assessment for taxes must be made against the owner, when known. The individual, not the property, pays the tax. The property shows the amount of the tax with which to charge the owner, and is security for payment. The assessment must be as certain, as to the person taxed, as it is to the amount of the tax, and to the property.
- Proceedings on tax sales are strictissimi juris. Farris v. Oover, (10 Cal. 632,) affirmed in this.
- The fact that a tax deed is prima facie evidence of certain facts makes it none the less obligatory to comply strictly with the law. The deed simply shifts the burden of proof.
- An assessment stating: "House and lot north side of Commercial Street, formerly owned by Belle Creole, also brick store north side of Commercial Street and second from the corner of Pine and Commercial, including a lot and all the appurtenances, seven thousand dollars," there being at the top of the page containing this description the words, "Nevada County, Nevada Township, Nevada City," is fatally defective in omitting "to give the metes and bounds, or describing the premises by lots or fractions of lots," according to the 4th Section of the Revenue Act of 1857.
- A party in possession of premises under Sheriff's sale, and receiving rents and profits during the time for redemption, should, in equity, as between him and defendant in execution, pay the taxes assessed while he is so in possession. If the owner does not pay them, then the statute requires the party in possession to pay.
- It, in such case, such party fails to pay the tax, permits the premises to be sold, and buys them in, he can derive no benefit from the sale; except that, in equity, the amount paid would probably be considered an advance to the judgment debtor. And this, though the premises were bid in by one of two partners, while the possession, under the Sheriff's sale, was by both partners. The duty to pay the tax was several, as well as joint.

APPEAL from the Fourteenth District.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion. Plaintiff had judgment of foreclosure, and defendant, Clark, appeals.

C. Wilson Hill, for Abbott & Edwards, and E. B. Mastick, for Appellant, Clark.

* 1. Equity has no jurisdiction over tax titles. (2 Cal. 290-463.)

2. A mortgagor cannot make a person claiming title to the premises a party to the foreclosure suit for the purpose of trying the title. That is a contest between mortgagor and mortgagee alone. (2 Seld. 82; 4 Paige, 206; 2 Barb. 22, 23; 3 Id. 438.) By our statute, tax deeds are prima facie, if not conclusive, evidence of all the matters stated therein, and cannot be contested, except by one showing title in himself. (12 Ill. 409, 416.) And plaintiff does not claim title.

---

Kelsey v. Abbott.

---

3. Is the title by purchase under tax sale adverse to mortgagor and mortgagee? The mortgagee holds his interest under the mortgagor. If the latter has no title, the former can acquire none. The mortgagor has possession and the right of redemption. The purchaser on foreclosure takes subject to this right. The legal title remains in the mortgagor until a deed is made, and a purchaser of the mortgagor's interest at a tax sale acquires also the interest of all persons claiming through, or under, his title.

4. The power of taxation is one of sovereignty, and the lien of the sovereign for taxes, unless specially granted by the sovereign, takes precedence of all other liens, whether these liens be subsequent or prior in point of time; whether they are mortgages or judgments. (15 Ill. 7, 477; 2 Bay, 244; 2 Cow. 118.) In Hilliard on Mortgages, the rule is laid down that the mortgagee must pay taxes on mortgaged premises, if the mortgagor fails so to do. (1 Hill. on Mort. 305 n.)

The rule is that the State looks primarily to the property for the payment of taxes, and not to the owners of the property. The lien of the State, by virtue of its sovereignty, attaches upon the thing, and not upon the person, and this lien takes precedence of all others, ex necessitate rei—the mere looking to the person would avoid the payment of the taxes due to the State.

McConnell & Niles and J. Anderson, for Respondent.

I. The principal position urged to sustain this appeal, we understand to be substantially this, viz: A sale for taxes by the State, passes a title to the property sold, discharged of all prior liens and incumbrances.

A tax lien has no necessary or natural preference over the prior liens of individuals.

The only reasons why a tax lien and title should be regarded as paramount to other liens and titles, are: 1st. A tax lien is a charge exclusively in rem. 2d. The character of the State as sovereign, necessarily gives to her liens for taxes precedence of all others. 3d. The right of "priority of payment" which belongs to the State, involves also priority of lien to secure payment. 4th. By our revenue law, a tax lien is to be preferred to others.

---

Kelsey v. Abbott.

---

A tax, though usually made by law, a lien upon property, is really a personal charge. It is defined to be "a contribution imposed by government upon individuals for the use of the State." (Burrill's Law Dict. verb Tax.)

A B owns a tract of land, upon which he pays a tax. Now the tax is not owing by the land, nor does it, like rent, issue out of it. But it is owing by A B, personally, and the amount of it is determined by the value of the land. In some cases, as where property is assessed to unknown owners, it would appear at first glance, that the tax was exclusively a charge in rem. But even in such cases, it is, in theory, a charge upon the unknown owner, though the State is necessarily restricted to its proceeding in rem to recover it. The fact that a personal action is rarely resorted to for the collection of taxes, proves nothing. The right to resort to such an action is undoubted. But the State has a right to select its remedy, and it usually selects the proceeding in rem as more expeditious and efficacious than any other. Tax sales, in principle, differ very little from judicial sales. The State (the creditor,) sells the property of the citizen (the debtor,) because he has failed to pay the tax (debt,) assessed against him, and our law has increased the natural similarity, by providing that an assessment shall have the force and operation of a judgment and execution. (Wood's Dig. Sec. 32, Rev. Act, 623.)

It would be as proper to say that the property of a debtor, sold under execution, owed the debt, as to say that property sold for taxes, and not the owner, owed the tax.

The principle of personal amenability is daily recognized by the legislative, as well as the judicial, action of the government. An example of this sort of recognition may be seen in the fact that though property is often taxed when the owner is unknown, it is never taxed where there is no owner. Upon precisely the same principle, the State never taxes its own property; for that would involve the absurdity of a State being debtor to itself. Upon no other principle can these two exceptions to general taxation be sustained. (Rex v. St. Luke's Hospital, 2 Burr. 1053 — 1065.)

The word "tax" is the modern synonym of the feudal term, "talliage," which Lord Coke, after giving its etymology, defines thus: "tallagium is a general word and doth include all subsidies, taxes, tenths, fifteenth, impositions or other burdens, or charge put or set upon any man, and so is expounded in our books." (Coke's 2d Inst. fol. 533; Pierce v. The City of Boston, 3 Met. 521; Burd v. Ramsey, 9 Serg. & Rawle, 109; Johnson v. McIntyre, 1 Bibb, 295.)

---

Kelsey v. Abbott.

---

II. As to the preliminary objection made by the Appellant at the trial, viz.: that Appellant's rights could not be determined in a foreclosure suit, it embodies in another form the question we have been discussing. For the only reason why Appellant's rights cannot be determined in this suit, is that he claims by title paramount; and he can only claim by title paramount, because a tax lien is exclusively a charge on the property, independent of its owner.

A party is said to claim in privity with another, when he de-rains title from that other. This is called privity of estate. (Coke on Litt. 271; 8 Coke, 42 b, and Secs. 460, 461, Littleton's Tenures.)

A party not claiming by, through, or under, another, has no privity of estate or title; but if he has the superior title, he is said to be in by title paramount.

Now, quere, must not the purchaser at a tax sale deduce title from the person to whom the property was assessed? If our argument, that the tax is a personal charge primarily, and not a mere lien on the property, irrespective of the ownership, be sound, it is evident that he must. The fact that a sale for taxes is an adversary sale, does not affect the privity of title. Sales under execution, foreclosure sales—in a word, all judicial sales, are adversary sales. Yet the purchaser at such sales claims in privity with him whose property is sold.

There is nothing in the assumption that the lien of a sovereign State should be preferred to the prior liens of individuals. The error arises from confounding the attributes of the State as sovereign with her rights as creditor.

Undoubtedly, the general right of a State to tax here citizens is anterior and paramount to the rights of property of particular citizens. But the actual imposition of taxes, (taxes on property, we mean,) and the remedy for their collection, are directly dependent upon the rights of private property; for it is evident that no such tax can be imposed or collected in a country where the institution of private property does not exist. In other words, although the tax pertains to the State as sovereign, she collects it in her character of creditor.

---

Kelsey v. Abbott.

---

There is no natural distinction between a debt due a sovereign, and a debt due a citizen. The quality of sovereignty affects the mode of contracting the debt, but not the manner of payment. True, artificial preferences have been introduced in most countries in favor of sovereign creditors; but the fact that they owe their origin to positive law, proves that they are not inherent qualities.

The right to take private property for the benefit of the public, differs greatly from the right to impose taxes, and in a still greater degree from the right to sell property for the payment of taxes. In no respect is this difference more apparent, than in the fact that the former may be exercised irrespective of who is the owner of the property, while the exercise of the latter depends directly upon the ownership.

One other class of considerations occurs to us in connection with this branch of the argument.

In case of a mortgage, our law makes it the special duty of the mortgagor or his grantee in possession to pay off the taxes on the mortgaged property. In other words, he or his grantee is deemed owner of the property for purposes of taxation. The mortgagee is assessed and pays a full tax upon his mortgage. (Rev. Law, Secs. 3-5, Wood's Dig. 615, 616.)

The law has apparently recognized the existence of the two separate estates or interests of the mortgagor and mortgagee, and taxed each independent of the other. The mortgagor is in no wise responsible for the taxes on the mortgage; nor, as it seems to us, is the mortgagee any more responsible for the taxes on the mortgagor. The mortgagee is under no obligation to pay taxes on the mortgaged premises, nor is he possessed of the means to compel the mortgagor to perform that duty.

Our view of this question is fortified by the language of Sections 22, 23, and 32, of the Revenue Act. (Wood's Dig. 620-623.)

Section 32 declares that the assessment shall be a lien on the property of the "delinquent." Again, Section 23 provides that a "deed made in conformity with the requirements of Section

---

Kelsey v. Abbott.

---

22, shall convey to the grantee all the right, title, interest, claim, possession, and right of possession, legal and equitable, or otherwise, of each and every delinquent," etc.

Now, who was the delinquent here? Not Kelsey — for he had no possession or control of the property at the time. Besides, he was assessed for taxes on his mortgage; and our law separates the estate of the mortgagee from that of the mortgagor for the purposes of taxation.

As the mortgagee cannot be termed a "delinquent," who can? We answer, the mortgagor — to whom the property was assessed — or a party in possession claiming under him. In this case, the assessment was in the name of Abbott, but as he lost his possession in May, 1857, by a sale to Clark & Co. it may be that the latter thereby assumed in law the payment of the tax, and were therefore the real delinquents. Such at least seems to be settled by the case cited from 3 Harris, (Gormley's Appeal). The effect of the tax sale, (granting it to have been regular,) was to transfer to the purchaser the estate of the delinquents, Clark & Co. of which firm he was a member.

Now, their estate was the estate of Abbott & Edwards, and no more. It was subject to all subsisting liens and incumbrances created by them, and particularly to this mortgage. It follows that the purchaser took subject to the mortgage.

If we suppose Abbott & Edwards to have been the delinquents, the result is the same.

The provisions of Section 23 above directly sustain the position that a purchaser at a tax sale claims in privity with the owner to whom the property was assessed. The purchaser acquires the title of the delinquent, whatever it may be. This is the declaration of the Act. And a subsequent portion of the same section declares that the "tax deed shall be evidence that all the right, title, interest, etc. of the delinquent, has been subrogated to the grantee," etc. (Wood's Dig. 621.)

III. The assessment in this case is insufficient and void.

1st. It is not dated. 2d. It neither states the extent of the lot, nor furnishes data whence the extent may be ascertained. 3d. It does not contain the name of the "township, city, or incorporated town," where the premises are situated. 4th. It is too vague and uncertain in other respects.

---

Kelsey v. Abbott.

---

The omission of the extent of the lot, or of data from which the extent may be ascertained, is fatal. By Section 17 of the Act, it is provided that the property assessed must be sold to the bidder who will take the "smallest part of the property for the tax." (Ferris v. Coover, 10 Cal. 632; Tallman v. White, 2 Com. 69; Doughty v. Hope, 3 Denio, 594; S. C. 1 Com. 79; Strykes v. Kelly, 2 Denio, 323; Anderson v. The State, 1 Cushman, 23 Miss. 472; Wister v. Kammerer, 2 Yeates, Pa. 100; Young v. Martin, 2 Yeates, 312; Watt v. Gilmore, Id. 330; Sneeverly v. Dickey, Id. 331; 3 Id. 186.) A sale of unseated land, describing it merely as so many acres is void for uncertainty." (13 Serg. & Rawle, 151; 7 Id. 394; Hubley v. Keyser, 2 Penn. Penrose & Watts, 496; Libby v. Burnham, 15 Mass. 144; Thayer v. Stearns, 1 Pick. 482; Blossom v. Cannon, 14 Mass. 177; Johnson v. McIntyre, 1 Bibb. 295.)

IV. Granting all that can be asked in favor of a lien for taxes—granting that it will divest a lien created before the first of March of each year—yet no Court will permit the party whose duty it is to pay the tax to take advantage of his failure to perform his duty, and buy in the property at a tax sale so as to cut out the prior mortgage. Clark & Co. being in possession under a claim of title, ought, by law, to have paid the tax. Selling property for taxes, is merely one way of paying the tax; a more expensive way, but still a way of payment. Clark & Co. neglected to pay in the usual manner—but one of the firm took it upon himself to pay in another manner. Shall the latter payment have a different operation from the former? But it will be said that the Appellant, Clark, is only one member of the firm—and he bought for himself and not for the firm. Then, he was guilty of fraud on his firm—a fraud which the law will not allow to succeed. A partner buying in partnership property is deemed in equity a Trustee for the firm; and here the purchase by Clark must inure for the benefit of Clark & Co.

Grant, however, that such a result would not follow—still Clark, being a member of the firm, and cognizant of all the facts connected with the property, was guilty in equity of a positive fraud in allowing the property to be sold and becoming the purchaser. What a firm cannot legally do, no member of the firm can do.

BALDWIN, J. delivered the opinion of the Court — TERRY, C. J. concurring.

Several questions of extraordinary interest and importance arise in this case, and they have been argued with much force and learning.

The facts are few and simple.

The Respondent filed his bill in equity to foreclose a mortgage executed to him by Abbott & Edwards, on a certain lot in the city of Nevada. To this bill the mortgagors alone were made defendants, but afterward the plaintiff amended his bill and made Clark a party; the bill charging that Clark claimed some interest in the property acquired after the execution of the mortgage. Abbott & Edwards made default. Clark answered and set up a tax title and deed in himself, executed on the 14th of December, 1857, after the date of the mortgage, which is dated 1st January, 1857. The plaintiffs demurred to this answer, but no action was taken on the demurrer, the consideration of it being deferred until the trial on the merits. On the trial, Clark produced his tax deed, and also a Sheriff's deed to himself and his partner, Wilbur, dated September 6th, 1858, which last deed was founded on a judicial sale by the Sheriff of Nevada County, made on the 5th June, 1857. The plaintiff, in answer, produced the assessment of the property for the year 1857. He also proved that Clark & Co. (Wilbur & Clark) had been in the actual possession of the premises since May, 1857. They purchased the building 5th June, 1857, at Sheriff's sale, as said before.

The assessment is as follows: "House and lot north side of Commercial Street, formerly owned by Belle Creole; also brick store north side of Commercial Street, and second from the corner of Pine and Commercial, including lot and all the appurtenances, seven thousand dollars." At the top of the page are the following words: "Nevada County, Nevada Township, Nevada City." There is no date to the assessment. The view which we have taken of this case renders it unnecessary to go into an examination of many of the propositions which have been elaborately argued at the bar.

The Appellant insists that the Court of Chancery has no jurisdiction over the tax title. Probably a sufficient reply to this is found in the fact that he himself sets it up as a defense. He does not object to having been made unnecessarily or improperly a party, nor does he set up this matter as so far denying the power of the Court to pass upon his interest or claim; but seems to urge it as a full and sufficient defense to the decree of foreclosure.

Kelsey v. Abbott.

---

We proceed to consider the defense on the merits.

The case of Green v. Craft, (6 Cush. 28 Miss. 70,) is in point on the question of the validity of the assessment. The Mississippi Statute, (Hutch. Code, 200, Sec. 5,) contains the same clause in substance as ours in respect to the effect of the tax deed. The same point there was taken and pressed. But the Court said: "The term 'taxes,' it is said, includes all contributions imposed by government upon individuals for the service of the State. The individual, and not his property, pays the tax. The property is resorted to for the purpose of ascertaining the amount of the tax with which the owner must be charged, and for the purpose of enforcing payment when the owner shall be legally in default in paying at the time stipulated by law. No person is a tax-payer until he has been so declared by the proper officer. The assessment must be as certain in designating the person chargeable with the tax at the commencement of the fiscal year; as it must be in designating the amount of the charge, and the property to which reference is made for the purpose of ascertaining such amount.

An assessment must be made, in order to create a liability on the part of the individual to pay the tax. If no such assessment be made, no liability is created, and, of course, there can be no default in discharging that which has no existence. To authorize the Collector to sell property to enforce the payment of taxes there must be both a legal liability on the part of the owner to pay the tax, and a legal default in making payment."

The Revenue Act of 1854, (Acts, 104,) provides, by the 64th Section, that lands occupied by any person not the owner thereof, shall be listed in the name of the owner, if known; if not, in the name of the occupant; and by Section 65, unoccupied lands shall be listed in the name of the owner, if known; otherwise, as lands of persons unknown; lots or real property within the limits of any incorporated city shall be listed separately, as the same may be owned or held; or when this is unknown, in accordance with the survey or plan. By Section 67, in case of a mortgage of real estate, the mortgagor shall pay the taxes on the value of the property. By Section 74, mortgages are taxed. By Section 89, every assessment made in conformity with the spirit and intention of the provisions of this act, shall remain as a judgment and lien, and have the force and effect of an execution against the party and property liable for the taxes thereon. By Section 99, the lien of the State for all taxes for State and county purposes, shall attach on all real and personal property on the first day of March, annually, and such lien, to the absolute exclusion of other liens, shall continue till all taxes thereon shall be paid, etc.

---

Kelsey v. Abbott.

---

In 1857, (29th April,) another Revenue Act was passed. By Section 4 of this Act, it is made the duty of the Assessor to prepare a tax list or assessment roll, in which shall be listed or assessed all the real estate, etc. and which shall contain the names of all taxable inhabitants.

2. All real estate and improvements on public lands taxable to each, giving the metes and bounds, etc.

By Section 22, it is provided that, upon the delivery to the County Recorder of the duplicate certificates required in a previous section, the lien of the State shall become, and is, vested in the purchaser at the tax sale, and when not redeemed by payment, etc. the title of every assessed delinquent to the land purchased shall vest, etc.

By Section 32, every tax levied under the provisions or authority of this act, is hereby made a judgment against the person, and a lien against the property assessed, which lien shall attach and judgment date as of the first Monday in March of each year, and shall have the full force and effect of an execution against all property of the delinquent, which judgment shall not be satisfied nor the lien removed until the taxes are all paid, or the property has absolutely vested in the purchaser under a sale for taxes.

This provision seems to be in substitution of Sections 89 and 99, of the Act of 1854.

These citations from the statute show that the assessment must be made against the owner, when known.

2. These proceedings on tax sales are strictissimi juris. They are cases of a naked statutory power, and all the steps directed by the statute must be strictly pursued. (Ferris v. Coover, 10 Cal. 632,) and the numerous cases there cited.

---

Kelsey v. Abbott.

---

We do not understand that the statute making the certificate and deed, prima facie evidence of certain facts, does away with the obligation to follow the directions of the law. If within the power of the Legislature to do this, it has not attempted it. It has only shifted the burden of proof, leaving the effect of the facts when proven, as it was before.

The assessment was not in the name of the owner, nor is it shown that the owner was unknown. It seems to be conceded that the name of "J. C. Abbott" appeared in the paper, but the finding does not so state. It seems that this was the property of Abbott & Edwards, who mortgaged it; and the statute contemplates that the mortgagors are the proper persons to whom the property should be assessed — the mortgagees are assessed on the mortgage. But the assessment was fatally defective in omitting "to give the metes and bounds, or describing the premises by lots or fractions of lots." (Wood's Dig. 615, Sec. 4.) It is obvious that it was designed that some definite account of the extent of the lot should be required; for it is provided by Section 17, that the property must be sold to the bidder who will take the smallest part of the property for the tax. It seems that this assessment roll has no date, and that it does not give the township, city, or incorporated town, as required. But it is not necessary to pass on these latter objections.

3. Even if these objections failed, it is very hard to see how the last point taken by the Appellant can be avoided. Clark & Co. went into possession of these premises; they were in possession at the time of this tax; they had bought at Sheriff's sale, which gave them a right to the profits until redemption — these they were enjoying. Between them and defendants in execution, they should in equity have paid the taxes; and the statute casts this duty of paying the taxes on the party in possession, if the owner does not. They can derive no benefit from a failure to pay them, and thus suffering the lot to be sold and buying it. In equity, the purchase would seem to be merely an advance, and this, whether made by one or both of the partners, for the duty was several as well as joint.

We think the judgment should be affirmed.

Knowles v. Joost.

KNOWLES v. JOOST et al.

FINDING of a referee conclusive as to the facts, on conflicting evidences. Under the Mechanics' Lien Act of 1856, the owner of a building may contract to pay for it as soon as completed; and he is not liable to material men, until notice served on him, and then only to the extent of the sum due the contractor, at the date of the notice. Query, whether the Act of 1858 establishes a different rule?

APPEAL from the Twelfth District.

Upon publication of notice under the Mechanics' Lien Act, a reference was made to report as to the various liens. The referee found for defendants — the owners and the contractor. Judgment was entered accordingly, a motion to set aside the report having been overruled. Plaintiff appeals.

W. W. Chipman, for Appellant.

I. This proceeding is in the nature of a foreclosure of a mortgage; the Supreme Court can review the facts found by the referee.

II. The referee was authorized generally to report the facts and a judgment. His whole report is therefore subject to a review. (Phelps v. Peabody, 9 Cal. 213; Brock v. Bruce, 5 Id. 270; Cahoon v. Levy, 6 Id. 295; Tuttle v. Montford, 7 Id. 358; McGeary v. Osborne, 9 Id. 119; Stat. 1850, 211; Stat. 1855, 156; Stat. 1856, Wood's Digest, 537; Stat. 225; N. Y. Stat. 1830, 412; N. Y. Stat. 1832, 181; 4th Ed. Vol. 2, N. Y. R. Stat. 740-742; Parson's Laws of Business, etc. 446; 12 Wend. 376; 4 Hill, 193.)

There is no provision, that the building shall be liable, only when the owner is indebted to the contractor. Cahoon v. Levy, (6 Cal. 295,) was decided under the Statute of 1856; and Brennan & Batchelder v. Marsh et al. (10 Cal.) was decided before the Act of 1856 took effect. (See Brock v. Bruce, 5 Cal. 279; Tuttle v. Montford, 7 Id. 358; McGeary v. Osborne, 9 Id. 119; 12 Wend. 376; 4 Hill, 193.)

Pizley & Smith, for Respondents, cited: Cahoon v. Levy, (6 Cal. 295,) as conclusive of the case, which comes under the law of 1856.

TERRY, C. J. delivered the opinion of the Court — BALDWIN, J. concurring.

---

Turner v. Melony.

---

This is an action to enforce a lien on a building for materials furnished the contractor, and used in the construction of the building.

The finding of the referee, which, as the evidence is conflicting, is conclusive as to the facts, shows that before notice of the lien was filed, or notice given to the owner of the building, he had fully paid to the contractor all that was due him upon the contract.

The Statute of 1856 intended that the liens of sub-contractors and material men, should be satisfied by the owner of the building, out of moneys due from him to the contractor, and the 3d Section authorizes him, upon being served with proper notice, "to withhold from the contractor, out of the first money due, or to become due, to him, under the contract, a sufficient sum to cover the lien claimed by such sub-contractor, journeyman, or other person, performing labor or furnishing materials, until the validity of the lien shall be determined by the proper tribunals, if it be contested." It was not the design of the Legislature to make him responsible, except upon notice, or to a greater extent, than the sum due to the contractor at the date of the notice. The statute furnishes to material men and sub-contractors, cheap, easy, and expeditious, means, of attaching in the hands of the builder any money due from him to the contractor, but does not prevent him from agreeing to pay for the work as soon as it is completed, or from complying with such agreement when made.

Whether a different rule was established by the Act of 1858, it is not necessary to inquire, as the construction of that Act was not involved in this case.

Judgment affirmed.

In Re TURNER v. MELONY, CONTROLLER.

△ DISTRICT Judge, inducted into office with a commission from the Governor showing him to be entitled to it from a certain date, draws the salary annexed to the office from that date.
The question of his eligibility cannot be tried on mandamus.

APPEAL from the Sixth District.

Mandamus. In the fall of 1858, at a general election, Turner

---

Turner v. Melony.

---

was elected District Judge of the Eighth District for six years. He demanded his commission before January 1st, 1859. The commission was refused by the Governor, who issued a commission for the same office to one Haynes. The title of Haynes to the office was then tested by a quo warranto, in the suit of "The People ex rel. Saunders v. Haynes, (ante,)" and resulted in a decision by this Court adversely to Haynes. The Governor then issued a commission to Turner, dated May 13th, 1859, as having been elected to the office at said general election, and he took the oath of office according to law.

At the time of his election, Turner was an Inspector of Customs under the United States.

Petitioner applies for mandamus to compel defendant, Controller of State, to draw his warrant on the State Treasurer, for the salary of petitioner, as Judge from January 1st, 1859. Defendant, for answer, sets up the ineligibility of Turner, because holding the office of Inspector of the Customs, as aforesaid, averring it to be a lucrative office under the United States.

The answer was demurred to, and the Court below awarded the mandamus. Defendant appeals.

Carr, for Appellant, argued: that if Turner was ineligible, then, although the title to the office could not be tried by mandamus, yet the defendant cannot be compelled to do an illegal act by drawing a warrant. He is not forced to test the eligibility of Turner.

H. Toler Booraem, for Respondent.

1. The title to an office cannot be tried in a proceeding to obtain a mandamus. (People v. Olds, 3 Cal. 167.) A fortiori, a third person, cannot set up want of title, as a defense to a proceeding by an incumbent of an office, to obtain his salary. (People v. Collins, 7 Johns. 549.)

2. The incumbent elected to the office is entitled to the whole term and its emoluments. The failure to get his commission was not his fault.

3. The salary commences with the term. The commission is only evidence of the title derived from the election. (Mages v. Supervisors, 10 Cal. 376; Wammach v. Holloway, 2 Ala. 31; Jeter v. The State, 1 McCord, 233; Const. Art. 6, Sec. 5; Wood's Dig. 558.)

BALDWIN, J. delivered the opinion of the Court — TERRY, C. J. concurring.

The Respondent having been inducted into office, and his commission showing him entitled to it from the first day of January last, as Judge of the District Court, is entitled to the salary annexed to the office from that time.

The question of his eligibility cannot be tried on mandamus.
Judgment affirmed.

KLINK & WIFE v. COHEN & SILVERSTEIN.

In ejectment, suit must be brought against the terre-tenant, or party in possession.

If inconsistent defenses be set up, the defect must be reached by motion to strike out, or in some cases, by demurrer. And, if no objection be taken to the answer on this ground, defendant, on the trial, may rely on any of his defenses, as under the old system.

APPEAL from the Ninth District.

For case, see opinion.

J. A. Fletcher, for Appellant.

Heydenfeldt, for Respondent.

BALDWIN, J. delivered the opinion of the Court — TERRY, C. J. concurring.

This was ejectment, to recover a house and lot in Yreka, claimed by the plaintiff to be homestead property. The Court rendered a judgment for the defendants, upon a special finding of facts by the jury. The facts so found were these: That the premises are situated in the town of Yreka, on a public street in a business portion of the town, the town containing a population of some two thousand souls, and the site of the town being mineral land; that the defendants bought the lot at Sheriff's sale, in February, 1855, and have been in possession since; that one Alexander was in actual possession of the property at the time of the bringing of the suit, and for twenty-nine days before; that the property was used by Klink and wife, whilst they owned it, for family and business purposes, and equally for each; that they had another and different place of residence before the fire in 1854, which consumed the first building, and this other residence was in Yreka, and was before the bringing of this suit; that Klink claimed another homestead before or at the time of the purchase of defendants; but that at the sale the Sheriff made a proclamation that Klink claimed this lot as a homestead, and the defendants heard it, and that defendants, at the time of sale, had no knowledge that Klink claimed other property as his homestead. The monthly value of this property is one hundred and twenty-five dollars. As a residence the value is one hundred dollars per month. Defendants have made no valuable improvements. At the date of defendants' purchase there was a mechanics' lien on the premises for four hundred and eighty-eight dollars and fifty cents, which was afterwards paid by defendants. Mrs. Klink never claimed any other property as homestead, nor lived with her husband on any other property—he and she claiming the same as a homestead. The property was worth one hundred and thirty-five dollars a month to the plaintiffs as used by them. The plaintiffs resided upon the premises between the 15th of June, 1854, and the 21st of February, 1855, and Mrs. Klink claimed the premises as a homestead while so residing. Plaintiffs were husband and wife from 1849 to 1858. Mrs. Klink claimed the premises a short time before leaving them. She claimed no other property as her homestead. Defendants purchased the premises on execution sale against Klink, 21st February, 1855, for two thousand three hundred dollars. Plaintiff resided in the back part of the building; no communication between the front rooms and back. Plaintiffs were owners of the premises and built a dwelling-house on the premises; the house was built as a place of business or trade, and a dwelling-house. The premises were not the only family residence of plaintiffs in the year 1854 and 1855.

We have taken these facts from the findings in the order in which they are found.

Upon this case thus made, the judgment of the Court rests:

1. The jury found that the defendants were not in the actual possession or occupancy of the premises at the time of the suit. In ejectment, suit must be brought against the terre-tenant or party in possession. This we have held in several cases. (See Adams on Ejectment, 512, to the same effect.)

2. The complaint was not verified. The answer sets up two or three separate defenses, separately stated. In one of them the actual possession is admitted; in another it is denied. But the admission in the first defense, the Statute of Limitations, whether necessarily inconsistent or not with the denial of occupancy in the last, we think was not an admission of which the plaintiff could avail himself on the trial. It has been held in several cases in New York, that a party cannot set up inconsistent defenses. (See 4 Sandf. S. C. 680.) But it is said: "When inconsistent defenses are set up, the defect is properly to be reached by motion to strike out one of the defenses—in which case, as under the old practice, the Court will either strike out the defense, or compel the defendant to elect by which he will abide. If a motion to strike out the objectionable matter cannot reach or cure the defect, the objection, it is presumed, may be taken by demurrer, as in the case of Sayles v. Wooden, Lewis v. Kendall, and others. Such an answer would be insufficient within the meaning of the code, and may be objected to by demurrer, for it is held that an answer is insufficient in the sense of the code, not only where it sets up a defense which is groundless in law, but where in the mode of stating a defense, otherwise valid, it violates those primary and essential rules of pleading which the code has retained. And the rule is, no doubt, correctly laid down in the case of Nichols v. Jones, that "where the objection is to the whole of a separate answer or defense, it should be taken by demurrer, unless palpably insufficient," etc. (Van Santvoord's Pleadings, 287, and cases there cited.)

Klink v. Cohen.

---

No objection having been taken to the answer, on the score of this inconsistency, we think the defendant might, as under the old system of pleading, rely on the matter of his last defense, unaffected by the statements in a prior separate and distinct plea or defense.

This view renders it unnecessary to consider the other questions, elaborately argued, on the embarrassing and perplexing subject of homestead property.

Judgment affirmed.

 Conroy v. Woods.

---

CONROY & O'CONNOR v. WOODS *et al.

THE lien of firm creditors is paramount to the lien of individual creditors.

And, where one partner buys out his copartners, agreeing to pay the debts of the firm, the partnership property remains bound for firm debts, just as before the sale. The lien of firm creditors attaching, must be preferred to the lien of an individual creditor of the remaining partner, attaching first. A lien by attachment enables a creditor to file a creditor's bill, without waiting for judgment and execution.

Partners may make a bono fide sale of their property any time before their creditors acquire a lien; but such sale cannot include a sale directly or indirectly to one of the partners, with a stipulation, that he will pay the firm debts, there having been no credit given by the individual creditor on the strength of an apparent sole ownership in the vendee.

The fact that an individual creditor obtains judgment, issues execution, and levies on firm property, gives him no right to the property as against firm creditors, who have not yet obtained judgment.

In such case of conflict between the individual and firm creditors, equity has jurisdiction. No action lies against the Sheriff for levying the execution of the individual creditor, and a sale to different purchasers might result in a loss of the property.

APPEAL from the Twelfth District.

The facts are substantially stated by the Court. At the time of filing this suit, the Sheriff was about to sell the property in question, under the execution issued on the judgment of Woods against Bonny alone. The bill prays that plaintiffs have precedence over Woods and all others, on the ground that the property is partnership property; and also prays that the claim of Allison, as owner of a portion of said property, and the judgment of Woods, be declared fraudulent and void. Upon affidavit of the insolvency of the Sheriff and his bondsmen, the Court below ordered the proceeds of the sale to be deposited in Court, subject to the further order of the Court.

Woods demurred to the interventions filed, on the ground, that the intervenors had no interest in the success of either party, and did not state facts sufficient. Demurrer overruled.

The intervenors had attachment liens at the date of their interventions, and, before trial, had obtained judgment.

The case was tried before the Court, and a decree rendered, that the property was partnership property, and subject first to the judgments of plaintiffs and intervenors. Woods alone appeals.

Geo. F. & W. H. Sharp, for Appellant.

I. The Court below erred in overruling the demurrer of Woods. (Mody v. Payne, 2 Hill, 47, and note a; Phillips v. Cook, 2 John. Ch. 548; Walsh v. Adams, 24 Wend. 389; 3 Denio, 125-128; Prac. Act, Sec. 217-220; Meyer v. Larkin, 3 Cal. 403; Nugent v. Locke, 4 Id. 318; Mason v. Tipton, 4 Id. 276.)

II. The pleadings and proofs do not show a case of equitable cognizance. (Cases cited above.)

III. Conceding that this action is one of equitable cognizance, when Woods' attachment was levied, this property, by the sale and delivery of the property itself, became the individual property of the debtor in that suit. (Ex parte Ruffin, 6 Vesey, 127; Marguand v. The N. Y. M. Co. 17 John. 525; Mody v. Payne, 2 Id. 548; 3 Kent's Com. 65.)

IV. If these plaintiffs had any lien whatever, it must be by force of the clause in the bill of sale; and they had none under it. (Prac. Act, Sec. 120; Stat. 1850, 267, Sec. 15.)

V. Woods advanced his money upon the strength of the property in question being the individual property of George Bonny, his debtor, and much of the money went to pay debts of the firm.

VI. The claim of Alison to this identical property was good against the property, because they could not have invoked the want of a change of possession; and with full knowledge on this point, they allowed Woods to justify his taking under his attachment against E. B. Bonny, individually; hence, they are estopped from asserting the contrary, especially, after Woods had been put to the expense of defending this identical property, and after a return thereof is made to answer his debt alone.

VII. The intervenors are interlopers in this action, without right or authority of law; at any rate, they are in no better position than the plaintiff.

VIII. Their claims were included in the mortgage to Alison; consequently, the doctrine of election and res adjudicata apply, so far as Woods is concerned.

Cyril V. Grey and Joseph Simpson, for Respondents.

This is a case of equitable cognizance.

---

Conroy v. Woods.

---

The answers do not deny any of the material allegations of the complaint and interventions, which must, therefore be taken as true. (Davy v. Bowman, 8 Cal. 149; Osborn v. Hendrickson, 8 Id. 32; Thompson v. Lee, 8 Id. 275; Humphreys v. McCall, 9 Id. 59; Curtis v. Richards, Id.; Gerke v. Cal. St. Nav. Co. Id. 215; San Francisco Gas Co. v. The City, Id. 453.)

The complaint and proofs show that the property in question was the partnership property of Bonny, Brooks & Moore, for the sale by Brooks and Moore operated only as a dissolution of the partnership as between the parties, leaving the property, as before, subject to the partnership debts. Bell became a tenant in common with E. B. Bonny, and could do nothing inconsistent with the primary duty of winding up the concern. (Kent's Com. 7th Ed. Side, 8, 59, 60, 63; Story on Part. Secs. 307, 308, 261, and Note; Collyer on Part. Sec. 110 and Note, 121, 125, 127, 166; Marguand v. N. Y. Manuf'g Co. 17 Johns. 525; Necoll et al. v. Munford, 4 Johns. Ch. 5, 22; Rodriguez v. Hefferman, 5 Id. 417, 428; Crawsbrey v. Maule, 1 Swanston, 507.)

Bell could not, and did not, transfer to E. B. Bonny (who knew all the facts) any higher or other right than he, Bell, possessed.

The partnership property could only become the individual property of one of the partners, and subject to his individual debts, after a notice of the dissolution of the partnership, and subsequent open and notorious possession of the goods by the surviving partner, and his carrying on the business in his own name and being trusted on the strength thereof. (Ex parte Ruffin, 6 Ves. 119; Ex parte Till, 10 Id. 347; Ex parte Williams, 11 Id. 3; La Collyer on Part. Sec. 884; Story on Part. Secs. 159-163, 308; Bissel on Part. 71; Gow. on Part. 2d Ed. 261; 3 Kent's Com. 7th Ed. Side, 8, 66, 7; Johnson v. Totten et al. 3 Cal. 347.)

The complaint and interventions set out and the proof, sustains two distinct grounds for the relief sought; either of which is sufficient, and will entitle plaintiff and intervenors to relief in a Court of Equity.

I. That the plaintiff and intervenors are partnership creditors of Bonny, Brooks & Moore, and having established a lien by attachment, followed by judgment and execution upon the partnership assets, they claim a preference over defendant, Woods, who is an individual creditor of one of the partners, E. B. Bonny.

Conroy v. Woods.

---

II. That the judgment of Woods is fraudulent and intended to hinder, delay, and defraud, creditors.

Either of the grounds is sufficient to authorize the interference of a Court of Equity. (1 Sto. Eq. Jur. Secs. 678, 1253, and cases cited; Washburn v. Bank Bellows Falls, 19 Vt. 278; Place v. Sweetzer, 16 Ohio, 132; Snodgrass Appeal, 13 Penn. 471; Jackson v. Cornell, 1 Sandf. Ch. 348; Robb v. Steans, 1 Clark's Ch. 191; Chase v. Steele et al. 1 Sandf. Ch. 348.) A Court of Equity will also interfere in cases of fraud, even if founded on the express provisions of statutes, and especially to guard against the fraudulent acts of a debtor. (Sto. Eq. Jur. Secs. 349, 377; Heyneman v. Dannenberg, 6 Cal. 376; Adams v. Woods, 8 Id. 156.) And also interfere where the plaintiff has a remedy at law. (People v. Houghtaling, 7 Cal. 348; Heyneman v. Dannenberg, 6 Id. 376.) And especially to enjoin the fraudulent disposition of partnership property in favor of individual creditors of the separate partners. (Jackson v. Cornell, 1 Sandf. Ch. 348; Deveau v. Fowler, 2 Paige's Ch. 400; Topliff v. Vail, Harrington's Ch. 340; Candler v. Pettit, 1 Paige's Ch. 168; Heath v. Hand, 1 Id. 329; Eager et al. v. Price et al. 2 Id. 333; Story on Part. Sec. 264.) And, in this case, E. B. Bonny was only a Trustee, holding the property for the payment of the partnership debts, and a Court of Equity will interfere to enforce the trust in favor of the creditors. (Sto. Eq. Jur. Sec. 1244; Sedam v. Williams, 4 McLean, 51; Gray v. Thompson, 1 Johns. Ch. 82; Page v. Naglee, 6 Cal. 241.)

BALDWIN, J. delivered the opinion of the Court — TERRY, C. J. concurring.

Bill states that on the 22d of April, 1857, plaintiffs sued out attachment against Bonny, Brooks & Moore, a mercantile firm in San Francisco, and had it levied on certain goods; that shortly afterwards, plaintiffs got judgment in their suit, which has not been paid, and execution issued with directions to the Sheriff to levy on the property attached; that the debt of plaintiffs was for goods, due by this firm at and before the 9th of April, 1857, and this property attached had belonged to and been in possession of said firm; that about this last date, these defendants dissolved partnership, by Brooks and Moore selling out to the defendant Bell, who bought subject to the payment of the debts of the firm; that no notice was given of this dissolution to plaintiffs until the 16th of May, 1857; that Bell bought for Bonny, and afterwards transferred his rights to Bonny; that at the time of this sale, all these parties knew of this indebtedness to plaintiffs; that on the 10th of April, 1857, defendant, F. H. Woods, commenced a suit in this Court against E. Bonny, and attached the property as his individual property, and afterwards obtained judgment. Execution issued and levied upon the property and it was advertised for sale as Bonny's. The bill then charges various matters of fraud in the sale to Bonny, and in the note and suit of Woods and Bonny.

Several parties appeared as intervenors, claiming to be entitled to come in as judgment creditors of this firm, and alleging substantially the same facts as the plaintiffs. Woods demurred on several grounds, which will be noticed hereafter, and, the demurrer having been overruled, answered. The answer denies that the plaintiffs attached the property or any part of it, or took it in execution; also denies that on the 9th of April, 1857, the partnership of Bonny, Brooks & Moore existed, says it was dissolved on the 4th of April, 1857, the dissolution was notorious and plaintiffs had notice of it. On the 10th April, 1857, defendant commenced suit against Bonny, and attached property, recovered judgment, and caused property to be taken in execution. At this time defendant had no knowledge of the claim of the plaintiff; the property was that of Bonny, and in his possession, and defendant, by his attachment, acquired a lien on it. Defendant was, at the time of his suit, the sole owner of the note sued on by him, and that it was all justly due and owing to defendant by Bonny; of the amount, eleven hundred and thirty dollars, was a debt due from Bonny, Brooks & Moore; denies that he aided in bringing about the dissolution of the firm; and also all fraud or connection with any; or all knowledge of any trust or lien, or condition for benefit of creditors, in the sale to Bonny by the parties; and denies it to be the fact that it was so transferred; that one Alison brought suit for the property; that this defendant pleaded that the property was the individual property of Bonny and his attachment a lien on it; that the suit was decided in favor of defendants; and that the plaintiffs had notice of these facts, and made no claim to the property; denies that Bonny, Brooks & Moore have not property sufficient to satisfy claim of plaintiffs.

Conroy v. Woods.

---

A great deal of proof was taken, oral and documentary. The Court below found that the material allegations of the complaint were proven.

The ground upon which the learned Judge places his decree, in favor of the plaintiffs and intervenors, is, that the lien of the firm creditors of Bonny, Brooks & Moore is paramount to that of the individual creditor of Bonny. It has been seen that Bonny bought out the other two partners and agreed to pay the firm debts. We say he agreed to buy them out; for the mere disguise of this process — by means of the sale to Bell, and his transfer, a few days afterwards, to Bonny — is, when taken with the facts and the answer, too thin to permit us to doubt that Bell acted merely as the agent of Bonny in this transaction. Bonny then held the firm assets; and the question is, having got the title to them in this way, whether they stood anywise differently as respects the firm creditors than if the firm had continued? If the firm had continued, it is not disputed that the rights of the firm creditors would have been prior and paramount to those of an individual creditor; and it is not easy to see any substantial difference in respect to the principle we are considering, between one partner's buying out his associate's share, on agreement to pay the debts of the firm, and suffering the firm name to continue. This was partnership property bound for partnership debts when the firm was in existence, and it continued to be bound for those debts after the sale to this partner, especially when he assumed, as a part of the transaction, of purchase, the payment of those debts. Story on Partnership, Section 97, thus lays down the rule: "In short, as between the partners themselves, the debts and liabilities of the firm to creditors and third persons are a fund appropriated, in the first instance, to the discharge and payment of such debts, and liabilities, and there is, properly speaking, as between them, a lien thereon, or at least an equity, which may be worked out through the partners in favor of the creditors, although it may not directly attach in the creditors by virtue of their original claims, in all cases. Each partner also has a specific lien on the present and future property of the partnership, not only for the debts and liabilities due to third persons, but also for his amount or share of the capital, stock, and funds, and for all moneys, advanced by him for the use of the firm, and also for all debts due to the firm for moneys abstracted by any other partner from such stock and funds beyond his share. It follows from this principle, that if any partner takes the whole or a part of his share out of the partnership stock, the stock so taken, if identified, is applicable to the payment of what shall, upon an account taken, be found due from him to the partnership, before any of it can be applied to the payment of his debts, due to his own separate creditors; for such partner has an interest in the stock only to the amount of the ultimate balance due to him, as his share of the stock. The same rule will apply to any other property, into which the partnership property may have been converted, so far and so long as its original character and identity can be distinctly traced. Hence it may be stated, as a general corollary from the foregoing considerations, that no separate creditor of any partner can acquire any right, title, or interest, in the partnership stock, funds, or effects, by process or otherwise, merely in his character as such creditor, except for so much as belongs to that partner, as his share or balance, after all prior claims thereon are deducted and satisfied." (See, also, Story's Eq. Juris. Sec. 1253.)

Conroy v. Woods.

In Greenwood v. Brodhead, (8 Barb. 594,) the rights of creditors in such a case are discussed. The Court say, there is no doubt that joint creditors can, under certain circumstances, have a right of priority of payment out of partnership property, in preference to the private creditors of any separate partner, and Wilder v. Keeler, 3 Paige, 167; Hall v. Hall, 2 McCord, Ch. 302; Story's Eq. Sec. 1253; 1 Sand. Ch. 348, are cited.

The section of Story's Equity referred to holds: "The creditors, indeed, have no lien, but they have something approaching to a lien; that is, they have a right to sue at law, and by judgment and execution to obtain possession of the property, and in equity to follow it as a trust." So it is said in 8 Barbour: "The creditor must proceed to obtain a lien on the property before he can interfere to control it. If it be real estate, he obtains the lien by judgment; if personal property, liable to execution, by levy under process; and if choses in action, by the return of an execution unsatisfied after filing a complaint."

Conroy v. Woods.

---

In this case, the plaintiff had, before the filing of his bill, a lien by attachment and a judgment. We see no necessity for the levy of an execution. It would have answered no beneficial purpose; it was not necessary to give a lien; that had already accrued from the levy of the attachment; and it was not necessary for a sale, for a sale was not desired. The intervenors also had attachments levied; that gave them a lien; and if they had waited for the filing of their bill until judgment was obtained, it might have been too late. At the time of the trial, they had obtained and produced their judgments. The authorities do not place the right to go into equity upon the ground that the plaintiffs must show themselves to be creditors by judgment; but they go on the ground that they must show a lien on the property; and this lien exists as well by the levy of an attachment as by execution.

It is true, it is said in 8 Barbour, "that until such lien is obtained, the partners have power to make any bona fide sale of the property they think proper. But when such lien exists, the creditor may claim the aid of the Court to restrain the disposition of the property by injunction, to have it placed in charge of a receiver, and to compel its equitable application." But we do not understand by the bona fide sale here spoken of, a sale, directly or indirectly, to one of the partners, accompanied with a stipulation that he shall pay the firm debts.

Indeed, this very question was decided in Sedam v. Williams, (4 McLean, C. C. R. 51.) But it scarcely needs authority to prove that if this equity existed against the three partners, or the firm property, when owned by the three, that it lost none of its force from the mere fact that the sole title to the property became lodged in the hands of one of them, no credit having been given by individual creditors on the strength of an apparent sole ownership in the vendee.

Woods seems to have had notice of these facts; and if he had not, the mere fact of his getting his separate judgment and issuing execution, and making a levy, gave him no title to this property as against the superior equity of these firm creditors.

Woodbury v. Bowman.

---

2. We think that a Court of Equity has jurisdiction of this case. No action against the Sheriff would lie for a levy, and the property would, perhaps, be lost by a sale of it to different purchasers. (Place v. Sweetzer, 16 Ohio, 142; 19 Vermont, 286.)

The other points are not well taken.

Woods is the only Appellant here, and he can complain of no error not to his prejudice.

WOODBURY v. BOWMAN et al.

In a suit on an injunction bond, defendant, to show that the injunction suit was still pending, offered in evidence, an order from the Supreme Court, directing the Court below to fix the amount of a suspensive appeal bond, that Court having dissolved the injunction. Held, that the order was properly rejected, the defendant not offering to show that the bond and notice of appeal were given, and the transcript filed in the Appellate Court. Where a suit is pending in the Supreme Court on appeal, the judgment below is suspended for all purposes, and it is not evidence upon the questions at issue, even between the parties.

APPEAL from the Fifth District.

For case see opinion.

Heydenfeldt, for Appellant.

Robinson, Beatty & Heacock, for Respondent.

TERRY, C. J. delivered the opinion of the Court—BALDWIN, J. concurring.

This was an action upon an injunction bond; plaintiff recovered judgment below, and defendants appeal.

The first point taken by Appellant is, that the Court below rejected evidence offered by defendants to prove that the right to the injunction was not finally decided at the commencement of this action. This point would be decisive of the case, if the evidence offered was sufficient to establish the pendency of the injunction at the time this suit was instituted; but upon examining the evidence offered, it is clear that it is not sufficient for this purpose.

The paper offered in evidence, which is set out in the record,

Woodbury v. Bowman.

---

and which is called a supersedeas, is simply an order directing the Court below to fix the amount of a suspensive appeal bond. There was no offer to show any other steps—such as giving the bond after the amount was fixed, giving notice of appeal, and filing the transcript in the Appellate Court—all of which were necessary to show that the question was still pending and undecided.

The Appellant is also incorrect in his statement that “a stipulation between the parties to show that the appeal from the dissolution was still pending under the supersedeas,” was offered and rejected. The record shows that the stipulation offered was admitted by the Court against the exception of plaintiff; the stipulation itself seems to have been admitted; at least there is no reference to it either in the index or briefs of counsel, and we have been unable to find it, and, in the absence of direct evidence to the contrary, we must presume in favor of the judgment, that it did not establish the pendency of the case.

The second point is, that the Court rejected evidence offered to prove that the water of which plaintiffs were deprived, during the twenty-five days while the injunction was observed, was not the property of plaintiff, but of the Mokelumne Hill Canal Company, who were plaintiffs in the injunction suit, and the party in whose behalf the bond sued on in this action was executed by defendants.

The evidence offered on this point seems to have been the judgment roll in the suit of The Mokelumne Hill Company v. Woodbury, 10 Cal. 185, which cause was then pending in this Court upon an appeal, which was taken from the judgment by the present plaintiff, who was defendant in the suit.

We think it was properly rejected; the appeal having suspended the operation of the judgment for all purposes, it was not evidence in the questions at issue, even between the parties to it.

Judgment affirmed.

Levy v. Supervisors Yuba County.

---

LEVY v. SUPERVISORS YUBA COUNTY.

WHEREAS a county is already in possession of a set of weights and measures according to law, it cannot be held liable for a new set purchased by the Deputy Sealer of Weights and Measures.
The fact that the County Clerk refused to deliver the set to plaintiff on demand, is immaterial. He should have enforced his right.

APPEAL from the Tenth District.

Case made under the 337th Section of the Practice Act.

Plaintiff presented his account to defendants, and they rejected it. The Court below entered judgment for plaintiff. Defendants appealed.

For facts, see opinion.

F. L. Hatch, District Attorney, for Appellant.

Gordon N. Mott, for Respondent.

TERRY, C. J. delivered the opinion of the Court — BALDWIN, J. concurring.

Plaintiff, who is Deputy Sealer of Weights and Measures for Yuba County, seeks to recover the sum of three hundred and twenty-five dollars, as the price of a set of weights and measures purchased by him for the use of his office.

The 3d Section of the Act of April 12th, 1858, authorizes "every Deputy Sealer of Weights and Measures to procure, at the expense of his county, a complete set of weights," etc. and Levy, after his appointment, proceeded to make such purchase, although he knew that there was a complete set of such weights and measures belonging to the county, in the possession of the County Clerk.

We think defendants properly refused to audit the account.

The county of Yuba was already in possession of the weights, etc. necessary for the office, and it was not contemplated that every change in the incumbent of the office should entail upon the county the expense of a new purchase of articles already on hand. It is not material that the County Clerk refused to deliver the weights, etc. to plaintiff on his demand; if he was entitled to their possession by virtue of his appointment, he should have taken proper steps to enforce this right.

Judgment reversed.

Hancock Ditch Co. v. Bradford.

---

HANCOCK DITCH CO. v. BRADFORD et al.

PLAINTIFF has a right to take a nonsuit at any time before the jury retires, there being no counter claim. Nor, under the 14th Section of the Practice Act, is he bound to tender costs before the nonsuit. The provision as to costs is simply, that, by the nonsuit, plaintiff becomes subject to costs.

APPEAL from the Fifth District.

Bill in equity to restrain defendants from diverting the waters of Wood's Creek from plaintiff's ditch.

H. P. Barber, for Appellant, cited 2 Wend. 295; Prac. Act, Sec. 148, Sub. 4; 3 Chitty's Genl. Pr. 910; 1 Graham on New Trials, 281; 3 Id. 896, Note; 3 Blac. 376.

L. Quint, for Respondent, cited Prac. Act, Sec. 148; Locke v. Wood, 16 Mass. 316; 12 Id. 47, 48.

BALDWIN, J. delivered the opinion of the Court—TERRY, C. J. concurring.

The error assigned here is, that the Court refused to permit the plaintiff to take a nonsuit after the testimony for plaintiff and defendants was closed. No counter claim seems to have been made in this case by defendants. By the 148th Section of the Practice Act, it is provided "that the plaintiff may, at any time before trial, upon the payment of costs, if a counter claim has not been made," take a nonsuit. By trial here, is meant the determination or finding in the case. We do not understand that the plaintiff is bound to tender the costs before being entitled to be nonsuited; for the costs cannot be at the moment known or computed. But this proviso was only meant to declare that the effect of the nonsuit is to subject him to costs. At common law, the right of the plaintiff was to take a nonsuit at any time before the jury retired, and we do not construe the statute as altering the rule. (3 Ch. Genl. Pr. 910.)

The judgment on the verdict is reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to the Court below to enter judgment of nonsuit as of the 8th November, 1858.

SKINKER v. FLOHR.

An affidavit by a party to the suit, that the original deed "is not in his possession or under his control," is sufficient to admit in evidence a certified copy from the Recorder's office, the deed having been properly acknowledged and recorded, and the grantee being a third person.

APPEAL from the Sixth District.

Ejectment. Plaintiff had judgment, defendant appeals.

C. A. Johnson, for Appellant, cited: Beach v. McCann, 2 Cal. 25; Folsom's Executors v. Scott et al. 6 Id. 460; Macy v. Goodwin et al. Id. 579; Fallon v. Dougherty.

Latham & Sunderland, for Respondent, cited: the Act of 1857, 317, arguing that where a party is in no way connected with a deed as grantee, he is not presumed to have its custody, and hence it not bound to account for the absence of the original, before he can introduce a certified copy, and that his affidavit, that the original "is not in his possession, or under his control," meets the statute.

BALDWIN, J. delivered the opinion of the Court — TERREY, C. J. concurring.

There is no merit in this appeal.

The only error assigned is, the ruling of the Court admitting in evidence certified copies of certain deeds to third persons as grantees, which deeds had been regularly acknowledged and recorded. The plaintiff below laid the foundation for their introduction by his affidavit that the originals were not under his control. By this affidavit he brought himself within the words of the Act of April 29th, 1857, (Acts, 317,) the second section of which provides, that "duly certified copies of deeds regularly recorded upon the acknowledgment or proof of execution by the party or parties thereto, subject, however, to all legal exceptions that might be taken to the original if produced, shall be received in evidence in all the Courts of the State, without further or other proof of the execution thereof, in the same manner and with like effect, as if the originals were produced and proven; provided, it be shown that the said originals are not under the control of the party offering the said copies, or are lost," and this showing is properly made by the affidavit of the party.

Judgment affirmed.

RUTHRAUFF et al. v. KRESZ et als.

UNDER the statute, the County Judge may grant an injunction in cases in the District Court, but he cannot appoint a Receiver; at least, not as a thing distinct from the injunction.

APPEAL from the Fifth District.

Suit to recover a portion of a "Tunnel Gold Mining Claim," alleged to be wrongfully seized and worked by defendants, for damages and an injunction pending the suit.

J. P. Vaughan, for Petitioner.

BALDWIN, J., delivered the opinion of the Court — TERRY, C. J., concurring.

The plaintiff, at the time of filing his complaint, obtained from the Judge of the County Court an order of injunction to restrain the defendants from working the premises in dispute, and requiring them to appear before him at chambers, to show cause why the injunction should not be made "perpetual pending the action." The County Judge dissolved the injunction, but appointed a Receiver; to which the defendant excepted, and now, by certiorari, brings the case here on appeal from this order.

By Section 9 of Article 6 of the Constitution, it is provided that "the County Courts shall have such jurisdiction in cases arising in Justices' Courts, and in special cases, as the Legislature may prescribe, but shall have no original civil jurisdiction except in such special cases."

The Legislature has given (Wood's Digest, 181,) to the County Judge power to grant an injunction; but it seems that no power is given him to appoint a Receiver; certainly not as a distinct proceeding from the injunction. This would be an order, like any other in the course of a cause which the District Court or

Bridges v. Paige.

Judge might make. The statute (Wood's Digest, 185,) provides "that a Receiver may be appointed by the Court in which the action is pending, or by a Judge thereof." We do not see where the authority for this power in the County Judge is to be found; nor that he could make an order of this sort any more than any other order, in a cause pending in the District Court, deemed necessary to the progress of the case.

Order reversed.

BRIDGES &amp; HALL v. PAIGE.

Suit by an Attorney on a quantum valebant, for professional services. Answer denies the value of the services. Held, that the rule requiring new matter to be set up in the answer does not apply.

Anything which shows plaintiff has no right of recovery at all, or to the extent claimed on the case as he makes it, may be given in evidence upon an issue joined by an allegation in the complaint, and its denial in the answer.

New matter is, where defendant seeks to introduce into the case a defense not disclosed by the pleadings — something relied on by him, but not put in issue by the plaintiff.

Skillful, or unskillful and negligent conduct of a case, is an important inquiry in such a suit by Attorneys. Anything which shows the services were not of the value claimed, as the nature of the suit conducted, its little difficulty, small amount, little skill requisite, the absence of skill and the like, is competent, under the issue of value.

A trial may result successfully and yet the Attorney be guilty of negligence. His want of skill, or neglect, may put the client to great expense to redeem his blunders. And, on a quantum meruit, the value of services would be reduced.

APPEAL from the Fifth District.

For case see opinion. The pleadings were verified. Plaintiffs had judgment, and defendant appeals.

D. W. Perley, for Appellant.

B. C. Whiting, for Respondent, cited: 46th Section of the Practice Act; Green v. Covillaud, 10 Cal. 317; Piercy v. Sabin et al. Id. 22; Walton v. Minturn, 1 Id. 362; 4 Id. 117; Kendall v. Vallejo, 1 Id. 371.

BALDWIN, J., delivered the opinion of the Court — TERRY, C. J., concurring.

This suit was brought as on a quantum valebant, for professional services as Attorneys. The complaint claimed, among other charges, a sum of money due for the conduct of a suit of Paige v. O'Neill, 12 Cal. 483. The answer denied the value of the services as charged. The defendant proposed to show by a witness—one of the plaintiffs—that they did not perform the legal services rendered by them in the case of Paige v. O'Neill with ordinary care, diligence, or reasonable skill, but that they performed said services negligently and unskillfully, and that, by reason of such unskillfulness and negligence, the case, which is now on appeal in the Supreme Court, is in great danger of being reversed. The defendant's counsel proposed to show the above facts by an examination of the witness in connection with the judgment roll in said case, the statement on appeal, and by all the papers on file in the said action; and the said defendant's counsel further proposed to show, after the said examination was concluded, touching the unskillfulness and negligence on their part in managing and conducting said cause, that their services were not reasonably worth the amount claimed in the complaint. But the Court refused to permit or allow the defendant's counsel to go into said examination, and refused to permit the defendant's counsel, either by an examination of the witness or by an examination of the judgment roll, to show that plaintiffs had been guilty of any unskillfulness or negligence whatever.

---

Bridges v. Paige.

One of the reasons given for this ruling is, that this matter is not set up in the answer. It seems to be supposed that this was new matter, which should have been affirmatively pleaded. The rule invoked, however, does not apply to this case. Anything which shows that the plaintiff has not the right of recovery at all, or to the extent he claims, on the case as he makes it, may be given in evidence upon an issue joined by an allegation in the complaint, and its denial in the answer. Where, however, something is relied on by the defendant which is not put in issue by the plaintiff, then the defendant must set it up. That is new matter—that is, the defendant seeks to introduce into the case, a defense which is not disclosed by the pleadings. This case is a good illustration: the plaintiffs aver that the defendant is indebted to them in the sum of, say fifteen hundred dollars, for services rendered; that he is indebted to this amount because this was the value of these services. The defendant denies that he is indebted at all, and denies, further, that the services were of the value charged. He proposes to show that they were not of this value. He can do this by any legal proof, and he is not bound to set out his proofs in his pleading. Facts, and not the evidence of facts, are required to be pleaded. Whatever, therefore, had a legal tendency to prove that these services were worth the sum, was competent for plaintiffs, as the nature of the suit, its difficulty, the amount involved, the skill required, the skill employed, and the like. So the defense had a right to prove these same general matters, or the negation of them, as, for example, that this was a plain case, requiring but little labor or skill, learning, or time; or if it required skill and attention, that these were not bestowed. The value of a lawyer's services depends upon his skill and learning, and the attention he gives to the business of the client. It is evident, therefore, that proof of his skillful conduct of his case, or of his negligent and unskillful treatment of it, is an important inquiry. It does not follow by any means, that because a trial results in a verdict for the client, there has been no negligence in the Attorney. In consequence of the negligence, the client may have been put to great trouble and expense, though, by accident or otherwise, he happened to gain the case; and though the Court below may have decided on the trial of a case that errors negligently committed were not fatal, yet the defendant might show, when sued for fees by the Attorney, that the Judge was mistaken in thus holding. Besides, a case may be negligently conducted even when it is not eventually lost by neglect. It may put the client to great trouble, expense, and delay, to get rid of blunders of his lawyer. If, for example, an Attorney should, by his neglect, consent to a bill of exceptions full of errors and misstatements, and raising unnecessarily many difficult and embarrassing questions of law for revision in the Appellate Court, which questions, as the case, in fact, was presented below, did not arise, no one would pretend, that though the cause was, after long delay and much loss, gained in the Supreme Court, the Attorney would not be amenable to the charge of neglect; or if the Attorney suffered testimony to be introduced plainly inadmissible, and the client was put to the expense and trouble of summoning many witnesses to counteract it, though he at length did so successfully, the same objection would lie; and in both these instances, the Attorneys would be held entitled to a less sum on quantum meruit, than if a contrary course had been pursued. What pa-ticular errors, if any, were committed on the trial of Paige v. O'Neill, or what particular acts of negligence done, were not disclosed, the Court refusing to hear any testimony on that subject. We have not the record of that case before us, and cannot look into it. It seems that the judgment of the Court below was partially affirmed in this Court on appeal, but not, we believe, before this trial below, nor does it appear whether the matters of alleged negligence proposed to be proven were considered here. Indeed, we cannot look into any record before us, not legally offered as proof, for any purpose of the application of the facts of that record to any other case as evidence in the latter case.

Bridges v. Paige.

---

 Pfeiffer v. Riehn.

It may be that the record of Paige v. O'Neill showed no negligence; and the rulings of the learned Judge below, on the motion for a new trial, would seem at the first blush to establish this fact; but we cannot know, in the face of the offer to prove the contrary, that the defendant would necessarily have been unsuccessful; nor do we understand from the broad proffer of proof, that the negligence imputed was confined to errors as shown by the record.

Judgment reversed, and cause remanded.

PFEIFFER & WIFE v. RIEHN & SCANNELL.

In an equity case, submitted by the Court to a jury, this Court will not review the testimony, if any proof sustains the verdict and judgment.

A jurat to an answer is, in form and substance, an affidavit, and may be taken before a County Recorder.

Where husband and wife execute a note and mortgage, the note is good as to the husband, even if void as to the wife; and the property is bound by the mortgage, independent of the note of the wife.

Owrey v. Nee, (6 Cal. 629,) that the Legislature may determine in what manner and how the homestead is to be protected, affirmed.

In a mortgage of the homestead, the premises need not be described as the homestead.

Where the jury and Court are satisfied that the wife understood English, at the time of executing and acknowledging a note and mortgage upon the homestead, there was no necessity for an interpreter to explain the contents of the mortgage.

In a foreclosure suit, on a note and mortgage of the homestead, executed by husband and wife, the wife alone answered, but did not verify her answer. On suit brought to vacate the decree rendered in the foreclosure, the wife, having been served with process, cannot complain that her answer was not verified. And her failure, by excusable negligence, to make defense to the foreclosure, is no ground to vacate the decree, if it be shown that in fact she had no defense.

---

Pfeiffer v. Riehn.

---

▲ A decree, in an equity case, is not vitiated because based on the verdict of a jury, even though it might have been made without a jury.

APPEAL from the Twelfth District.

Facts stated by the Court. Scannell, as Sheriff, is made party in order to enjoin him from making a deed of the premises to Riehn, who bought at the foreclosure sale, and to whom, it is averred, the Sheriff is about to make a deed. Plaintiffs appeal from a judgment for defendant.

Gregory Yale, for Appellant.

I. The note and mortgage, so far as they affect the interest of the plaintiff, Theckla, and her children, in the homestead, are void.

1. As to the note. The note of a married woman is void, except so far as she may bind her separate property in equity. Her note cannot bind her interest in the homestead, as the estate is joint, in the husband and wife, with the interest in the children.

2. The premises were not described as a homestead in the mortgage. The word "homestead" does not occur in the mortgage, or in the complaint to foreclose, or in the summons, or in the decree of foreclosure. The term "homestead" has a distinct legal signification; and the term, as used in the Constitution and the Act, must be interpreted according to that known signification. (1 Bouv. Dic. 641; see, also, Woodman v. Lane, 7 N. H. 245.)

This point is important in connection with the character of the acknowledgment to be made by the wife. The Notary in this case merely states in his certificate that she executed the same, (the mortgage,) for the uses and purposes therein mentioned, and "after being made acquainted with the contents of said instrument" acknowledged, etc. She may have been made acquainted with the contents of the mortgage, and yet have known nothing of the mortgage of the homestead. The Homestead Act, say the Court, Pease v. Barbiers, (10 Cal. 440,) refers the mode of acknowledgment to the law relating to conveyances.

3. That part of the Act authorizing a forced sale of the homestead, is unconstitutional. "Forced sale," in the Constitution, is used as contradistinguished to "voluntary sale." The constitutional provision is, in effect, a prohibition against a forced sale. It may be, that, until the Legislature acted, no protection against a forced sale was provided by the mere constitutional mandate. (Groves v. Slaughter, 15 Pet.) But the Legislature, having acted upon the subject, could only act within the scope of the constitutional provision. It could not impair the force of the provision by qualifying it. It is doubtful whether value has anything to do with the exemption under the Constitution. The principle is to protect the family residence.

---

Pfeiffer v. Riehn.

---

What is said upon this subject in Cary v. Tice, (6 Cal. 629,) is not only a dictum, but contrary to express authority under a constitution from which our provision was adopted. (Sampson et al. v. Williamson, 6 Texas, 102; Benedict v. Burnell, 7 Cal. 246.)

II. The proceedings and judgment in the suit of Riehn to foreclose the mortgage, so far as affects the plaintiff, Theckla's, interest in the homestead, are nullities.

This results from the character of the estate, being a joint tenancy, requiring the husband and wife to unite in an action to defend the homestead. (Revalk v. Kraemer, 8 Cal. 66; Poole v. Guard, Id.; Kraemer v. Revalk, Id. 74; Van Reynegan v. Revalk, Id. 75; Marks & Wife v. Marshe, 9 Id. 90; Moss v. Warner, 10 Id. 296; Sargeant v. Wilson et al. 5 Cal. 507.)

Neither will the acts or declarations of the husband bind the wife, as to the homestead. (Dunn v. Tozer, 10 Cal. 167.) His default could not affect her. If he could cause a loss of the homestead by default, he could by sale, or abandonment. The answer of the wife is a nullity. Her failure to defend, under the circumstances, was excusable neglect. (Pr. Act, Sec. 68.) The trial by jury was wrong. (Sanders v. Still & Wife, 8 Cal. 281.)

IV. The evidence proves that the plaintiff, Theckla, was not sufficiently acquainted with the English language to comprehend the character of the mortgage.

The statute makes no provision for the employment of interpreters where acknowledgments of foreigners are taken to deeds. If an interpreter is employed, or, if the officer taking the acknowledgment uses any other than the English language, in communicating with the person making the acknowledgment, the certificate should state the fact. See Moore v. Peralta, (McAllister's C. C. R.) as to the practice in chancery of appointing interpreters on filing answers, where the party does not understand English.

---

---

Equity will relieve against this deed, signed in ignorance of her rights. (4 Young & Coll. 42.)

Campbell & Turk, for Respondent.

I. The question of fact has been determined by a jury. The Court below has sanctioned that determination.

It is immaterial whether any, and, if any, what, errors were committed in the original suit; they could not be corrected in this proceeding.

II. The note of a married woman is not void, but only voidable, and though Theckla might have availed herself of this defense in the first suit, she failed to do so, and has not shown any sufficient excuse for her laches. Doubtless the judgment was entered against her personally through inadvertence, and, upon suggestion, the judgment would have been so modified as to correct the error. But this would not have prevented the sale of the homestead under the mortgage. That instrument was not invalidated by the fact of her signing her note; the remedy would have been just as perfect against the property if she had never seen the note.

III. The Constitution is advisory. It does not pretend to limit the Legislature. If no legislation had been adopted on the subject the entire property of the debtor would now be liable to execution. The extent to which the Legislature shall act is not regulated by the Constitution. The nature of the subject precludes the possibility of laying down any fixed rule.

IV. If the proceedings and judgment in the case of Riehn to foreclose the mortgage, so far as they affect the plaintiff, Theckla's, interest in the homestead, are nullities, she has no standing in Court. The nullity is apparent, if at all, on the face of the papers. If they are not nullities, but errors merely, they can be corrected on appeal, and a bill in equity does not lie. That, in a suit to claim the homestead, husband and wife are necessary parties is not disputed; but that does not tend to prove that where A commences a suit against B and his wife to foreclose a mortgage executed by them, A is bound to, or can, compel them to set up any particular defense whatsoever; they, or either of them, may defend if they please, or suffer judgment to go against them, or either of them, by default.

Pfeiffer v. Riehn.

---

There is nothing in the objection to the jury trial, as a verdict in these cases is advisory only. So, as to the jurat to the answer, the term "affidavit" embraces the verification.

BALDWIN, J. delivered the opinion of the Court—TERRY, C. J. concurring.

This bill was filed by the female plaintiff, in conjunction with her husband, to set aside a certain decree for the sale of property which she claims as homestead, situate in San Francisco. This lot was sold on a decree for the foreclosure of a mortgage, which was executed to Riehn by Pfeiffer and wife, in the form required by statute. The female plaintiff charges that she was ignorant of the English language. That she was requested by her husband to sign a note, and a mortgage to secure it, on this property, which she did without knowing the contents; that the mortgage purports to be acknowledged before one Moore, Notary Public, the certificate being in the usual form, but she denies the truth of the facts therein stated—as the examination and her being made acquainted with the papers. The same averments are made in relation to another mortgage.

Bill avers that defendant, Riehn, in January, 1857, commenced an action for the foreclosure of his mortgage against the plaintiffs, etc. The summons was returned as executed on them the 21st January, 1857; that neither of the defendants, except the female plaintiff, answered, and, on the 20th June, 1857, a default was entered in the Clerk's office against all the defendants except the female plaintiff. That, on the 10th February, 1857, she filed her answer, signed by a law firm, denying the execution of the note and mortgage, and claiming a homestead. On the 27th June, 1857, a verdict was returned for the plaintiff.

She avers, that, at the time she received the summons, from the Deputy Sheriff, she handed the same over to her husband as a matter pertaining to his business alone; and, at the time of the trial, and for a long time before, she was sick; that she was dependent on her husband to employ counsel and defend the suit, etc.; that he employed one Parker, but never told him of the defense as here set up. Parker accordingly did not set up any such defense. She is advised that the answer—denying the execution of written documents on which the action was founded—not being verified was a mere nullity; that no Attorney was present at the trial; avers that the consideration on which the mortgage was given was a mere nullity—it being a joint note of her and her husband; that she could make no joint contract except as connected with her separate estate—which this was not.

---

Pfeiffer v. Riehn.

---

Bill prays that the verdict may be set aside and the decree of foreclosure entered thereon opened up, and plaintiff admitted to make a defense, etc.

The defendants answered, denying the material averments in respect to the execution and acknowledgment of the mortgage, and averring that she acknowledged it as the certificate states, knowing the contents, which were explained to her.

The Court below submitted the case to a jury, who returned a verdict for the defendants.

It would be no easy task, perhaps, for the plaintiff to maintain this bill, even upon proof of all its averments. But upon looking at the proofs, though they do not agree, we have no hesitation in arriving at the conclusion that the jury were right in their verdict. It is not our habit to review the testimony; it is unnecessary here; because if any proof sustains the verdict and judgment, we should not disturb it.

Some points are made by the Appellant, which we will briefly notice:

1. A motion to strike out the defendants' answer because it was not verified—the bill having been sworn to. The ground of this objection is, that the verification was before the County Recorder, who had no authority, as Appellant contends, to administer oaths. But the statute giving authority "to Recorders to take affidavits to be used in any Court of Justice in this State," comprehended the power to take and certify the jurat—which is, in form and substance, an affidavit.

---

Pfeiffer v. Biehn.

---

2. It is said that a married woman cannot make a note except as affecting her separate estate, and, therefore, this mortgage founded on this note, is void. We think otherwise. Even if the note of the wife is void as to her, it was good as to the husband, and the property is bound by the mortgage, independent of the note of the wife — if otherwise valid.

3. It is argued that the Constitution protects the property from forced sale by decree of foreclosure of a mortgage, as well as otherwise, and some cases from Texas are cited. But the Texas Constitution is different from ours. In the case of Carey v. Tice, (6 Cal. 629,) the same point was made. The Court say: "Upon the point that the Legislature can direct in what manner this species of property may be sold, or the tenancy destroyed, we have no doubt. The Constitution is inoperative of itself, and looks to legislation; and in acting upon this subject, it was a matter entirely within the discretion of the Legislature to determine how far, and in what manner, the homestead should be protected." It is true, the case might have been decided without this last proposition, but it arose from the facts and was fully argued. We regard the decision as binding, upon the rule of stare decisis, as important rights have vested under it, even if we were satisfied — which we are not — that the doctrine was originally questionable.

4. We think there was no necessity for the mortgage to define the premises as the homestead. The grantors interested in property are presumed to know what they are granting when they use expressions which accurately describe the property.

5. There was no necessity for an interpreter, for it seems the jury and the Court below were satisfied that the wife understood English.

6. Having been served with process, the wife was bound by the judgment in the first suit. She cannot complain that her answer was not verified. And if she, by excusable negligence, failed to make defense, the very thing found against her now is that she had none.

7. The decrees might have been made in both suits without a jury, but we do not see that they were vitiated because of the verdicts.

Decree affirmed.

13 Cal. 9-11. BARKER v. KONEMAN.

Husband and Wife.—Deed of gift from husband to wife, of his separate real estate, he being at the time free from debts and liabilities, is valid as against creditors, p. 11.

Commented on and distinguished, Kohner v. Ashenauer, 17 Cal. 581, in which case the conveyance was not of any separate property of the husband, and it did not appear that the property was transferred as a gift, or in exchange for any separate property of the wife, and it was held that the property therefore continued subject to the disposition of the husband after the title was placed in the wife's name, as it was previously, and that the conveyance in no respect affected the validity of a mortgage subsequently given by the husband on the same property. Explained, Peck v. Brummagim, 31 Cal. 445, 447, 89 Am. Dec. 199, 200, extending the rule to a gift of either real or personal property, and to that which at the time was the community property of the husband and wife. And so in Dow v. Gould etc. Min. Co., 31 Cal. 653; Rico v. Brandenstein, 98 Cal. 469; 35 Am. St. Rep. 196. Ruling approved, Furrow v. Athey, 21 Neb. 672; 59 Am. Rep. 868; and cited as authority, Cooke v. Bremond, 86 Am. Dec. 642, note, treating of conveyance from husband to wife. Also cited, Tillaux v. Tillaux, 115 Cal. 671, holding that there is no presumption of undue influence in case of a conveyance from one spouse to the other, but the deed prima facie conveys whatever its terms embrace.

Same.—The law favors provisions made by the husband, when in solvent circumstances, for the wife and family, against possible future misfortunes, p. 11.

Approved, Tillaux v. Tillaux, 115 Cal. 669, holding that a deed from husband to wife, conveying an absolute title in fee, with an expressed consideration of "love and affection," and "for her better maintenance and support," requires no other consideration to support it. So, to same effect, Emmons v. Barton, 109 Cal. 671.

St. Rep. 153, holding that the grantor of land is estopped by his deed of grant, bargain, and sale, purporting to convey an absolute title to the land, from denying that before and at the time of that deed he had such absolute title, and by that deed conveyed it to the grantee.

Mortgage is a Mere Security for a debt, and does not pass the fee, nor give a right of entry, p. 14.

Approved, Goodenow v. Ewer, 16 Cal. 468; 76 Am. Dec. 544, and Dutton v. Warschauer, 21 Cal. 621; 82 Am. Dec. 768, holding that a mortgage is not a conveyance vesting in the mortgagee any estate in the land either before or after condition broken. So in Willis v. Farley, 24 Cal. 498, and Jackson v. Lodge, 36 Cal. 39, holding that a mortgage passes by an assignment of the debt, is discharged by a payment of the debt, and is barred by the statute of limitations when the debt is barred. Cited as authority on the ruling stated, McMillan v. Richards, 70 Am. Dec. 675, n.

Judgment.—If right, will not be reversed, though a wrong reason was given for it, p. 15.

Approved, holding that an erroneous conclusion of law constitutes no ground for reversal, if the judgment was right, Spencer v. Duncan, 107 Cal. 426.

Parties.—Where land mortgaged is sold, the vendee of the mortgagor cannot be ousted from possession by a purchaser under the decree of foreclosure and sale, unless he was made a party to the foreclosure suit, p. 15.

Principle of the ruling applied, Barrett v. Blackmar, 47 Iowa, 570.

13 Cal. 15-24. CRANDALL v. BLEN.

Execution.—Whether a chose in action, calling for a definite sum without condition, is the subject of levy and sale, questioned, p. 22.

Referred to, Davis v. Mitchell, 34 Cal. 89, holding that a promissory note, being the property of the defendant in an attachment and execution, is liable to seizure and sale thereunder, and discussing, but not deciding, whether the sale will be valid without a delivery of the note to the purchaser. Also referred to in McBride v. Fallon, 65 Cal. 303, in which case it is held that a judgment cannot be levied upon and sold under execution as personal property capable of manual delivery, but only in the mode prescribed in section 542, Code of Civil Procedure. Cited, defining the term "property," 55 Am. Dec. 405, note; also, 92 Am. Dec. 416, note, as questioning Adams v. Hackett, 7 Cal. 187.

13 Cal. 24-23. HOUSTON v. WILLIAMS. 73 Am. Dec. 565.

Constitutional Duty of Supreme Court is discharged by the rendition of its decisions, and the legislature cannot require it to give the reasons of its decisions in writing, p. 25.

Cited as authority to the same ruling, Vaughn v. Harp, 49 Ark. 161; Jordan v. Andrus, 26 Mont. 42, act of March 9, 1901, providing that transcripts on appeal may be printed or typewritten at the election of appellant is invalid; Ex parte Griffiths, 118 Ind. 85, 86, 10 Am. St. Rep. 109, holding that a statute requiring judges of the supreme court to prepare syllabi of their decisions was unconstitutional and void; denying power in the legislature to trench upon the powers of the judges, or to prescribe the mode in which they shall discharge their duties, State v. Smith, 5 Mo. App. 430, De Votie v. McGere, 14 Colo. 592; Saint Croix Lumber Co. v. Pennington, 2 Dak. Ter. 473; and Smythe v. Boswell, 117 Ind. 366, and referred to in this connection, Norwalk Street Ry. Co.'s Appeal, 69 Conn. 593; and Nudd v. Burrows, 91 U. S. 442; 13 Bank. Reg. 295. Distinguished, In re Jessup, 81 Cal. 485, construing constitutional provision as to the granting of rehearings in bank after decision by a department.

Same.—A decision of the court is its judgment, the opinion is the reasons given for that judgment, p. 27.

Cited in Wilson v. Wilson, 64 Cal. 94, holding that the opinion of the judge of the trial court is not a part of the record. Distinguished, Pierce v. State, 109 Ind. 536, the terms "opinion" and "decision" being sometimes used interchangeably in the Indiana statute, so that an exception to the "opinion" of the court has been sustained as proper; Board v. State, 7 Kan. App. 623, Adams v. Yazoo etc. Co., 77 Miss. 304, and Buckeye etc. Co. v. Fee, 62 Ohio St. 556, 78 Am. St. Rep. 745, construing local statutes; Eureka Co. Bank v. Clarke, 130 Fed. 326, opinion of court is not proper subject for assignment of errors; State v. Gray, 42 Or. 268, where terms of decree conflict with statements of fact in court's opinion, decree is controlling; Hammer v. Downing, 39 Or. 523, judgment for costs in favor of prevailing party entered before a petition for rehearing has been filed is not premature, and cannot be vacated. Cited as to distinction stated, 85 Am. Dec. 396, note; 87 Am. Dec. 523, note; 7 Am. St. Rep. 245, note; and as to the power of courts over their records, 79 Am. Dec. 437, note; 80 Am. Dec. 192, note; and 82 Am. Dec. 175, note.

13 Cal. 28-31. DUMPHY v. GUINDON.

Jurisdiction.—Costs are only incidental to the action, and for the purpose of testing jurisdiction constitute no part of the "matter in dispute," p. 30.

Affirmed, Zabriskie v. Torrey, 20 Cal. 174; Bolton v. Landears, 27 Cal. 107; and Henigan v. Ervin, 110 Cal. 40. Distinguished, Meeker v. Harris, 23 Cal. 286, holding that the costs of an action may become a matter in dispute, and that when they amount to a sum sufficient to bring the case within the jurisdiction of the court, its jurisdiction attaches. Distinguished, also, in Dashell v. Slingerland, 60 Cal. 657, noting that the constitution of 1849 did not exclude interest in fixing the appellate jurisdiction of the supreme court; and explained in dissenting opinion of Morrison, C. J., in same case. Cited, bearing on jurisdiction of supreme court, 70 Am. Dec. 724, note.

13 Cal. 31-33. BRADY v. REYNOLDS.

Guarantor and Indorser.—The contract of indorsement is, primarily, that of transfer; the contract of guaranty is that of security, p. 32.

Cited, Ford v. Hendricks, 34 Cal. 675, holding that one who indorses a promissory note, over his signature, "I hereby waive demand, notice of nonpayment and protest," is a guarantor. Also cited, Fessenden v. Summers, 62 Cal. 486, in which case it is held that one not a party to a note, who indorses it in blank before delivery, is an indorser, and not a guarantor; and again cited, First Nat. Bank v. Babcock, 94 Cal. 102, 28 Am. St. Rep. 96, asserting the rule that one who indorses a non-negotiable promissory note to give it credit is a guarantor. Cited, collecting the authorities on the subject, 56 Am. Dec. 359, note.

13 Cal. 33-40. ORTMAN v. DIXON.

Seal.—By the common law, the equitable title to realty may be conveyed by an instrument not under seal, if otherwise sufficient, p. 36.

Approved in Marling v. Marling, 9 W. Va. 95; 27 Am. Rep. 548, holding that a court of equity will effectuate a gift of lands by a father to his child, evidenced only by an unsealed instrument delivered to the child. So in Le Franc v. Richmond, 5 Sawy. 603, holding that rights to water privileges on public lands may pass by simple unsealed bills of sale. Distinction between sealed and unsealed instruments abolished, Garden v. Derrickson, 95 Am. Dec. 289, note.

Water, Prior Appropriation.—Extent of right to appropriate water depends on the nature and uses of the appropriation, p. 38.

Principle approved, McKinney v. Smith, 21 Cal. 381, 383; Nevada County etc. Canal Co. v. Kidd, 37 Cal. 313; Smith v. O'Hara, 43 Cal. 375, 376; Lux v. Haggin, 69 Cal. 447; Edgar v. Stevenson, 70 Cal. 290, 291; De Necochea v. Curtis, 80 Cal. 405; Ball v. Kehl, 95 Cal. 614; New Mercer Ditch Co. v. Armstrong, 21 Colo. 365; Thorp v. Freed, 1 Mont. 658; Gassert v. Noyes, 18 Mont. 222; Lobdell v. Simpson, 2 Nev. 277; 90 Am. Dec. 539; Simmons v. Winters, 21 Oreg. 42; 28 Am. St. Rep. 731; Atchison v. Peterson, 20 Wall. 514, 679; Boyle v. San Diego Land and Town Co., 46 Fed. Rep. 711; Hewitt v. Story, 64 Fed. Rep. 515; Union Mill and Mining Co. v. Danberg, 81 Fed. Rep. 95, 106; Lobdell v. Hall, 3 Nev. 517, holding in the last case cited that an Indian who has appropriated water on the public lands of the United States may maintain an action for its diversion. Cited in Cache etc. Co. v. Water etc. Co., 25 Colo. 171, 71 Am. St. Rep. 139, discussing priority of appropriation; Colorado etc. Co. v. Larimer etc. Co., 26 Colo. 49, Mattis v. Hosmer, 37 Or. 530, and Hague v. Nephi etc. Co., 16 Utah, 430, 67 Am. St. Rep. 639, as to limitation of appropriation; Last Chance Min. Co. v. Bunker Hill etc. Min. Co., 49 Fed. Rep. 434, denying the right to change the place of use of water. Distinguished, Keeney v. Union Mfg. Co., 39 Conn. 581, as resting upon the peculiar law of California. Cited, treating of right of prior appropriation, Heath v. Williams, 43 Am. Dec. 279, 282, note; and 60 Am. St. Rep. 802, note; and referred to on same subject, McDonald v. Mining Co., 13 Cal. 239, n.

Findings in equity cases will not usually be disturbed, where the proofs are conflicting, p. 40.

Cited, Lyons v. Lyons, 18 Cal. 449, holding that when there are findings in an equity case, they are not to be disregarded.

13 Cal. 40-43. CRAVENS v. DEWEY.

The granting of nonsuit on the facts is a question of law, p. 42.

Cited as authority, Schroeder v. Schmidt, 74 Cal. 460; Hammond v. Wallace, 85 Cal. 527; 20 Am. St. Rep. 240; Warner v. Darrow, 91 Cal. 311; Craig v. Hesperia etc. Water Co., 107 Cal. 675; Kleinschmidt v.

McAndrews, 4 Mont. 225; Jones Lumber etc. Co. v. Paris, 6 S. Dak. 115; 55 Am. St. Rep. 815; and Sanford v. Elevator Co., 2 N. Dak. 10.

In reviewing ruling by court below in granting a nonsuit, the appellate court will consider every fact as proven which the evidence tended to prove, p. 42.

Approved as authority, Dow v. Gould etc. Min. Co., 31 Cal. 650; and Herbert v. King, 1 Mont. 479; so, to same effect, Masten v. Griffing, 33 Cal. 114. Cited in dissenting opinion, Mulcahey v. Dow, 131 Cal. 80, main opinion holding nonsuit justified.

13 Cal. 43-44. HOLVERSTOT v. BUGBY.

Motion for nonsuit should specify the grounds upon which it is made, p. 44.

Approved, Daley v. Russ, 86 Cal. 117. Cited in Williams v. Hawley, 144 Cal. 99, discussing rule with reference to motion for new trial made upon minutes.

13 Cal. 45-49. HASKELL v. CORNISH.

Agency.—Agent signing his own name to a promissory note made on behalf of his principal is not personally liable as a maker if the instrument itself discloses the intention to bind his principal and not himself, p. 48.

Principle of the decision approved and applied in the similar case of Shaver v. Ocean Min. Co., 21 Cal. 47; so in Hall v. Crandall, 29 Cal. 571; 89 Am. Dec. 66; Love v. Sierra Nevada etc. Min. Co., 32 Cal. 654; 91 Am. Dec. 607; and to same effect, Gillig v. Lake Bizler Road Co., 2 Nev. 223. Cited, Zeigler v. Wells, Fargo & Co., 28 Cal. 265, which was an action against the defendant for not complying with a contract to carry and deliver a draft. The complaint alleged that the draft was signed "John Q. Jackson," and the proof showed that it was signed "John Q. Jackson, Agent," and the variance was held to be immaterial. Cited as authority to the ruling stated, Mott v. Hicks, 18 Am. Dec. 563, note; and Southern Pac. Co. v. Dredger Co., 118 Cal. 371, holding that parol evidence may be employed to determine whose contract it is.

13 Cal. 50-53. HUTCHINSON v. BOURS.

Judgment.—Court may, in term time or vacation, order judgment on a verdict rendered and recorded, if the motion for a new trial was taken under advisement, p. 51.

Cited as authority, Casement v. Ringgold, 28 Cal. 340, holding that the clerk may perform the ministerial duty of entering judgment in vacation; and so in In re Cook, 77 Cal. 225; 11 Am. St. Rep. 271.
